OLD CLIMATES NECESSITATE LABOR.

"Who can stand before his cold?" r. Clarke says, "endure unprovi- ed." "The servants and officers  made a fire of coals; for it was old." Yes, it is cold that makes e mass of mankind labor. The sposition to labor is not indigen- s to man; it is rather an exotic, d acquired habit. Men begin to rk with no inborn love of it, but m necessity; a necessity partly tural and partly artificial; in- ding, so soon as a competency l allow of ease and repose, to se from toil. Long years, how- er, must be devoted to toil, before coveted season of repose can be ained; and these years of appli- ion beget a habit too strong eas- to be shaken off. So the work- work on, but necessity, and not ure, may justly claim the pater- y of the habit.

The proof of our theory is demon- ted by the habits of the peoples live in cold and warm climates. st, I hold, is the great and inex- ble task-master. Its chilly blast icy touch makes northern pop- ions work, and the absence of freezing lash permits Southern nlations to be comparatively and yet comparatively comfort-

"THERE IS A LAD HERE."

A most proper place for a lad to be, away from and out of the com- pany of the bad. In good company, in the company of such as had come together to listen to the wisdom from above, where he could receive the best instruction, and earn to be wise unto salvation—where most lads have been who have come to be the benefactors of the world—as witness Jesus in the Temple, at twelve years of age, among the doc- tors of the law, hearing and asking questions; and Wesley, so studi- ous, serious and devout, that his father admitted him to the Commu- nion at the tender age of eight years.

The next thought in this connec- tion that strikes us is, that God can and often does use humble instru- mentalities to accomplish his gra- cious designs. David, though but a lad, slew Goliah. It is not neces- sary to be great, in order to be good and useful. We are apt to rely too much upon eloquence, learning and character. God can use all these— indeed he often does—but he often does without them almost entirely; and with the weak things confound the mighty, as witness the estal lishment and early history of the Church, without armies, revenues or colleges.

The next suggestion is, that this "lad" was poorly furnished, as man would think, for the necessities of the occasion; a great multitude of hungry people, in want of food, and yet only "five loaves and two small fishes." It was most natural to say, "What are these among so many?" But God, who can make the seed yield thirty, sixty and an hundred fold, and a little "leaven, leaven the whole," can work and save with few as with many; can use appar- ently small resources to accomplish the purposes of his glory. Let us our small gifts, humble position or limited opportunities damp our zeal or discourage our hopes.

The next thought we would re- sent is, that though but a "lad," he had what no other one had in all that vast congregation, though they might have possessed much that he had not, and could not secure. He had, however, what was needful— what the occasion called for—food for the hungry—bread and fish; a small stock, to be sure, and a short and plain bill of fare, but well suited to hungry people who are not fasti- dious about their food. "A lad," an humble man of whom we have not heard or thought, may have just the gifts needed for the work to which he is called. Who, among his early cotemporaries, would have thought that Martin the humble monk, was the man to reform the Christian world, shake the Pope upon his throne, and kindle a light, whose unfading splendor should stream above mountains, over con- tinents and across broad and distant oceans? Moses may hold but a short and slender rod in his hand, but if God will, he can with it di- vide the sea, and smit water from the flinty rock.

It is natural to ask, with a great work before us, and only small means for its accomplishment— What are these for such a work? But it is not gracious ask; faith says, with the blessing of God it can be done. No man would ever have attempted to become a minis- ter or missionary, if he had consid- ered only his own inadequacy.— Rather let us say, "Our sufficiency is of God."

VIRGINIA CONFERENCE DELEGATES.—Just before going to press we have received further news from the Virginia Conference. Bishop Early con- tinued some preachers in their third and fourth years in the work. The following are the Delegates to the General Conference: M. Lee, D. S. Dogget, Wm. A. Smith, James A. Duncan, Nelson Head, F. W. Ben- nett, J. E. Edwards, J. Granberry, G. W. Langhorne, P. Peterson and L. Rosser. Reserves: Paul Whitehead, Samuel Head and Jo- seph H. Davis.

Rev. JOHN SIMMONS, of the Geor- gia Conference, died suddenly of dis- ease of the heart on the 12th De- cember, in the 75th year of his age, and 51st of his ministry.

THE SAVIOUR ON THE SEA.

Matthew xiv., 22d and 23d verses.

In this passage the Saviour, by successive steps, leads to the de- monstration of his Sonship; for al- though he had fed the multitudes, as yet they saw him not; no man had called him the Son of God.

The gradual working of the loaves —their growth under his hand, led to admiration, to reverence, but not to the higher emotion of fear. He ought to be King; he was the great Prophet. But how far below the true grandeur of the Son was this intended honor of earth? What throne was worthy of Him? How feeble the fame of earth to one whose name was already in heaven above every name!

What need had so great a Being for prayer? By it he held commu- nion with the Father. By it he en- larged, for the use of men, that ap- pointed channel for the mercies and gifts of heaven; for a greater river of good was then prepared and about to flow.

It was from the place of prayer that he saw his disciples on the deep; they were midway in their passage; the night was stormy, and it was three o'clock in the morning. Nothing in nature is so grand as the ocean, because, besides its un- known depth and extent, it has mo- tion, and seems at times instinct with life—treacherous, angry, un- governable. Even the stoutest fri- gate is a mere cork dancing on its wave-points. At night its waves curl as liquid fire; its rage is livid and none can control it but He who made it.

The disciples now thought with wonder of His constraint, urging them to take boat. He could not have foreseen this storm. Where was he now? Did he sympathize in their peril, for the wind was ter- rible? Was this to be the end of their ministry? O for the presence of that wonderful Jesus!

No doubt it was in their hour of agony, such an one as Jonah en- countered on his way to Tarshish, that the Saviour arose from his knees to go forth to their aid. The enemy was abroad. On that wild night, the Son of God, treading on the waves, following after that boat! He "that spake and it was done," might have willed a calm; but He went. "He which alone spreadeth out the heavens and treadeth upon the waves of the sea." Blessed Sa- viour! there is no sea too stormy for thee!

But one thing more was needed to complete the terrors of the crew, and that revealed itself out of the flashes and uproar of that night—a spirit! a form—the form of a man moving down towards them! It came steadily on. They saw the King of the Floods. No wonder they cried for fear. Nature is terri- ble in proportion as she seems to re- veal God. "The Almighty trou- bleth me; when I consider I am afraid of Him." Here to them was revealed the Master of the world, the living Power of the universe.— How dreadful this place—this Be- thel! To the patriarch the ladder was dreadful, amid angel forms; but here, in this wilderness of dark waters—did He dwell here, where man could not; out in the stormy parts of the sea—always surround- ed by night! What they often feared they now saw—the Dreadful God!

But O, how far is He that moveth upon the deep above the concep- tions of men! How much better to them than their fears! "Be of good cheer, it is I; be not afraid."— Whenever the Saviour is intelligi- ble, he is gracious—there with his strength and his love to beget con- fidence. What words these were to come out of that fearful place! The thunder rolling, that "deep and dreadful organ-pipe of God," the winds howling, darkness on the face of the sea, the waves opening them- selves as the jaws of Death—but amid it all, Christ—his hand on the ocean's mane—his voice speaking comfort and immortal peace. Not in the quiet upper chamber, but here, in this rough hour and place —"Peace, be of good cheer."

They recognize him—"Lord, if it be thou!" What relief was here!— It was a great art to hear and to know the voice of the Master; and how great the revulsion from dying fear to a consciousness of the kindly presence of the Saviour. "Bid me come to thee on the waters." It is a sublime moment in the history of a man, when he discerns the Saviour in nature. The thoughts of Peter often came like great bolts from heaven, not knowing what he said or did. It is amid such great waves of fear that faith is born, and by them is rocked and nursed. Only here can we see the true power of the greater power; Faith control- ling, arresting, wielding the force of nature. As the laws of vital motion do not arrest or change the law of gravity, but move freely in its pre- sence, so in the miracles of our Lord, the power of a spiritual life was shown superior to the laws of nature.

To this great inspired trust of Pe- ter, the Son of God answered— "Come," and Peter walked upon the water. Those steps were few, but they were strong. Humanity was learning to walk upon the deep.— At God's command, even the yield- ing water is firm beneath the tread of faith. A sinner, under the imme- diate eye of his Lord and by divine impulse, may walk on the sea, but if left to himself for one moment, must sink. His gaze and thought of Christ are not steady enough, he sees the winds boisterous, and fears. So Peter, beginning to sink, cried, "Lord, save me!" It was an oppor- tune cry.

"O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" Sure enough, O Peter, after having walked, if but five steps, why did you doubt?— When will there ever come power and salvation enough to banish un- belief from the bosom of man?— Amid the greatest triumphs of faith and within the grasping distance of his Lord, man doubts. The Sa- viour chides, but not until he had stretched forth his hand and caught him. See Christ standing on the dark sea, a circle of foam around him, as by and by on the sapphire pavement—the loud, contending waves—the winds careering like Satan loose—the lightnings flashing in hieroglyphic wrath—He standing amid the tempest, in conscious ma- jesty, and in his grasp a sinner— holding him up over the devouring gulfs. So when he died, He grasped and saved a sinner, and lifted him to Paradise; and here, as he re- veals himself the "Almighty God," he is in the very act of salvation.— Verily, the characteristic of the Son of God is, a sinner saved by grace in his right hand.

He is in the boat. Here was the Saviour, and here the King, and here too the calm. The storm husb- ed; then the boatmen and the dis- ciples fell down at the feet of that Majesty, the Monarch of the Deep, and worshipped Him, and said—"Of a truth thou art the Son of God."— 'Twas a marvellous company, and hour and place for the King of the World to be first felt and acknow- ledged as such by men; but 'twas in the grandest parts of creation— the waters; and in that lesser Ark, which carried the fortunes of the New Testament Church. Not as in Sinai, when the "Mountains saw thee and trembled;" but, as when "the overflowing of the water passed by"—"when the deep uttered his voice and lifted up his hands on high." 'Twas the morning watch; the world was for the most part heavy with sleep, while the Son of God was unwrapping the darkness from the minds of a boat's company, and, in advance of the coming sun, throwing his splendors over the Ocean of Humanity. O, blessed light of God's Son! we hail thee, thou undimmed glory of the Father! We fall down, with the ship's com- pany, at thy feet.

O reader, does Christ solve all the horrors of night to thee, or save thee in thy sinking? Trust thou in the Son of God and fear not, for He is able to save thee to the utter- most.

MOBILE CONFERENCE

REPORT ON BOOKS AND PERIODICALS.

The committee on Books and Pe- riodicals report that they have as- certained, with great satisfaction, that the Federal Government has restored the Publishing House to the church, and it is hoped that the House will soon resume the publi- cation of books and periodicals, as heretofore. There is great demand for Hymn Books and Sunday School literature, especially, which we trust the House will soon be able to supply.

They are also gratified in learn- ing that the press and fixtures of the New Orleans Christian Advo- cate and Depository have escaped the disasters of war, and that the Executive Committee of that paper intend to re-issue it as soon as 1000 subscribers are secured. The prospectus receives the approval of your committee, except perhaps that $5 per annum for the paper may be considered too much, as similar pa- pers are issued at lower rates.

The committee are furthermore informed that the Southern Chris- tian Advocate—that old, well-tried and excellent exponent of Southern Methodism—is now published at Macon, Ga., at $3 per annum. With but a slight interval, it has been issued during the war, having been removed from Charleston to Augus- ta, and finally to Macon—its edito- rial management being still in the hands of the same judicious editor, the Rev. Dr. Myers.

They have moreover ascertained that the Rev. Messrs. Baldwin and Grace, two ministers of the Mobile Conference, intend to publish a re- ligious weekly newspaper in Selma, at $4 per annum; this paper is to contain summaries of religious and secular intelligence, discussions of ecclesiastical and other subjects of special interest to our Connection— the members of this Conference are particularly invited to write for its columns and promote its circula- tion.

VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

DANVILLE, Va., Nov. 27, 1865.

This has been by far the most in- teresting day of the Conference ses- sion. Many very important matters have been discussed and decided. I propose to give you a brief ab- stract of the proceedings and de- bates. The Conference opened at 9 o'clock, with religious exercises, as usual.

The Rev. Dr. Sehon, Missionary Secretary for the Southern Church, was introduced, and made a very interesting speech. He spoke of the embarrassment of missionary operations by the late war, especi- ally in regard to foreign missions. The Indian missions had been de- ranged; the missions among the colored people, sustained for so many years by such an expenditure of money and talent, had been very seriously interfered with. He had been compelled to be President, Board of Directors and Secretary of the Missionary Society himself. The close of the war found the Society without a dollar in its treasury, and there were very many obligations which must be met. The mission- aries in China had not received any thing for years, and they were suf- fering for it. He came to Old Vir- ginia down-trodden, but, thank God, Virginia still, to ask aid especially for these men of God. He was sure they would give what they could. The spirit of Virginia would never die. She would rise from her deso- lation, and in the future be more glorious than in the past. He felt no fear for the future of the South- ern Church. He looked forward to a career of great prosperity and usefulness; to a great harvest of good which should be reaped by this branch of Christ's Church. The Church during the war, cut off from other fields, had turned its attention to our armies, and a noble band of missionary chaplains had done a vast amount of good. The legless, armless men who have come home from the fields of carnage, will tell to your children, in words of burn- ing eloquence, of the noble deeds of piety and love done by these ser- vants of Christ. He urged the preachers to earnest efforts in the missionary cause; and related an interesting incident in regard to the payment of a debt of $15,000 or $20,000, due by the Missionary So- ciety of the Church South, in New York, in 1861. A northern man—a northern Methodist preacher, had kindly and generously paid the whole amount. This must be imme- diately refunded. He spoke of an interview with the President in re- lation to the Church property. He was greatly pleased with him. He believed that we ought to sustain the President cordially. He was honest and true. He is certainly, said the Doctor, the best President we have got.

At the close of the Doctor's ad- dress the Conference appointed a missionary meeting, to be held in the Presbyterian Church, at seven o'clock. The Rev. Dr. Sehon, Dr. Sargeant and others will address it.

The Bishop then introduced the Rev. Samuel Register, of the Balti- more Conference, sent by that body as a fraternal messenger to this Conference. This gentleman deliv- ered with much feeling an address in substance as follows:

He said he had not command of language to express the great plea- sure which he felt in coming to this respected body of Christian minis- ters, bearing words of Christian sa- lutation and greeting from his own Conference. He represented 10,000 members and 90 ministers, who were identified with the Southern Church in sympathy, affection and interests. He rejoiced that the days of strife on the border were over, and he looked forward with very great pleasure to the session of his Con- ference in the spring, when he him- self and the ministers of that body expected to adhere formally to the Southern Church, and receive their appointment at the hands of the venerable Bishop Early. The Con- ference which he represented claim- ed to be the original Baltimore Con- ference. They certainly had a large majority of the whole body in 1861, when by decided vote they separa- ted from the Northern Church.— However that question of identity may be decided, he and his breth- ren were determined to cast in their lot with the Southern Church.

The Rev. Messrs. Rowlie and Cowles offered a series of resolu- tions, expressing the feelings of Christian affection which the Vir- ginia Conference entertains for the brethren represented by Mr. Regis- ter, and advising the Baltimore Con- ference as soon as possible formally to consummate their union with the Church in the South. Also, appoint- ing the Rev. Dr. Doggett a messen- ger, to convey the Christian salutа- tions of this Conference to that of Baltimore at its next session.

The Rev. Dr. Lee responded hap- pily to the resolutions. If any man had a right to express his joy at the visit of Mr. Register, and to the words of love and greetings he bore, he felt he had. In former years he had necessarily taken part in the border controversies. He rejoiced that the day of peace had not only dawned, but was shining in full splendor.

The Rev. Dr. Smith addressed the Conference in a similar strain. He welcomed cordially these breth- ren to our communion.

The Rev. Mr. Langhorn had been aware, for some time, of the inten- tions of these Baltimore brethren, and desired also, with words of wel- come and affection, to greet them.

The Rev. Dr. Doggett made a very eloquent speech, which your reporter regrets that he cannot re- port in full. He said he must give expression to the outburst of emo- tion which swelled his heart. The Church had lost, in some sections, but he regarded this noble accession of these brethren for principles' sake, as a full compensation for all. He drew a graphic and beautiful picture of the future of the Church in the South.

The Rev. Mr. Head alluded to his former connection with the Balti- more Conference, and the kindly re- lations which had always subsisted between himself and his former brethren. His heart was filled with gratitude and joy.

The Rev. Dr. Edwards said that he cordially joined in the congratu- lations with which the Virginia Con- ference welcomed the Rev. Mr. Re- gister as a fraternal messenger from the Baltimore Conference; and that he took occasion to say that the sub- ject had a breadth which had not not been fully represented by Mr. Register; that not only the Valley of Virginia, and the territory lying South of the Potomac, but a large portion of Eastern Maryland was interested in this movement of the Baltimore Conference to unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church South. He had occasion to know, from extensive correspondence, that many of the laity, together with a number of the preachers belonging to the East Baltimore Conference, as well as many from what is called the Old Baltimore Conference, had fully settled the question to unite with the Southern Methodist Church, and that but a few months would elapse before this movement would assume a form that would dissipate all doubt on the subject.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted by a rising vote.

The Rev Dr. Baird, agent of the American and the Virginia Bible Society, was introduced, and made some appropriate remarks. He said he had been appointed with the view to the fraternization of God's people everywhere.

He was cordially received.

The important business of the day was then taken up, and an interest- ing debate ensued. I send you a copy of the report on the part of the Committee on the State of the Church.

I will give you to-morrow a con- densed report of the interesting de- bate upon this paper. The first three resolutions were unanimously adopted. The fourth was under dis- cussion at the close of the session.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE STATE OF THE CHURCH.

The Committee on the State of the Church beg leave to report, in part, as follows:

The state of the Church has been submitted to the consideration of your committee at a period of her history and under circumstances of so peculiar a character, as to make it a subject of profound and solemn interest. She has just emerged from the midst of a condition of society of all others the most fraught with horrors, and the least friendly to the prosecution of her divinely ap- pointed mission. That the Church has suffered in various ways in this state of things, cannot be denied. Yet in the midst of all, and through all, the Church has lived. God has preserved her in her integrity. In the midst of all her mission of love has been crowned with success. We mourn the loss of some of her loveliest and brightest ornaments— lost to the Church below, but gained by the Church above. We rejoice to hail back to peaceful homes and sacred those who have survived.— And since the war storm has ceased to rage, the work of restoring the waste places, of saving and of pro- moting Christian holiness in the land, is progressing under the man- ifest blessing of God. "And whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord."

This may fitly be regarded as a new starting point in the career of Methodism as a distinctive form of Christianity in the land. That ca- reer, we trust, will be more glorious than her glorious past. But, that it may be so, great questions of policy must be met and settled with a just adaptation to the circumstances, which, by the providence of God, now invest us. Thus to adapt the policy and workings of the Church, we think, is the paramount duty of those who in the solemn present are charged with the responsibility, giving color, shape and destiny for the future. To meet this responsi- bility, we have need to pray that God would endow the councils of the Church with the wisdom of "Is- sachar, who had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do."

Some of those great questions have been brought to the notice of your committee, by memorials and other papers referred to them by this Conference. To these papers we have given careful consideration, and with a most gratifying unanim- ity, we recommend to this Confer- ence that they instruct their dele- gates to present to the General Con- ference to convene at New Orleans on the first Wednesday in April next, for their consideration, the fol- lowing resolutions, which have been adopted by your committee:

"Resolved, That "the plan of our Itinerant General Superintendency" ought to be preserved; and we re- commend to the General Conference so to strengthen the Episcopacy as to enable the Bishops "to travel through the connection at large, in order to preach and to oversee the spiritual and temporal affairs of the Church."

Resolved, That this Conference do recommend to the General Confer- ence to alter the law fixing the limit of the pastoral term, so as to make said limit three or four years, as the General Conference may prefer.

Resolved, That the office of Pre- siding Elder is indispensable to the harmonious and efficient working of our itinerant system.

Resolved, That in our judgment the time has fully come when the Ge- neral Conference should inaugurate prompt measures for the introduc- tion of laymen into the legislative and executive councils of the church, in such form and under such regu- lations and limitations as may be deemed judicious, and not in con- flict with the genius of Methodism.

Pending the discussion of the 4th resolution the Conference adjourned.

NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

This body met at Raleigh, N. C., on 6th December, 1865, Bishop Early presiding.

The following resolutions were presented by the Revs. Wm. Closs and I. T. Wyche:

Resolved, 1. That it is advisable that a Convention of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, should be be held at as early a day as prac- ticable.

2. That the said Convention should be composed of delegates chosen by the ministry and laity.

3. That the said Convention should be organized into two houses —one house to be composed of min- isters, the other of laymen; to be chosen in such form and manner as may be ordained by the General Conference.

4. That all matters pertaining to the spiritual department of the Church should originate in the Mi- nisterial House, and all matters per- taining to the temporal department should originate with the Lay House; and nothing should enter into the organic law of the Church without the sanction of a majority in each House.

5. That the delegates of the North Carolina Conference to the next Gen- eral Conference of our Church be, and they are hereby instructed to present these resolutions to that body, and urge the adoption of such measures as shall promptly carry into effect all the provisions of the foregoing resolutions.

When these resolutions were call- ed, a very interesting debate en- sued, in which Messrs. Closs, N. F. Reid, R. S. Moran, Dr. Craven and Dr. Doub took part.

The resolutions were finally with- drawn by the mover, by permission of the Conference, with a view of giving way to another series of re- solutions, which, it was intimated, would be subsequently introduced- but which not being submitted to the Conference, cannot therefore be reported.

Dr. Deems goes to New York to publish the "Watchman." The Conference approved his purpose, recommended the paper, and passed resolutions regretting the departure of Dr. Deems from the State, and hearing strong testimony to his christian and ministerial character, and to his qualifications as an ed- itor.

Bishop Early was requested, by resolution, to use his influence with his colleagues to have the Ge- neral Conference changed from New Orleans to some central point.

The following are the Delegates to the General Conference: N. F. Reid, C. F. Deems, N. H. D. Wilson, W. H. Bobbitt, B. Craven, J. W. Burkhead and R. S. Moran.

Reserve Delegates: D. B. Nicholson, W. Barringer and W.

We have ample arrangements for obtaining commercial information for our paper: the state of the markets, foreign and domestic, tables of prices current, &c.; so that one taking it will have the news of the city dailies in addition to the ordinary news of a religious journal. A paper constituted for Saturday and Sunday reading; talking somewhat of the country, the church and the crops, and somewhat of politics, of preaching and the parson—as we used to do in Texas, just before meeting.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE EXTRA.

During the session of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, to be held in this city in April next, we shall issue a Daily Extra, which will be furnished at two dollars for the whole period of the session. Persons wishing it will please forward their subscriptions at an early day.

LYONS & CO.

We call attention to the advertisement of the Clothing Emporium of Messrs. Lyons & Co., on the corner of Common and St. Charles streets. They have a very large and excellent assortment of ready made clothing, and a "Southern Manufactory" for the special accommodation of Planters. For years past they have been among the most enterprising and successful clothing merchants of the city.

We have mailed this first number of the XIIth vol. of the Advocate to all the Preachers of the Mobile, Montgomery, Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences. We refer them for our terms to the "Notice to Agents," and confidently expect from our brethren a prompt and hearty response.

GREETING.

The Executive Committee of the Joint Board of Publication presents the New Orleans Christian Advocate once more to the favorable consideration of the Ministry and Membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, as well as to its large list of patrons in the South-Western States and Conferences. The Committees of Publication of the Mobile, the Montgomery, the Mississippi and the Louisiana Conferences will meet here on the 2d Tuesday of February, and it is very desirable to have their consent and direction in the very outset of so great and difficult an enterprise; but the action of the bodies which they represent and the voice of our friends, heard upon all sides, have for some time past urged the re-issue of the paper. We are therefore at it, not unlike one who, as not yet prepared, hears the last stroke of the bell which summons the people to the church and the preacher to the pulpit. A single glance at the names of those who have been selected to constitute the Joint Board for the publishing of the Advocate, indicates the high favor in which the Itinerant Ministry regards this enterprise, and offers to our people a sufficient guarantee of its success. One important consideration which delayed the re-appearance of our paper was, the condition of the mails. The principal mail routes have been established very leisurely, and some of the carriers are hardly yet in earnest; and even now we must avail ourselves, necessarily, of the various Express Companies which ply from this point, to secure the prompt and secure transmission of our mail packages. To have handled the subscription price, to have toiled and written and issued the paper would scarcely have satisfied our patrons, unless we could go one step farther and see it safely delivered. The daily papers were springing up all around us, which only seemed to demonstrate our own tardiness. But a daily paper, dependent for support upon city and steamboat circulation, upon advertisements and occasional fat contracts with Municipal and State Conventions and corporations and notices of court processes and seizures, is financially a very different affair from a weekly religious journal. In fact, the one pays; the other only lives.

After the experience of some dozen years in this thing, it is to be supposed that the dullest would learn enough to speak confidently—perhaps wisely. The sparseness of population in the new and extreme Southern States is the great obstacle to a successful weekly. And by success we mean not merely a paper self-supporting, but profitable; with say twenty, thirty, or even fifty thousand subscribers. The reading population is not here. The working class, which must ever constitute the staple of a good subscription list, are throughout the Middle, Western and Northern States the supporters of the New York Observer, the New York Christian Advocate, and such like mammoth religious journals. Heretofore that class in the South has been less than nothing, so far as the support of journallsm is concerned. A difficulty which, we are happy to foresee, will lessen with that great tide of immigration which is already setting in toward "these lands."

The New Orleans Christian Advocate, as a weekly journal, accomplished more in the face of these difficulties than any sheet in the States of the far South. But its large list of subscribers was mainly owing to the aid of the best class of agents that ever surrounded or supported a paper. The Southern Itinerant Methodist Ministry in Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana can achieve any success which they heartily unite upon and determine, in building churches, colleges, schools, asylums, or in the establishment of any good thing. And yet, with all this philosophising and experience of tried friends, when we looked at the times, the thorough and wide poverty which stretches away in the track of war, the uncertainty of a half chaotic future, the pressing demand for the most absolutely necessary things of common support, we hesitated—dreaded to repeat the hopes and fears with which, on the 8th of Feb., 1857, we first launched this honest craft. But in so benevolent an enterprise why should we doubt the favor of Him who has always been "better to us than our fears."

We should have been glad to have had in hand exchanges, original communications, advertisements and withal a plenty of hard cash, before attempting the first number; but this is denied us. In truth, we wished to be underway before beginning; but swimming while as yet one is out of the water is a difficult thing, and only to be imagined by fond mothers. In a few weeks we hope to have made all our connections and to be able to present our patrons with a sheet which will remind them favorably of old times. The fact that we have our own house, our own press, type, engine, and all the old machinery, and are out of debt; that we have a good conscience and a good character; these are no mean elements of success in any undertaking. If now we can add to them economical habits and industrious application, triumph should certainly crown the result. Well, we will modestly assume—"for the sake of argument"—that such are our qualifications; and yet despite this gentle assumption, without one other thing we should not—could not succeed. All this is at one end of the line; and without the conscientious, persistent labor of our brethren, the preachers, at the other end, and the prompt support of our old patrons, it would be folly to adventure this enterprise. That co-operation we shall doubtless have. A Methodist Journal at this point, sustaining and defending Southern Methodism, may have been heretofore a positive luxury, but now we know and feel it to be a prime necessity.

THE METHODIST CHURCH NORTH IN THE CITY OF NEW ORLEANS.

On the 25th December the first session of the "Mississippi Mission Conference" was held in St. Paul's, Colored Church, Bishop Thompson presiding. The Conference consisted of some five white and some fifteen colored preachers. The Bishop opened the session with the words, "I feel authorized to organize an Annual Conference in New Orleans, in view of the circumstances which surround us."

Sermons were delivered, committees appointed, Elders and Deacons ordained, reports read, and all the ordinary movements of an Annual Conference were gone through with, judging by the report, most admirably. But the specialities were, first, resolutions regarding the Centenary of American Methodism, in behalf of which the Rev. Dr. Newman was appointed to deliver a sermon; next, the establishing a Biblical Institute for the education of colored ministers, to be located in this city, and to be known as the "Thomson Biblical Institute," of which the Rev. J. P. Newman, D. D., is President and Professor of Pastoral Theology; and lastly, the whole Conference was photographed and "a historical picture was produced which thousands will look back upon with wonder and delight."

From the place where the Conference was held and the address of the Presiding Bishop, we judge that the audience and surroundings of this first session were mostly colored.

"But why do we come here? 1. We have the means to do good, and this vast field invites our labor. 2. We should aim to strengthen the government and this will follow the union of the churches of this country. 3. We come to you, the colored people of the South, who were separated from us in 1844. The opportunity is now offered you to return. Our white brethren may not desire us, but you do. You welcome us. We come to you because you are many and will need our care and help. You are destined to be a rich and intelligent people, and your rising power should be made subservient to some benign end."

The list of appointments consists mainly of St. Paul's, Winans and Soule Chapels. There are two preaching places occupied by white preachers—one a hall in Camp street, and the other in the Fourth District. Our old colored preachers, Ross, Scott Chinn and Henry Green, constitute the main staple of the colored preachers, and over all Rev. Dr. Newman is Presiding Elder. There is also an Opelousas District, a Mississippi District and a Texas District. But the main staple here again are Sam. Small, Sam. Osborn, William Kennedy, William Murrell and Jo. Bryant.

All this sounds well and looks as if something had actually been accomplished; but sifted down, it amounts to about this—that the Church North has in this city possession of our colored churches and colored members and colored congregations, with the addition of colored Sunday Schools. And but for the absolute orders of President Johnson, all of our churches would have figured largely in the report of this famous "Mississippi Mission Conference." By the aid of the military the Rev. Bishop Thomson and the Rev. Dr. Newman rejoice in the present possession of some $25,000 worth of church property and some 2000 colored members—"another man's line of things made ready to hand." It is a study in itself, the almost unconscious simplicity with which this result of the forty-horse proselyting power of the War Department is paraded as the legitimate triumph of missionary enterprize—"boasting of things without their measure that is of other men's labors." Doubtless before some distant audience the report of this "success" may prove a very good thing financially.

That the religious condition of the colored man will be improved by it, that he will be better instructed, and his new friends be found as serviceable as old ones have been, every good man should hope. But the statistics of Northern Methodism during twenty years show a very small colored membership out of the large colored population within its immediate territory. And is it likely that these Northern preachers can accomplish in the South that which they have signally failed to do at home?

There is one point of view in which this "Mississippi Conference" possesses an interest peculiarly its own. We allude to the unalloyed pleasure with which the Rev. Bishop Thomson and the Rev. Doctor Newman must have realized in the very bosom and centre of St. Paul's, surrounded to suffocation with a packed, wonder-smitten audience, hanging over the galleries and pressing up to the steps of the altar, breathing and drinking in the atmosphere of that choice circle. The easy and beautiful creations of Aladdin's lamp could not have been more bewilderingly intoxicating than must have been the full surprise of men who had talked, dreamt, preached and made a speciality of the "poor negro" for twenty years, and lo! in the twinkling of an eye, they find themselves in the actual, abundant possession and satisfaction of more colored brethren and sisters than they could possibly have imagined, or in fact knew what to do with. It was the rapture of an Eastern wedding, when the bridegroom lifts the veil, and sees for the first time the features of the bride.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

The last session of this body was held in Mansfield, La., Bishop Andrew presiding. A respectable attendance of the members. The preachers appeared to be in good health and were mostly attired in neat and comfortable jeans—a pleasing evidence of the industry and independence of our Southern people.

The session of the Conference was never more harmonious. Resolutions looking to changes in our economy were adopted.

1. "That we declare ourselves in favor of abolishing probationary membership in our church.

2. "That we memorialize the General Conference to establish a solemn and uniform system of receiving members into the communion of our church."

3. "That we respectfully recommend the next General Conference to take into consideration the propriety of extending the term of the Pastorate to four years, at the discretion of the Bishop and his advisers."

4. That we respectfully petition the General Conference so to amend the Discipline as that all votes in Quarterly Conference to license Preachers and to recommend Preachers for admission in the Travelling Connection, or to receive Deacons' and Elders' orders, be cast by ballot.

General resolutions were passed:

1. That the last Friday in March be observed as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, and that Divine Service be held in our churches on that day, and that the blessing of God be especially implored upon the General Conference to be convened in the city of New Orleans April next.

3. Thanks to the Presiding Bishop, who so ably and impartially presided over our deliberations.

3. Thanks to the citizens of Mansfield, for their courteous and hospitable entertainment of the Conference.

4. Thanks to the Era Line of Red River steamers, for transporting the members of this Conference free of charge.

THE MOBILE CONFERENCE.

The second session of the Mobile Conference was held in Franklin street Church, Mobile, November 29th to December 5th, 1865, Bishop Paine presiding. Dr. Dorman, assisted by Messrs. Abernathy and Hearn, was Secretary, as usual.

Three preachers were admitted on trial, viz: R. J. Perry, E. Turner and E. Cameron. Five were continued on trial, viz: C. W. Calhoun, W. Mitchell, J. M. Johnson, W. P. Wilson, H. C. Stone, U. Phillips. Six were admitted in full connection, viz: N. F. Mitchell, W. C. Owings, W. H. Leith, H. Kavanaugh, C. C. Ellis, J. M. Brown, the last three being ordained deacons. Three were ordained elders—W. H. Leith, S. M. Thames, J. Foust. Seven were superannuated, viz: G. Garrett, R. Y. Rew, McMeans, W. C. Harris, J. G. R. J. W. Laney, A. J. Crawford. Seven located—J. J. Hutchinson, H. M. Henderson, T. F. Green, S. Cooper, N. B. Cooper, S. Briggs, B. Owings. Decrease, 247 white probationers and 386 members; increase of local preachers, 0. The amount necessary for superannuated preachers, &c., $4,815, was paid but of this sum $1220 60 was contributed by Messrs. C. W. Butt and T. T. A. Lyon, of Mobile; contributed for missions, $1965. The session of the Conference next year is to be held in Enterprize, Miss. The first Friday in March is to be observed as a day of fasting and prayer, with special reference to the approaching General Conference. Collections are to be taken up in our congregations in February and March, to defray the expenses of the delegates to the General Conference, and if there be an excess it is to be paid over to the Joint Board of Finance.

In the election of delegates to the General Conference, five were elected on the first ballot, to wit: T. O. Summers, W. M. Wightman, J. Hamilton, P. P. Neely, A. H. Mitchell; on the second, R. K. Hargrove on the third, T. W. Dorman; Murrah and C. C. Calloway are reserve delegates.

A committee (R. K. Hargrove chairman) was appointed to take into consideration the condition of the colored people and our duty towards them, which made an able report, closing with the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1. That our church edifices be open to them for divine worship as heretofore, and that they be invited to attend them.

2. That missions be continued among them, and, whenever opportunity offers, that circuits and stations be organized, with officers of their own race, the same to be supplied with ministers from this body or with such others, either white or colored, as the presiding elders may judge suitable for the work.

3. That the ministers appointed be instructed to promote, as far as they may deem advisable, the education of their children.

4. That whenever they decide to leave our church organization for one exclusively of their own race, unwise as we regard it, yet as spiritual children, for whom we have long sacrificed and toiled and prayed in the past, they shall go forth with no bitterness on our part, but rather with blessings.

5. That the Conference request the presiding Bishop to appoint a missionary to the colored people of Mobile—one of our best, most experienced and most influential ministers—and that the Mission Committee appropriate an adequate and liberal sum for his support.

The committee submit the following resolutions to the Conference for adoption:

Resolved, 1. That the Mobile Conference will promptly renew its efforts to circulate the publications of the Publishing House at Nashville, and to secure the liquidation of indebtedness to it within its bounds.

2. That the Mobile Conference will adopt the New Orleans Christian Advocate as its organ, as heretofore the war, and will exert itself to promote its circulation.

3. That, as heretofore, the Mobile Conference will promote the interests of the Southern Christian Advocate.

4. That when the religious paper projected in Selma shall be established, according to prospectus, the Mobile Conference will give it such support as may be compatible with antecedent obligations.

The Last Great Improvement in dentience is the use of nitrous oxide for the painless extraction of teeth. The Colton Association of dentists in New York have administered it in over 20,000 cases without an accident, or anything but a pleasant effect. Dr. H. F. [illegible] known for over twenty years as one of the most skillful among our able practitioners, and has introduced the now popular vulcanite base in the South, has associated with himself Dr. Stone and Glidea. Drs. Smith and Stone, who stand pre-eminent for their great success in the use of the vulcanite base, will attend to that department, and Dr. Glidea, a member of the above named association, will manufacture and administer the nitrous oxide, with which he has had an extensive experience during the last few years. By this combination of skill, experience and integrity, strangers visiting the city can have operations performed with dispatch, and at such moderate prices, that persons of all means need not feel constrained to visit inexperienced or ignorant operators.—N. O. Ti[illegible]

To the above we add, that Dr. Smith prepares the plate, and instantly upon extracting the teeth inserts the artificial ones, which are at once useful for mastication. They have the appearance of natural growth. We admire the dental skill of the Doctor and refer the reader to his card.

THE MEXICAN TIMES.

We have received from our old and highly esteemed friend, exGov. Henry Watkins Allen, two copies of his paper, the Mexican Times, dated 2d and 9th ult., respectively, with an endorsement upon one of them bringing freshly back the memory of pleasanter days, which we shall prize highly as long as we live. It is a souvenir of the past—a token of kindly recollection—as well as a remembrancer of the present, from one of the noblest, bravest and truest hearted men, take him all in all, that ever lived.

We are glad to see that Gov. Allen is prospering, that he is above want, and that his own brains and his own industry have enabled him to make an honorable living in the far-off land of his exile: but we read with deep regret several intimations that his intention never to return to his native land was unalterable. We really hope the events of the not far distant future may cause him to change his determination, and that the period is not very remote which shall witness his return to his old home and to the society of his old friends.

Gov. Allen is evidently well pleased with Mexico. Here is one paragraph from his paper:

Notwithstanding our winter has set in, and the night air is "eager and nipping," still our flowers are as beautiful, our cocoanuts and chirimoyas as rich, and our oranges, bananas and pine apples as sweet as ever.

This is a wonderful—wonderful country—with all the tropical fruits and plants of the world, with all the seasons well defined, with good health and the purest water—it is indeed almost an earthly Paradise.

The Governor always was an advocate of mental and moral improvement. We find that these characteristics are operating upon his mind just as strongly in Mexico as they used to in Louisiana. He wishes to elevate the Mexicans by educating them; and what he has to say on the subject, is well told in these words:

The 7,000,000 of Indians and mixed races in Mexico are citizens of the Empire. By the provisional statute of the realm, they are entitled to all the rights and privileges of that Constitution. From them have sprung many of the brightest and best minds of this country. They have made the roads, delved in the mines, held the plow, and used the spade, and built the houses, from time immemorial, to the present hour. They should not be neglected. We know our Democratic Emperor will not forget them. Let the schoolmaster "go abroad" through the length and breadth of this great Empire, and there let him remain. Let there be a teacher on every hacienda, in every rancho, in every village, in every district of every city. If parents will not send their children to school, compel them to do so, as is done in Prussia.

Give to every child in Mexico the key to knowledge. Simply learn them to read and write and they will do the rest themselves. No rising generation must be educated, into policy urges it, humanity demands it, Christian duty requires it, and God himself will bless it.

STATUTES OF LIMITATION.

The New York Chamber of Commerce, at one of its recent meetings, memorialized Congress for direct interference with the operations of laws passed or likely to be passed by the Southern States providing for the cancelling of debts by limitation. It is intended that there was due to Northern merchants at the outbreak of the war, not much less than one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, which the creditors have been unable to collect, owing to the war, in the proper State courts; and therefore if the State Legislatures enact statutes of limitation, many "loyal creditors" will be prevented from obtaining their rights. The petition to Congress prays that a law may be passed exempting these "loyal creditors" from the operation of any such State laws, until they can bring suits for their claims in the United States Courts.

THE ORPHANS' HOME OF MISSISSIPPI.

The following letter, dated Louisville Hotel, Jan. 9, 1866, was addressed to the editors of some of the Louisville papers:

I have received a letter from a gentleman of Owingsville, Ky., in response to my appeal in behalf of the suffering orphans of my adopted State, in which he kindly offers to adopt one of our poor little boys, give him a finished education and a profession, and in every way treat him as if he were his only child. Are there not many families in this favored State who could take one or more of these poor orphan children and do a good work by them? I should like to receive a thousand such applications, from the right kind of persons, all over the State of Kentucky.

I have also received a letter from a poor man dated Camdenville, Ky., in which he says: "Enclosed please find $— for the benefit of the Orphans' Home of the State of Mississippi. I would be glad to send more, but I am a poor man and have four children. I hope every Southern State will follow the example of Mississippi."

Mr. Editor, are there not thousands scattered over this favored State, who could send me a donation for this noble charity? I know that they would not unless, if the contributions were general, would establish our excellent institution on a permanent basis. The funds of the fatherless and of the sufferers, send in your contributions without delay. I shall remain here for some days to come, and if I should chance to leave before my letters reach me, they will be forwarded to me and their contents duly acknowledged through the Louisville and Mississippi papers.

Respectfully, yours, etc.,
THOS. P. TREADWELL,
General Superintendent of the Orphans' Home of the State of Mississippi.

☞ The trichina disease continues its ravages at Hadersleben, Prussia. Several persons, who had partially recovered, have had a relapse, and have died suddenly of pulmonary paralysis. The deaths from this disease, at Hadersleben and its environs, amount to 65. In the workmen's barracks, out of 27 patients, 24 died. Physicians have hurried from all quarters, to study the new and terrible distemper.

THE LAND OFFICE.

Some two months ago, as well as we can remember, Dr. A. P. Dostie, received the appointment of Register of Public Lands for the State of Louisiana under the United States Government. Judging from an order recently issued by Gen. Canby, the Doctor has concluded to accept the position and open his office for the transaction of business. The order referred to is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF LOUISIANA,
New Orleans, La., January 17th, 1866.

Special Orders No. 11.

The State authorities will deliver to A. P. Dostie, Esq., all books, papers, official records and documents, and property of whatever name and description, taken possession of by the rebel authorities, pursuant to an ordinance of a Convention held at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in the year 1861, of which A. Monton was President, styled: "An ordinance relative to the unappropriated public domain in the State of Louisiana," and surrendered to the military authorities of the United States, and by them transferred to the Auditor of the State of Louisiana. They will also deliver to him all papers and documents relating to the sale or alienation of any such property by the rebel authorities, and to the proceeds of the sale, of whatsoever the same may consist, and to the disposition made of the proceeds.

By order of MAJ. GEN. E. R. S. CANBY.
WICKHAM HOFFMAN,
Assistant Adjutant General.

The ordinance relative to the unappropriated public domain referred to by Gen. Canby was passed on the 12th of February, 1861, the State Convention then being in session in this city. The act declared that the title to all United States lands in Louisiana became vested in the State, from and after that time, subject to such rights as persons had obtained under the law. All laws and parts of laws before in force were continued, except in cases where they conflicted with the ordinances of the Convention. The law also provided that the Surveyor General, Registers and Receivers who held office under the United States, should continue in their positions upon taking the oath of allegiance to the State, and directed that all monies then in their hands be paid to the Treasurer of the State.

On the 7th of March, however, a supplementary ordinance was adopted which prohibited the location of military bounty land warrants on the public domain in Louisiana, and created a "Department of Public Lands," under the control of a "Commissioner of Public Lands," thus suspending the old organization. It was also by this time ascertained that instead of the Surveyor General, Registers and Receivers having money in their possession belonging to the United States, the Government was in arrears to those officers for services rendered, and therefore the State assumed the debt and paid their salaries.

During the transfers and reorganization of the Land Office in accordance with the laws here referred to, many official documents accumulated, and these, together with the original records, are to be turned over to the new Registrar. How much of the land in question was disposed of by the State authorities, under the ordinances of the Convention, we cannot ascertain, but probably no large amount. For the sake of the holders, we hope not; but it is probable that Register Dostie will soon set himself to work to ascertain.

HOME NEWS.

The Victim of Two Gambling Saloons and Sundry "Ropers-In."

Wednesday night a young man, of respectable appearance, was brought to the police station on a charge of being drunk and disorderly; but though slightly intoxicated, he told quite a straight story of the circumstances which preceded and led to his arrest. It seems he is agent for some business house in Philadelphia, and arrived in New Orleans a few days ago, amply provided with funds for the purposes on which he came. By some new acquaintances he was induced to visit a certain gambling room on Carondelet street last Saturday night, and there engaged in the game of "faro," by which he was quietly relieved of the sum of $1650. Inasmuch as he was unlucky at the Carondelet street establishment, he was induced to try his fortune at a similar sporting house on St. Charles street, in the hope that he might be able to recover his lost funds and perhaps win more. But here it seems he was still more unfortunate, for his pocket was lighter by $1900 when he rose from the gambling table than when he sat down. However, his "friends" still clung to him, consoling him in his loss no doubt, but watching for a chance to bleed him still farther of his plethoric supply of greenbacks. They drank—or rather, in the language of the bar-room vocabulary, they "smiled" again and again, till the Philadelphia agent began to forget his losses in the care-killing qualities of "old Monongahela," and one of the "friends" commenced tussling with him in the saloon, during which his memorandum and pocket-book were strangely spirited away from his pocket. Soon as he missed this last portion of his treasure, he became almost crazy at his moneyless condition, and stormed around in such a manner as to make it the duty of the police officer near by to arrest him and take him to the lock-up. As he told his story, the full sense of his misfortunes would seem to pierce his soul as with a blade of steel; he would tear his hair and sob as if his heart would burst. The matter was taken in hand by the Chief, and no doubt some of the parties who ensnared the Pennsylvanian, and then stripped him remorselessly of his last dollar, will have to suffer for their treachery and craftiness.

We learn that the establishment on St. Charles street, by reason of certain moral hydraulic pressure, will probably disgorge the $1900 taken in there. Of the Carondelet street part of the affair, we learn that there seems to be a determination to "hang on" to the $1650.

Let the foregoing be a warning to young men who are flush in purse and too eager to see the "elephant." Beware of the man who would pilot you to the gambling hell or the brothel; beware of the temptation to see the mysteries of city life.

NEGRO SUFFRAGE IN THE HOUSE.

Among the proceedings of the House on the 11th inst., we find the following debate on negro suffrage:

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to extend suffrage in the District of Columbia, by striking out from all laws and ordinances the word "white."

Mr. Rogers, of New Jersey, said there was no purer patriotism than that which belongs to the party opposed to those in power. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, none were included within the general terms "people," or "citizens," but white people, and this fact had been solemnly declared by the Supreme Court of the United States; and that the Government was made for white men and women, and not for the colored race.

Mr. Kelly said that he would not be guilty of an impropriety, but he would ask the gentleman to mention the case.

Mr. Rogers replied—The Dred Scott case.

Mr. Kelly asked the gentleman whether he ever heard of the distinction between the dictum of a judge and the decision of a court, and whether he would point out the facts on which he raised this question, or the language on which it was decided. His (Kelly's) recollection was that what one of the judges of the court said was what the gentleman announced as the decision of the court. He affirmed that when the Constitution was adopted, the free colored men of New Jersey and the States adjoining, and of all the States, excepting South Carolina and probably Delaware and Virginia—in which suffrage was regulated by statute, and not by constitutional provision—were citizens, and voted for delegates to the convention which framed the Constitution, and exercised suffrage on the question of its adoption. He challenged the production of any legal decision or historical work to contradict the assertion which he had made.

Mr. Rogers replied that he made the assertion, and would swerve not a single line from it. That in the Declaration of Independence, and in the Constitution, the only intent was to include the white race.

Mr. Kelly said the gentleman misrepresented the case, and asked what the court did decide.

Mr. Rogers replied that the court decided—and every intelligent man who read the decision would see it—that Dred Scott was not a citizen of the United States, or of any State, and did not come within the political status of a citizen, and could not become a free citizen in any court of the United States.

Mr. Kelly remarked that the gentleman had not yet answered what was decided. He (Kelly) would state that the court decided that it had no jurisdiction over the case before it, and therefore turned it out of court, and thereby proclaimed that all the array of facts were outside of the court.

Mr. Rogers said that great sanctity was given to the action of the Supreme Court by the gentleman and his friends, when the Court leaned to radicalism; but when the Court fairly met the issues before the country, they then branded the Court as usurpers, secessionists and tyrants, whose decisions were not entitled to consideration.

Mr. Kelly replied that the gentleman was slightly mistaken. The Republican party do not stand by that decision. He had never heard a member of that party say that the Court decided in accordance with law, when it decided that it had no jurisdiction in the case. The assault was from the other party, who say that the Court had jurisdiction. It decided matters which those gentlemen adopt as their creed.

Mr. Rogers repeated that the Court decided that Scott did not come within the jurisdiction of the Court; was not a citizen of the United States, and could not place himself in a position for action in the Federal Courts. As to conferring suffrage on negroes, it was a monstrous doctrine, forcing equality, and placing them side by side with the white race. No such doctrine was heretofore announced by the Republican party.

Mr. Rogers, in the course of his speech, was interrupted by a question from a member on the Republican side, in relation to suffrage in the various States, and in conclusion he further expressed his views against extending the franchise to negroes, asserting that experience and observation showed that they were incompetent to its intelligent exercise.

Mr. Farnsworth, of Illinois, said, if he recollected rightly, the gentleman from New Jersey did all he could to embarrass the armies of the United States, and to prevent the Government from sending reinforcements to their relief and assistance in the field; and, among other things, the gentleman voted against the passage of a bill providing for the speedy trial of the guerrillas among the rebels, who were shooting our poor soldiers who, while weak and wounded, were dragging themselves from the field of battle, and, if he recollected rightly, the gentleman and his friends in New Jersey, refused to give white soldiers the right to vote, even as to who should represent him in Congress. The gentleman protested against what he called the injustice of giving the black man the right to vote. The white soldiers did not, however, object to clothing the black man with the privilege. Objection only came from the gentleman and his political friends. If freedom is hallowed, then there should be the right of voting to protect it. He took issue with the gentleman that this is exclusively a white man's government, and maintained that our fathers, who made the Constitution, designed it not for the white or black man, but for mankind. He noticed the charges of amalgamation made from time to time, saying it existed where slavery prevailed, not where the negro was free; and as for the allegation that the attempt was to produce equality, he was free to admit that he would prefer a seat here, by the side of Fred. Douglas, than beside Fernando Wood, for instance. [Laughter.] During the war a law was passed giving citizenship to every foreigner who entered the army and served one year. If this privilege was conferred on those ignorant of our institutions, why should it be denied to negroes, who are natives of the land, and who, for four years, fought for the country? The restrictions on suffrages in the States should not deter him from doing his duty toward the colored man in this district. In answering objections which had been made to the bill, he said: "The late election, professing to take the sense of the people on the subject of negro suffrage, was one sided and a mockery—only one part of the people voting, instead of all going to the polls. All the secessionists, sympathizers in the rebellion, and copperheads, voted on that occasion against the extension of suffrage."

Mr. Marshall asked on what authority his colleague made that charge.

Mr. Farnsworth replied: General report. Mr. Marshall said it was very easy to make a general charge, and added that he had been informed that not one of the returned white soldiers voted for negro suffrage. The charge was made without proof.

Mr. Farnsworth repeated his declaration, and intimated that his colleague was a sympathizer with the rebellion.

Mr. Marshall said if his colleague charged that he sympathized with the rebellion, he charged what was not true.

Mr. Farnsworth said those who made the Chicago platform in 1864 sympathized with the rebellion.

Mr. Marshall—You already have my response.

Mr. Farnsworth said—Whether the Democratic Convention intended it or not, they gave aid and comfort to the rebellion. In further advocating the conferring of suffrage on colored soldiers, he said the country would be criminal if it did not grant it.

The House then adjourned.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCHES IN MOBILE.

The Episcopal Churches in Mobile were opened on Sunday last, for the first time since September. The following pastoral, from Bishop Wilmer, was read by the officiating ministers:

A Pastoral to the Clergy of the Diocese of Alabama.

Reverend and Dear Brethren:

In the pastoral which I issued to the clergy and laity of the Diocese of Alabama, upon the occasion of the closing of the churches by the military authority, I stated that, "should the General Council, of which the Diocese of Alabama is a component part, order any prayer in place of that which had ceased of necessity, then, from that time forth, the ordering of the Council would be decisive as the supreme law of the churches constituting the Council."

The said General Council, at its late session in Augusta, Ga., did provide for such prayer, and recommended that said provision should have the force of law in any diocese, whenever approved by the Bishop or Diocesan Council thereof.

Regarding such decision of the Council as the voice of the Church, I would have immediately seconded the ruling of the Council, but for the military duress under which the Bishop and clergy of the Diocese of Alabama were held.

So great would have been the evil of yielding to secular dictation in matters pertaining to the supremacy of the Church, that I was solicitous to avoid even the appearance of this evil.

I stated in my pastoral of June 20 that "any attempt to dictate to the Church can only serve to retard the action which, in pursuance of her obligations to God and to her own traditions, she will unquestionably take, at the proper time and in the proper manner."

It has so turned out; and the use of the prayer for the President of the United States has, through military duress, been postponed in this diocese for the space of two months. The recent revocation of the military "Orders" renders it proper for me to do now what I could not properly have done before such revocation.

I do now, therefore, recommend, that the ruling of the General Council in the premises have the force of law in the diocese of Alabama; and the Clergy thereof are called upon henceforth to use the prayer for those in civil authority, as it stands in the Book of Common Prayer.

RICHARD H. WILMER,
Bishop of the Diocese of Alabama.
Mobile, Ala., Jan. 13th, 1866.

The bill introduced by Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, to revive the grade of General, encounters some newspaper opposition. A severe article against it, in the Washington Republican, is attributed to General Butler, who has no love for any man who tells unpleasant truth about his own military career. It is stated by a Washington correspondent that the bill was proposed with the knowledge and concurrence of Gen. Grant; that he finds his present pay inadequate to the expense of maintaining an establishment in Washington, and keeping open house, as a man, in his position must, to a certain extent; and, moreover, that he desires to make a vacancy for the promotion of his friend, Gen. Sherman. If these representations are correct, Congress will doubtless pass the bill. MONETARY.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE,
NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, JAN. 19, 1866.

The movement in financial circles to-day has displayed a marked reduction in rates of gold and of foreign exchange.

Gold opened with increased firmness, owing to the favorable advices received from New York last night, but a reaction soon set in, and the subsequent sales were effected at prices which eventually ruled in favor of buyers. The sales for the day were effected in the following order, viz: $900, $700 and $15 000 at 140¾@141; $2000 and $3000 at 141¼; $4000, $2000 and $20 000 at 141¾@141⅝; $5000 and $10,000 at 141¾, and $400 Mexican dollars at 110.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE—The demand for sterling has been at no time much better than nominal to-day, and the movement in francs has been restricted from the opening to the close of business. Offerings were ample throughout, and the movement for the day included the following operations, viz: $7000 at 147, $2000 at 148¾, $4000 at 141, $350 and $9000 at 148¾@150, and several hundred thousand dollars in francs at prices that have not transpired.

Domestic exchange has shown no variation whatever since our last. The market was moderately supplied and the movement was of an unusually restricted character, at buoyant discount at bank for sight checks on the Northern cities and corresponding rates for short sight and for time bills.

Stocks have been in fair request since our last, with the following sales, viz: 18 shares of Bank of America at a price that has not transpired; 100 do. Mechanics' and Traders' Bank on private terms, and 10 do. Southern Bank at 112.

Uncurrent bank notes are quiet but firm. Sales today include: $400 State Bank at 72c.; $1900, $2,000, $2000 and $3000 at 73c.; $4000 Bank of New Orleans, at 89c., and $900 Merchants' Bank, at 77c. per dollar.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE,
NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, JAN. 19, 1866.

COTTON—The market opened this morning with a fair inquiry, which, however, steadily diminished as the day advanced, and the movement was restricted to 2419 bales for the day, at very irregular prices. Holders generally demanded advanced figures, in view of the upward tendency of the market for several days past, and the very heavy falling off in offerings, resulting from the recent large sales. But buyers contended that they had already anticipated movements at New York and Liverpool, and they have uniformly, this evening, refused to pay asking rates. Transactions for the day have been divided among buyers in the following order, viz: 370 bales, 350, 350, 300, 280, 200, 200, 200, 150, 150, 100, 80 and 50 bales. The market was unsettled from the opening to the close of business, but full previous figures were generally obtained, and the quotations this evening are precisely the same as those presented for several days past, viz: Ordinary 41@43c., good ordinary 45@46c., low middling 47@49c., and middling 50@51c.

SUGAR AND MOLASSES.—There is a fair supply on hand, consisting chiefly of the lower grades, while the better qualities which are mostly needed are scarce. Prices rule in favor of buyers, and the sales of to day and yesterday, not previously reported embrace about 300 hhds. sugar, at 13¾@14c. for fair, 15c. for fully fair, 15½@15¾c. for prime and 16c. ₱ lb for choice, together with some 500 bbls. molasses at 65@70c. for common, 75@85 for good to prime and 90@95c. ₱ gallon for choice.

WESTERN PRODUCE—We noticed considerable animation in this market to-day. Flour is in good request, and holders are less firm in their pretensions. Corn met with ready sale to-day, both for the local trade and for shipment. Oats exhibit a decline, while bran continues firm at previous quotations. The following particulars of the condition of our market will be found below:

FOUR—This commodity has been in good request, with sales of about 3000 bbls. at $5 75@$8 75 per bbl. for common; $7 25@$7 50 for fine, $8@$8 12½ for low superfine; $8 25 for superfine, $8 50 for choice, do., $10@10 50 for extra, and $12 00@$12 12½ ₱ bbl. for choice, do.

CORN—The transactions embrace about 8000 sacks at $1 05@1 07½ for mixed white do., yellow do., and $1 15 ₱ bushel for prime white.

OATS—We notice sales of 1800 sacks, as follows: 1000 on private terms, 600 at 52c., and 200 at 53c. ₱ bushel.

BRAN—A lot of 200 sacks changed hands at $1 70 ₱ 100 pounds.

HAY—We heard of sales of 200 bales New York at $26, and 237 bales prime Western at $30 ₱ ton.

PROVISIONS—There is a good retail demand for even weight mess pork at full prices. Bacon is in moderate request; sides are scarce; while lard is in fair supply, and commands previous rates.

PORK—Retail parcels of even weight mess readily command $35 50 for old, and $36 ₱ bbl. for new. Prime do. is selling in small parcels at $29 ₱ bbl.

BACON—Shoulders are retailing at 14@15c., ribbed sides 16c., clear do., 20c. ₱ lb. Hams are scarce, and bring 18½@20c. for plain, and 25@35c. ₱ lb for sugar cured.

LARD—Lots of 5, 10 and 15 tierces and kegs, are selling at 21c. for the former, and 22c. ₱ lb for the latter.

COFFEE—A good retail demand is carried on, at 28c. for ordinary, 29@29½c. for fair, and 30@31½c. ₱ lb for prime choice Rio. Round lots command 19c. in gold, duly paid, for fair, 19½@20c. in do., for good fair, and 20@20c ₱ lb in do. for prime.

WHISKY—The heavy arrivals of the past week have caused a decline in prices, and we now quote rectified at $2 35 ₱ gallon on retail parcels.

SUNDRIES—We quote Western butter at 30@40c.; Northern do. at 45 to 50c. ₱ lb., Northern cheese 20@23c., English dairy 24@28c. ₱ lb; full weight star candles 24@25c., short weight do. 20@21c. ₱ lb; soap 10@15c. and starch 5@13c. ₱ lb.

GUNNY BAGS—There is but little demand, a few small lots are selling at 30c. for second and 35c a piece for new.

BAGGING AND ROPE—The market is very dull, at 31@31½c. in bales, 29@29½c. ₱ yard in rolls for the former, and 18c. ₱ lb. in coils for the latter.

FREIGHTS—Owing to the abundant offerings of steamship accommodation coastwise, freight by sailing vessels cannot be reported as much better than nominal. The rate for cotton to New York by steam is ⅜c., and to Boston 1¼c. ₱ lb. Freight agents ask ½@⅝c. for cotton by sailing vessels to the above ports. The rate by steamship to Liverpool is 1d., at which the Alabama is now loading. By sailing vessels, the rate to Liverpool is rather firm at 11-16@¾d., and to Havre at 1¼c. There is no flour going forward to the North or to Europe, and we therefore omit quotations for that article, as they are only calculated to mislead parties interested.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT DECISION.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE—LIABILITY FOR CONFEDERATE MONEY.

The following report of a decision just made in the Supreme Court of Tennessee, at Nashville, will possess general interest for the people of this State and of this city:

G. R. Wright and Robert Cantrel, in Error, vs. Wesley Overall.

This is an action of debt, brought in the Circuit Court of Shelby county, to recover eight hundred dollars, due by a promissory note executed by the plaintiffs in error, to one Sampson Yergan, and by him assigned to Reuben J. Scott, and by Scott to Overall, who sues the makers alone.

The contest here arises on a receipt for three hundred dollars, executed by Overall on the ninth of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, to Wright, one of the plaintiffs in error. The payment was in what is known as "Confederate money," and the face of the receipt shows it was to be entered as a credit on the note sued on this action. The credit was not entered, and under the instructions of the Circuit Judge to the jury, there was a verdict for the full amount of the note, with interest thereon, and judgment pronounced according to the finding of the jury, from which an appeal in error is prosecuted in this court.

The Circuit Judge, among other things not excepted to, in substance told the jury, that the receipt was an undertaking on the part Overall to see that the three hundred dollars paid should be credited on the note, and inasmuch as the credit had not been entered, the undertaking was executory, and must be supported by a good or a valuable consideration; and that "Confederate money," having been issued against public policy and without the authority of law, was neither a good nor a valuable consideration.

Waiving all criticism on his Honor, the Circuit Judge's construction of the receipt, we think there is no error in the charge of which the applicants have any ground of complaint. The whole question turns upon the validity of "Confederate money," and we are not at liberty to evade it, by refining upon the distinction between executory and executed contracts. Was the "Confederate States" such a sovereign and independent political corporation or organization as authorized it to coin money, or issue its bonds or notes, on the faith, and bind the people of the so-called "Confederate States," for the payment thereof? This is the question with which we have to deal, and however much the business transactions of the people of this State may be involved in it, we have but one duty to perform, and that is, to tread the path marked out by the law.

To coin money is an act of sovereignty, and by the older authorities it is held of such vital importance to the honor of the State that it was placed among the prerogatives of majesty, and could not be delegated. The faith and credit of the State was always pledged for the genuineness of the coin, and the wisdom and policy of the ancient law would not, therefore, entrust the exercise of this right to any other hands than the reigning sovereign.

Under our form of Government the right to coin money is, by the Constitution, expressly delegated to Congress. But to exercise this right, requires the exertion of the sovereign power of the Nation. No less power than the consent of both Houses of Congress, with the approval of the President, can authorize the coining of money or the issuance of the bonds or notes of the United States, predicated on the faith and credit of the Nation.

The published Constitution of the "Confederate States," differs in nothing from our own with respect to the grant of these powers and the mode of exercising them. It purports fully to confer the power to issue bonds or treasury notes, but could that political organization lawfully exercise such power? Was it such an independent State as would authorize the exercise of sovereign powers?

It is claimed for them that they had thrown off the power and authority of the Government of the United States, and so far erected a new and independent Government as to be, at least, a Government de facto, and as such entitled to all the rights and privileges belonging to a sovereign and independent nation.

We cannot assent to this proposition. To do so, would be to settle, by judicial determination, what the Confederate States failed to achieve by arms. The very object the Confederate States had in view in the great struggle now ended in the complete triumph of the National power, was to establish a separate, independent, national existence, and failing to accomplish this object, the courts of the country can afford no relief. They are bound, as well upon principle as authority, to recognize the ancient order of things as remaining unchanged. This question is neither a new nor a doubtful one. All the authorities, both in England and America, concur in fixing its character. It is not a judicial question, but eminently a great public, political question, which must be determined by the Legislature and Executive departments of the National Government. Halleck on International Law, section 20, while speaking on this subject, says: "Until the independence of the new State is recognized by the government of which it was before a part, or by the Foreign State, when its sovereignty is drawn in question, courts of justice and private individuals are bound to consider the ancient state of things as remaining unchanged."

In the case of Rose vs. Himily, four Cranch, two hundred and fourteen, this question came directly under review, and Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court said: "The colony of St. Domingo, originally belonging to France, had broken the bond which connected her to the parent State, had declared herself independent, and was endeavoring to support that independence by arms. France still asserted her claim. A war de facto unquestionably existed between France and St. Domingo. It has been argued, that colony, having declared itself a sovereign State, and having thus far maintained its sovereignty by arms, must be considered and treated by other nations as sovereign in fact, and as being entitled to maintain the same intercourse with the world that is maintained by other belligerent nations. In support of this argument the doctrines of Vattel have been particularly referred to. But the language of that writer is obliviously addressed to sovereigns and not to courts. It is for governments to decide whether they will consider St. Domingo as an independent nation, and until such decision shall be made, or France shall relinquish her claim, courts of justice must consider the ancient state of things as remaining unaltered, and the sovereign power of France over the colony unchanged.

This question again came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hoyt vs. Gelston, 3 Wheaton, 324, when the principle settled in Rose vs. Himily was fully recognized. See also the Santissima Trinidad and the St. Auder—7 Wheaton, 285—and Kennett et al. vs. Chambers, 14 Howard, 38. And still in a later case, in the trial of the Savannah pirates, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, Mr. Justice Nelson, with whom Shipman, Judge, concurred, while delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "It is claimed that the Confederate States have thrown off the power and authority of the General Government—have a new and independent government in its place, and have maintained against the whole military and naval power of the former, that it is at least a government de facto, and entitled to all the rights and privileges that belong to a sovereign and independent nation. The right, also, constitutional or otherwise, has been strongly urged, and the law of nations, and the commentaries of eminent publicists, have been referred to as justifying the secession or revolt of these Confederate States. Great ability and research have been displayed by the learned counsel on this branch of the case. But the court do not deem it pertinent or material to enter into this wide field of inquiry. This branch of the defence involves considerations that do not belong to the courts of the country. It involves the considerations of great public political questions, which belongs to departments of our Government that have charge of our foreign relations—the legislative and executive departments—and when decided by them, the court follows their decision, and until these departments have recognized the existence of the new Government, the courts of the nation can—"

The learned Judge, after declaring that [illegible] been the uniform course of decision [illegible] of the Courts of the United [illegible] on further to say:

"[illegible] colony of South America, and the new Government, erected on separating from the mother country, were acknowledged by an act of Congress, on the recommendation of the President, in 1822. Prior to this recognition, and during the civil war between Spain and her colonies, it was the declared policy of our Government to treat both parties as belligerents, entitled equally to the rights of asylum and hospitality, and to consider them, in respect to the neutral relation and duties of our Government, as equally entitled to the sovereign rights of war as against each other. This was also the doctrine of the Courts, which they derived from the policy of the Government following the political departments of the Government, as it respects our relations with new governments, erected on the overthrow of the old. And if this is the rule of the Federal Courts, in case of a revolt and erection of a new government, as it respects foreign nations, much more is the rule applicable when the question arises in respect to a revolt, and the erection of a new government within the limits and against the authority of the government under which we are engaged in administering her laws. And in this connection, it is proper to say, as the Confederate States must first be recognized by the political department of the mother government, in order to be recognized by the courts of the country; namely, the legislative and executive departments, we must look at the acts of these departments as evidence of the fact. The act is the act of the Nation through her Constitutional public authorities.

The reason of this rule is so obvious, that it requires no comment to enforce it; and at the same time it is so fixed and determinate, that it admits of no latitude of construction. The Courts are bound to follow the action of the political departments of the Federal Government, and when they fail or refuse to recognize the existence of the new Government, the Courts can do nothing more than administer the laws as they exist under the old. Any other rule of practice would break up the harmony of the Government itself, and expose its political and judicial departments to continued conflicts. The one might recognize the "Confederate States", as a Government de facto, and the other refuse—who, in such a case, would judge between them? So, also, of the erection of a new Foreign Government, the one might recognize it as a sovereign and independent power, and the other refuse. Such a practice would involve the nation in interminable conflicts of power at home, and endless difficulties abroad. The act of recognizing the existence of a new Government, is the act of the nation itself, and the highest exercise of sovereign power, and if done by any inferior power, it could avail nothing either to the new Government or to its citizens. What advantage, if by any possibility the Courts were to recognize the Confederate States as a Government de facto, would accrue to those who once claimed to be citizens under it? Such a recognition, if it were legally possible, could only have an international operation. It could not beneficially effect individuals. "The Confederate Government" de facto, or otherwise, that enacted its laws, has ceased to exist—it has no power to enforce them—and surely it will not be contended that the Courts of the United States, States or Federal, are bound to execute the laws of an extinct, insurgent power, enacted against the policy and authority of the Government of the United States, and expressly for its overthrow. Such a principle, we apprehend, would be unprecedented, and directly operative to enable the insurgents to take advantage of their own wrong—a principle abhorrent to the laws of civilized countries, and no where to be tolerated. No rights or protection can accrue to individuals under Confederate laws. They were enacted without lawful authority, and against the policy, laws and Constitution of the United States, and the courts of the country are bound to treat them as if they had never been promulgated.

Applying these principles to the case under consideration, there can be no difficulty in determining the rights of the parties. The payment is evidenced by the receipt, having been made in "Confederate money," was utterly void. The paper itself having been issued against public policy—for an unlawful an illegal purpose, and without any authority of law of which this court can take cognizance, must not be held as worthless bank paper, issued by a legally constituted corporation, but as a paper, issued without any legal authority whatever, and therefore worthless in the payment for property or pre-existing debts.

This principle has been sanctioned by this court in the case of forged or counterfeit paper. In the case of Wan vs. Street & Co., two Head, six hundred and nine, the court said: "A payment of genuine bank notes, supposed by both parties to be good, though in fact worthless, will be binding, and the loss must fall on the receiver, in the absence of fraud. It is otherwise if the notes be not genuine—not what they purport to be. So a payment in forged paper would be void and have no effect as a credit or payment for property or pre-existing debts."

Much more must this principle be applicable when the notes purporting to be money, were issued against public policy as well as the laws and Constitution of the United States, and expressly for their overthrow.

But we do not say that a case might arise, involving Confederate money as the basis of an executed contract, where the rights of the parties were vested, which the courts, for the repose of society, would not disturb. In this case, the credit was not entered, and that the application of the principle is without embarrassment.

Affirm the judgment.

MILLIGAN, Judge.

ALABAMA.

From the Montgomery Advertiser of the 9th we extract the following:

A gentleman from New York, who came down the road yesterday, reports that at Opelika a negro girl, some sixteen or seventeen years old, came in with her ears cut off close to her head, and alleged that it was done by a man in United States uniform, because she would not let him do violence to her person. No notice had been taken of the outrage by the military authorities. Such inhumanities should be ferreted out and the guilty parties punished severely, whoever they may be. Where the civil authority has not power to act, the military certainly has, and we trust between the two, no acts of the kind will be allowed to disgrace the community.

Mrs. Susanna C. Clay, wife of Gov. C. C. Clay, Sr., died in Huntsville on the 2d inst., at an advanced age.

The Huntsville Advocate states that all the liquor stores in that place were closed during Christmas week, and not the slightest disorder prevailed.

The negroes of Huntsville had a large parade on the 1st instant, in commemoration of the anniversary of their emancipation.

Two soldiers, confined in the Military Prison in Montgomery, made their escape on Sunday night. They belonged to the 58th Illinois, and are said to be desperate characters.

Concerning the withdrawal of the troops from Alabama, the Montgomery Mail of the 14th inst. says:

Gov. Patton returned to the Capitol a day or two since, and from him we learn that the United States soldiers will certainly be withdrawn from the State as soon as the militia is properly organized. The Governor has made a requisition for arms and ammunition, approved and recommended by Gen. Thomas, and he feels assured that the requisition will be promptly filled. Gen. Watson, Adjutant and Inspector General of the State, is hard at work in the matter of organization, and we trust his efforts will be met with a proper and prompt response from all portions of our State. * * * *

He informs us that there is now about one hundred companies of militia partially organized in the State. The General also informs us that as soon as the organization is perfected, the necessary arms and ammunition will be distributed. * * * *

We have heard of the formation of no militia companies for this county as yet, though we learn that Gen. Holtzclaw, who has received the appointment of commandant of the militia, is endeavoring to effect an organization. We would suggest that a regiment might be formed for the city and county; and our old city volunteer companies be revived and reorganized. We are assured that the necessary arms and equipments would be furnished.

CARE FOR THE POOR.—The Mail is pleased to learn that Gov. Patton is making ample provision for the maintenance of the destitute and needy of the State. In this laudable and very important matter, our worthy Governor should have the support and [illegible] of the people.

MISSISSIPPI.

The small-pox, says the Meridian Messenger of the 9th, is doing its work of death here among the freedmen. We heard of several burials day before yesterday. The only sanitary preparation to stay the pestilence that we hear of, is the building of a pest-house out about a mile and a half. That is now in course of erection, but how long before it is finished, we are not advised. In the meantime, negroes will come and go, and we may expect it to be disseminated far and near, and to grow more and more in intensity until it dies out for want of subjects.

It is no longer a secret, says the Clarion, that our able Senators are remaining in Washington City at the earnest solicitation of the President, who is desirous of seeing the Southern States once more represented in the halls of Congress. Judge Sharkey would have returned home long since, but for the assurance of the President that he would be admitted, and his earnest desire to have his assistance in his efforts to do justice to the Southern people.

HORRIBLE ACCIDENT.—Friday evening a most horrible accident occurred to Miss Frances Carpenter, daughter of our fellow-citizen, N. L. Carpenter, Esq., a most estimable and accomplished young lady, about sixteen years of age.

Visiting at the house of a young friend, her clothes took fire, while sitting near the grate. A young lady in the room immediately threw around her a coverlid, but this being dashed aside by Miss Carpenter in her fright, and running into the hall, every article of clothing on her was consumed. She lingered until Sunday morning at one o'clock, when death released her.

A sad and heart-rending record to make of one so lovely. Her talents were of the first order. Her loss would have been hard to bear, even from sickness, but the horrible manner of her end—"burned to death"—is terrible.—Natchez Courier, 9th.

GEN. FORREST COLLARS AND PRESENTS A PISTOL AT A U. S. OFFICER.—We have just learned some of the particulars of an interesting incident that occurred yesterday morning on one of the cars on the M. & O. Railroad. There were Federal officers in the car, one of whom was spread out upon two seats. Gen. Forrest accompanied by Mrs. Lyttle, who was going down to Okalona after the remains of her husband, Gen. Lyttle, entered the car, which was somewhat crowded. The General went up to the officer and very politely requested him to allow the lady a seat. The officer replied that he did not know whether he would or not. Gen. Forrest then said he knew he would, and said some hard words, whereupon the officer reached for his sword, but the General was too quick for him, catching him by the collar and presenting a "Colt," persuaded him to step out of the car. If we have been correctly informed, the officer was very much at fault, and his conduct was heartily condemned by the Federals who were with him in the car.—Corinth Enquirer.

STILL MAKING CONTRACTS.—Quite a number of contracts were entered into this week between freedmen and the landed proprietors of Marshall county. If all the freedmen in the county were now employed on the farms, not one half of the open land could be cultivated. Thousands of acres of land in the Empire county cannot be cultivated the present year for the want of labor, as several thousand of our best field-hands left during the war, and but few have returned. We hope that every land proprietor will make arrangements, by the end of the present year, to procure labor sufficient to cultivate every acre of cleared land in the county and State. Nature has given us a country unsurpassed in fertility, and although desolation and ruin are now spread broadcast over our beloved South, yet in a few years, by economy and industry, we may be again restored to a prosperity never dreamed of by the most sanguine. Cotton, although dethroned as king, is wealth, and we have the soil and climate to successfully compete with the world, in its product; and if we raise the cotton bales, wealth will again flow to our coffers.—Holly Springs Reporter.

The Holly Springs Reporter learns that—

J. L. Craig, a respectable and worthy young man, about twenty-three years of age, was accidentally killed by a fall from his horse on Monday evening last. Mr. Craig's parents reside near Tyro, in this county, and he was on his way home, and about one mile from this place, when the fatal accident occurred.

From the Carroll Conservative, 13th inst., we extract:

The freedmen are pretty well all hired out in this county. They received good wages, almost universally, and we see no reason why as large a cotton crop as ever, with the same amount of hands cannot be raised this year. The negro is a trifling institution in Hayti, but Hayti is a debilitating climate. Perhaps we will find it not so much in the freedom of the negro, after all, as in the latitude. We said that the Anglo Saxon blood could never be conquered. History never gave such an instance. But we were conquered! it is very unsafe to reason from analogy.

There were three hundred and fifty negroes apprenticed in Carroll county the last Probate Court. Can any county in the State beat that? We are very careful of the welfare of "indigent minors" here!

The question to freedmen, heretofore in vogue, "who do you belong to?" is out of date. It now goes, "who are you apprenticed to?"

In reference to the cotton stealing going on, his Honor stated that it was becoming a "stench in the nostrils"—if the police did not stop it, they could not expect to be thought honest. The negroes gathered in large throngs along the wharves, acting, doubtless, under the impression that the larger the crowd the greater the facilities for stealing. These illegal assemblages must be broken up.

In connection with this cotton matter, the Mayor also stated that in addition to the illegal cotton stealing, there was also a great deal of "legal" stealing. This latter is done by the agents of the planters, the weighers, the samplers, etc. It must be stopped, and the police must stop it.—Times, 12th.

IMPORTANT PROCLAMATION.

The following proclamation we find in the Jackson (Miss.) Standard of yesterday. It is of the greatest importance, as many of our citizens are interested therein:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, JACKSON, MISS.

To all whom it may concern—Greeting:

Whereas section 6 of an act of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, entitled "An act authorizing the issuance of Treasury notes as advance upon cotton," approved Dec. 19, 1861, provides "that whenever the present blockade of the ports of the Confederate States shall be removed—which shall be determined by the proclamation of the Governor declaring the fact—the Governor shall, by said proclamation, require all persons to whom advances may have been made, to deliver the number of bales of cotton upon which they have received an advance, in accordance with their respective receipts, within ninety days from the date of said proclamation."

Now, therefore, I, Benjamin G. Humphreys, Governor of the State of Mississippi, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the constitution and laws of said State, do hereby proclaim that the blockade of the ports of the Confederate States has been removed. And I do require all persons to whom advances may have been made to deliver the number of bales of cotton upon which they have received an advance, in accordance with their respective receipts on file in the Auditor's Office, within ninety days from the date of this proclamation.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the Great Seal of the State of Mississippi, to be hereunto affixed.

Witness my hand, this 8th day of January, 1866.

By the Governor:

BENJ. G. HUMPHREYS.

C. A. Brougher, Secretary of State.

☞ A frequent cause of dispute between the United States and Prussia, arising out of claims of military service from our naturalized citizens returning home on business or visits to friends, has been partially removed. Hitherto, a ten years' absence deprived a Prussian of his rights as a Prussian subject, without relieving him from his duties as one. The Government has now decreed that the duties shall cease with the rights; so that an emigrant returning home after ten years' absence, will be secure against claims for military service.

LOUISIANA.

The Felicjana (Bayou Sara) Ledger of the 13th instant contains:

In these parts we hear of several of our citizens going into the moss business pretty heavily. The yield is very good, and it is being principally picked from the trees cut for cord wood. In one instance, with five hands, one of the parties within a month's time has gathered, baled and delivered 28,000 pounds of green moss, at three cents per pound, on the bank of the river.

This, we should think, is a pretty fair price, such as will fully justify the experiment—at least the figures look that way.

The river still continues to rise at this point. During the past ten days it has risen about fifteen feet, and is still rising at an average of about six inches in twenty-four hours. The first few days of the rise it came up to the rate of about two feet and a half every twenty-four hours.

We learn from a late date of the Iberville South, that the patrol guard were fired upon near Plaquemine by an armed gang of negroes. They were charged upon and taken. Their shots were not effective, as none of the party were hurt. The negroes are safely lodged in the prison to await their trial.

Our citizens, says the Iberville South, are doing but little in the way of contracting thus far. Their employees, during the past year, show little disposition to comply with Gen. Baird's orders, or the planters' wish. Many of these "intelligent contrabands" have a few dollars from last year's labor, and as long as this lasts there is little care for the morrow with them—they live in the full enjoyment of their idea of freedom, and care for no more.

Many favorite servants feel they acted badly in leaving their old masters as they did, and feel backward about returning; many, very many, were driven away, and all have been induced, in ways too well known to us all, to regard their old owners with suspicion, if not downright aversion, notwithstanding the self-evident fact, despite "present prejudices," that these are their best friends.

With labor in its present state of "confusion worse confounded" there is indeed but a discouraging prospect before us. However, let us not hesitate to take things as we find them and keep moving.

The Baton Rouge Advocate, of the 12th inst., says:

Our merchants yesterday had a big run on their stores for trunks, valises, pocket-books and pistols, these articles being those most coveted by the paid off soldiers. We presume Sambo considers these things as important in an agricultural point of view, hence the activity in the market yesterday.

It is rumored that this post will be broken up and a garrison of the 2d Regulars be stationed in the Government grounds. The town will then resume its wonted quiet appearance. Many of the white troops that have been disbanded intend remaining with us and will become useful and active citizens.

From the Shreveport South-Western, 10th inst., we clip:

The receipts of cotton from the interior are again on the increase, though nothing like what they were one month ago. The receipts by the river, from points above here, are decidedly on the increase. Most of it, however, is for reshipment. The best article of middling cotton still brings 27c. in specie. Business with our leading merchants is again improving, and as soon as the weather settles and the roads improve, we look for the resumption of our former healthy trade.

The river at this point is still rising slowly. The last boat up reports four feet in the channel to the falls. Reports from above the raft are rather conflicting; some say the river has risen eight, and others say it has risen fifteen feet at Dooly's Ferry, but all agree that it is again falling fast. Four or five small packets are making irregular trips to Jefferson. Freight on cotton to the city is $5 per bale; passage $40. Up freights were brought here at $3 and $4 per barrel by all the regular packets, except the Magnolia Hays of the Texas line, which, in some instances, charged and collected $1 and $5 per barrel. This excess, we learn, was refunded in some instances, where there was a probability of killing the goose that laid the golden egg. This exorbitant charge on up freight certainly cannot hold out much longer on the present stage of water. The following boats have arrived since our last: Cuba, Enterprise, Fleta, Lizzie Tate, Maggie Hays and M. E. Allen. The Gossamer has gone above the raft.

We learn that the following prominent citizens of DeSoto parish have been arrested by the military authorities, and are now confined in the military prison at this place, charged with being accessory to the murder of a freedwoman, committed on the 20th of November last, on the plantation of Mr. Edwards, of DeSoto parish: A. Conway, L. Tompkies, J. S. Means, Dr. Horn, J. Laffit, and H. Poyer. The order for their arrest emanated from Major Gen. A. J. Smith, District Commander. They will, in all probability, be tried by a military commission.

The steamer Huntress, hence for New Orleans, with a cargo of cotton, struck the rocks on the lower falls at Alexandria and sunk. The boat will prove a total loss, but most of the cotton was saved. No lives lost. The rumors on the street that she was fired into by the soldiers and that the pilot deserted the wheel, are without foundation.

Col. Giles Boggess and Capt. Milton Boggess were both severely, if not mortally, wounded by Mr. Joseph Cox, yesterday evening, in the gambling saloon over the Palace Coffee-house. The parties fell out about some point in the game which they were playing, and angry words passed between them, which culminated in Mr. Cox drawing his bowie-knife and inflicting on them several severe wounds. Cox was arrested.

The streets of Shreveport are again to be lighted by gas.

The 8th Illinois arrived lately at Shreveport, but found orders from Gen. Canby to be mustered out of service.

Orders have also been received to muster out the cavalry force on duty at that post. This will leave only the 80th United States Colored Infantry on duty there.

We are pleased to notice a constantly growing content on the part of the freedmen in this section of the country. Large numbers of them have already made contracts for the present year, and the balance, with rare exceptions, are seeking homes in which they may make themselves "useful as well as ornamental."—Greensburg (La.) Journal.

A SINGULAR CASE.—About fifty-five years ago, a young gentleman and lady formed an association as young people often do, and it was supposed by their friends that it would terminate in matrimony. But for some reason, best known to the parties, the association was dissolved, and they separated. The young man subsequently married and lost three wives, the last one within the last eight or nine months. The young lady married, and lived with her husband over fifty-three years, and raised a numerous family. During the last year her husband died. The lady remained a widow about eleven months, when her former suitor made an advance to her, he being about 75 years old and the lady 71, and they were married. The parties are living in the vicinity of Lynn Post-office, Susquehanna county, Pennsylvania, and the gentleman gave his consent to the publication of this notice.—Montrose Republican.

DEATH OF GEN. TRAPIER.—The Charleston papers announce the sudden death of Brig. Gen. W. H. Trapier, of the late Confederate army. Gen. Trapier was a graduate of South Carolina College, and afterward entered West Point. He was in the same class with Gen. Beauregard, and graduated with high honor. After leaving West Point he served in the United States army fourteen years, and was promoted to the rank of Captain of Engineers. On his resignation he returned home to take charge of his estate, near Georgetown, and became a very successful planter. At the breaking out of the war he received the State appointment of Chief of Ordnance, and afterward took charge of the defences of Charleston. After the bombardment of Fort Sumter, he accepted the office of Major of Engineers in the Confederate service. He was subsequently promoted to the rank of a Brigadier General in the Confederate service, and ordered to Florida, afterward to Gen. Johnston's army in Mississippi, and finally was placed in command at Georgetown, South Carolina, which post he retained till the close of the war.

A CAUTION TO PLANTERS.

From the January number of the Richmond Farmer, a new agricultural magazine, we learn that a great deal of unsound cotton seed is now in the market, and planters are warned to be upon their guard against purchasing it. The ruin of numbers of our agriculturists may possibly be effected by the use of bad seed. If extra precautions are not taken, and we therefore counsel a thorough test of all seed before planting. The following method for determining the proportion of sound and unsound grains in a parcel of seeds is offered: Count, say, one hundred or one thousand seeds, place them in a vessel in rich earth, moisten the earth with warm water, place the vessel in a warm place night and morning, and during the day in the sun, South aspect and beside a wall, so that the rays of the sun may be reflected on the seed, and all the sound ones will be up in a few days, so that the amount of rotton seed can be determined. This matter is of too serious consequence to be negligently dealt with.

LETTER FROM JOHN MITCHELL.

The New York Daily News, of the 3d inst., publishes a Paris letter from John Mitchell, dated 13th ultimo. He treats upon the apprehensions of war with the United States, and other topics that possess some interest at this time. There is nothing of a sensational character in the letter. We copy the first paragraph:

The most interesting study at this moment, to those who have the key to it, is the uneasy eagerness with which the organs of public opinion in France and in England seize upon every indication coming from the United States, which may help them to guess what and against whom will be the next American war. For that there is to be a great and furious American war against some power or powers, they seem to admit no doubt. Is the blow destined for England, or for France? And upon what ground or pretext? Every newspaper in Paris has just been canvassing General Schofield and his mission, or no mission. That officer's highly elevated station the other day at the American dinner, soaring aloft on the pinions of the well known venerable bird you wot of, and ending with a toast to the "ancient friendship of France and the United States," has seemed to some simple Parisian journals (not habituated to the flights of our bird), a very pleasing assurance that the United States Government has no designs, or even wishes, on the subject of Mexico.

THE INDUCEMENTS LOUISIANA OFFERS.

There is not a doubt, as we have frequently had occasion to remark, that the inducements offered to emigrants to settle in Louisiana are unsurpassed (if equalled) by those in any other section of the world. Still, there is nothing like facts and figures to convince people, and we, therefore, extract the following positive proof from the columns of our very valuable cotemporary, the Franklin Planters' Banner, of the 6th inst. We hope our exchanges in the North, in the crowded sections of the country, will republish the statement:

PROFITS OF LABOR.—Two white men on the Mississippi, in this State, above New Orleans, by their own labor last year made seven hogshead of sugar, eight barrels of molasses, one hundred and forty carrots of superior Perique tobacco, (four pounds to the carrot, 550 pounds,) eight hundred barrels of corn, besides sweet potatoes, peas, pumpkins, etc., in abundance. The aggregate value of these products may be put down thus:

7 hhds. sugar, 1100 lbs. nett, 7700 lbs., at 15 cts.,	$1155
140 carrols best Perique tobacco, at $10 per carrot,	1400
8 bbls. molasses, 40 gallons, 320 gallons, at 75c.,	240
800 bbls. corn, at $1 50 per bbl.,	1200
Total,	$3995

This gives to each hand $1997 50, besides a supply of potatoes, pumpkins and peas. This crop was raised on land that has been cultivated over a hundred years without manure. This may seem marvellous to those who cultivate the barren hills of New England, and those of the West who obtain but moderate returns for the toils of the year. But such is the character of our sugar lands of Louisiana, and if industrious white men were to come to this State from the North and from Europe, and cultivate these lands with half the industry and economy they use in higher latitudes, in a few years they could become independent, and be able to purchase lands and own homes in this country. As to health, this is a much more healthy country than the State of Illinois or Indiana.

TEXAS.

The Tyler Reporter gives us an account of the following bold robbery, which certainly shows a very supreme contempt for all law in the neighborhood of Van Zandt county. It says:

One of our citizens, the Rev. B. Carter, started his wagon and team, a few days since, in charge of a negro boy, to Mr. Coltharp's mill in Van Zandt county. Near Hamburg, in that county, five white men, on horseback, attacked the negro, and drove him from the wagon. One of the robbers then mounted and drove the wagon some distance from the road into the woods, where the mules, six in number, were cut out and driven away. Let the citizens quietly organize themselves and always be ready to pursue such miscreants and bring them to justice.

In speaking of a mail route, the Reporter says:

We understand that Messrs. Sawyer & Co. will open a stage communication between this place and Marshall in a few days. The line will extend from the latter place to Crockett, via this place. We feel much gratified at the prospect of being placed in communication with the outer world.

The following statistics of Texas agriculture will be interesting:

Acres under cultivation	2,650,780
Acres uncultivated	22,133,247
Cotton, bales on hand	431,463
Corn, bushels on hand	16,509,802
Sweet potatoes, bushels on hand	1,129,759
Live stock, value	$42,825,447

At the election for delegates to the Constitutional Convention of Texas, which took place on the 8th inst., about half of the registered voters voted. In Galveston, Messrs. H. Stuart and A. P. McCormick were elected delegates vice Jesse Stancel and M. S. Munson.

Although a resident of the South for many years, says the Indianola (Texas) Times, we have never yet seen so many lugubrious faces among the colored population during the Christmas holidays as we have met with the past week. The colored troops appeared to enjoy themselves finely, thanks to the watchful care of their vigilant officers; but the citizen freedmen, we think, were not in the aggregate so fortunate. Our door has been besieged almost daily with shivering applicants for shelter, some with families, others without; and to the question why they had left the comfortable firesides provided them by their old masters, few could give a definite reply. Many lamented their folly, and seemed to express by their dejected countenances, "What shall we eat and drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed?"

We are highly pleased, says the Jimplecute of 2d last., to be able to record the fact that this class (freedmen) of our population have nearly all entered into contracts, found employment and gone to work. Many of them refused to be employed in town, choosing, rather to go on the plantations to farm. This was unexpected to nearly every person, as their conduct had led to the belief that but few of them would work. The farming interest under the new system is now to be fully tested, and if it prove successful, cannot fail to make Texas the leading State of the Union in agriculture, and soon place her on a level of all in every other respect. The freedmen have welcomely deceived us this time, and we earnestly hope that their conduct and industry may be such as to astonish us again.

A NOVEL SHIP CANAL.

From the Chicago Times.

The question of transit between the lakes and the seaboard is becoming a paramount one; and is, therefore, receiving universal attention. The favorite plan, in the Northwest, is that of a ship canal around Niagara falls; and in the discussion which this project has involved, there have been endless plans by which the proposed transit line may become practicable.

The oldest and simplest idea, with reference to this matter, is the construction of an ordinary canal which ascends and descends heights by the well known system of locks. The next plan most prominently suggested is a ship railway around the falls. The last named method proposes to build a railway and draw over it immense cars filled with sufficient water to float vessels.

A third plan is now being discussed, which is a sort of blending of some of the main features of both the others. The salient characteristics of this plan appear in the following, taken from a report of a committee made Jan. 3, to the Detroit Board of Trade:

"The invention contemplates such a system of canal structure that no locks are required, and commerce is conducted without passing water from one level to another, as ordinarily in canal navigation, thus lessening the first cost of construction, and adapting them to any desirable depth of water and profitable navigation. In passing ships around Niagara falls, where the system seems applicable, a canal is built 100 feet wide, and of such depth as to pass vessels drawing 14 feet, beginning at Schlosser, about three miles above the cataract, extending a distance of six miles to the brow of the hill at Lewiston, where ships are raised out of the canal into iron tanks filled with water, in which, while floating, they are passed on inclined planes, so constructed that one vessel ascends as the other descends, from the level of the water above the falls to that of Lake Ontario in a few minutes, and with entire safety to ship and cargo. The operation is very simple, and in the judgment of your committee entirely feasible."

Some of the practical details of this novel plan were presented to the Board, by H. H. Day, the inventor, as follows:

"I propose to bring the canal from Lake Erie, beginning about three miles above the falls, by almost a straight line to the brow of the hill at Lewiston, and there build an inclined plane descending about 130 feet to the mile. The locks are made of iron and wood, and are passed up the inclined plane upon rollers fixed upon the plane. Upon the bottom of the locks rails are fastened, so that no friction or derangement shall occur on the bearings. There are two inclined planes side by side, and at the upper end is a large drum, around which a wire cable passes, being attached to the two moveable locks. As one starts down the plane the other starts up, and they meet half way in passing. In practical use the descending lock will require only a little more water than the ascending one, in order to overcome the friction and draw it up. Two ships can thus be passed—one up and the other down—overcoming an elevation of 320 feet in half an hour."

There is not, in our view, any mechanical objections to the entire success of this project. Its chief merit is its economy, as it avoids the construction of a system of locks.

The remarks of Mr. Day to the Detroit Board of Trade, show him to be a thoroughly practical man. Would it not be well for our Chicago Chamber of Commerce to secure from him an appearance and an explanation of his plan?

EXTRAORDINARY INNOVATION.

The Journal of Debats, a leading newspaper of Paris, and organ of the Government, says that seven hundred Jews in that city had agreed to transfer the celebration of the Sabbath from Saturday to Sunday, and that this shows the tendency of the Jews to assimilation with the Christians in religious rites. We are not ready to believe this implicitly, though we know not why both sects might not worship on the same day, the Jews calling it the seventh, the Christians the first day of the week. The authority of the Jews for worshipping on the seventh day is found in the accounts of the Creation in Genesis, and in the Ten Commandments in Exodus and Deuteronomy. The authority of the Christians for worshipping on the first, the day of the Resurrection, is found in the practice of the Apostles and primitive Christians, mentioned by the early Fathers.

But the Jews were not the only ancient people who worshipped on the seventh day, the custom being common among the Egyptians, Assyrians, Arabians, Hindoos, and even Greeks. The Greek poets, Homer, Hesiod and Linus, severally mention the seventh as the sacred day. These nations could not have borrowed the custom from the Jews, who were unknown as a community till the flight of Jacob's family from famine into Egypt. Besides, the Jews being contemned and hated by all Heathen nations, could not have furnished them with any important custom. How, then, came this custom of consecrating one day in seven to religion, rest and recreation, common among all heathen nations? The custom has what may be called a natural foundation. All these nations, with their multiplicity of divinities, worshipped the sun, moon, and other visible planets. The moon, performing its revolution round the earth in twenty-eight days, presents four distinct phases, each commencing on the seventh day from the last; the new moon, whether the invisible or the first visible, the first quarter, or the first half moon, the full moon, and the last quarter or second half moon. These phases constitute a natural division of time, and consequently serve for a natural almanac; and as the heathens placed everything in nature under the superintendence of a divinity, they would not omit the practice with these phases of the moon; and as all mankind are disposed to rest, recreation and thanks at stated periods, the Heathens would very naturally dedicate to such purposes the days marked by these phases.

Here, then, is natural authority for a Sabbath on some day of the week. Nor does this conflict with the accounts in the Old Testament; for while the Heathen is left to consecrate a day by observing a natural phenomenon, the Jew is not forbidden to do this, but is furnished with additional reasons for consecrating such day. Thus the Jews are not only left to observe a natural division of a natural or lunar month into weeks, but are told that creation was completed on the seventh division of a week, and that on the same division they were conducted safely out of Egypt.

But which is the first and which is the seventh day of the week? Neither nature nor the Bible tell us. If we call the day of dark and invisible moon the first day, the day preceding the first quarter will be the seventh, and the day of the first quarter the first day. If we call that of first visible new moon the first day, the day of the first quarter will be seventh. So Christians and Jews may worship on the same day, the first calling it first day, the second seventh day, and both be right; the real number of the Sabbath day in the week depending entirely upon the time for commencing the enumeration. But Christians keep the first day, because it was the day of the resurrection. Had not only did the apostles consecrate the first day because it was the day of the resurrection, but most of the primitive Christians, who were converts from Heathenism, had an additional reason for worshipping on that day, in the Heathen Sabbath, if the term may be used, the first day which had been their day of weekly worship before their conversion. When Constantine made Christianity the religion of the State, he ordered the inhabitants of the cities to worship on the first day of the week, or Sunday, the day dedicated by Heathenism to the sun. But he did not include the inhabitants of villages, called in Latin, Pagani, or villagers, from Pagus, a village. And hence, Christians learned to call people of all other religions Pagans. Our names for the week are of Saxon origin, the ancient Scandinavian Heathens having dedicated each day to one of their gods and goddesses; and hence we have Sun day, Moon day, Tuisco's day, Thor's day, Frigg's day, Saturn's day.

"ALAS, MASTER! FOR IT WAS BORROWED."

The regret here expressed by the young prophet for the loss of the axe, arose, it would seem, mainly from the fact that it was "borrowed," and Elisha seemed to feel that it was a sufficient reason for working a miracle to recover it. The swimming of the axe was a miracle. True, iron will swim whenever it covers a larger surface of water than it has specific gravity to displace; but a piece of iron of the shape of an axe will not swim without the intervention of miraculous power.

The young man's regret and the prophet's miracle, taken together, seem to constitute a clear recognition of the sacredness of borrowed property. "All Scripture is profitable," and though this brief history may appear to be but an incidental teaching, it is a lesson of sufficient importance to justify its consideration.

The importance of this lesson will be more apparent when we consider the lamentable laxness of the notions of many in regard to the right of property in borrowed articles.—"The borrowed horse rides freely," is a proverb. The proverb has grown out of the fact. Certain articles, it would be the theory of some, may be borrowed, used, and then appropriated as their own; for example; a book, a newspaper, or an umbrella. "Other some" show their laxness of theory on this subject, by their practice of using borrowed articles more carelessly and roughly than they do those that belong to them.

Some may regard this as among the minor morals, and too nice; but the young prophet, who regretted the loss of the axe, because it was "borrowed," and Elisha, who thought the miracle to recover and restore it, did not so regard the subject. We are taught by the highest authority, "That he who shall break one of these least commandments and shall teach men so, shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven." And that "Love worketh no ill to our neighbor."

To take a somewhat deeper and broader view, we may say that all our endowments, whether of talents or opportunities, have been loaned us, and should be regarded as borrowed, to be carefully used, and in due time returned. This view should inspire a profounder sense of obligation. If our endowments were our own, in the sense that we have created, purchased, or in any other way merited them, we possibly might be excused for caring less about improving them; but as they have been loaned us, and loaned with the intent to be improved, we can not innocently excuse ourselves from the obligation. We must not hide our light under a bushel, for God has kindled and imparted the same. We must not conceal the talent in a napkin, for it is the Master's talent. We must occupy until he comes, or else certainly expect to be called "wicked and slothful servants." We may not innocently pervert, or selfishly appropriate, any of the gifts God has loaned us—health, wealth, time or intellect—to merely selfish and material ends, to the neglect of the claims of God, society and the deathless soul.

The great fact that God has loaned us so much, and that too when we have been so undeserving, should inspire the liveliest emotions of gratitude. Our hearts should sing with him: "We will sing of the mercies of the Lord forever." "Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits." "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits."

If the gifts and endowments God has loaned have been perverted or employed, we should feel all the unworthy and guilty. It can be an innocent thing to destroy or waste our own; and it must be more blameworthy and sinful to waste and destroy another's. When time has been wasted—a day, a month, a year—we should, on reviewing the loss, exclaim, "Alas! it was borrowed." When wealth has been wasted in needless luxury and display, while so many interests are protested, and have claimed a share, we should, in considering the loss, exclaim all the more than loss, exclaim all the more compunctiously, "Alas! it was borrowed"—I have wasted another's goods in riotous living.—The noble gifts of reason, imagination or eloquence, which God has loaned us, have been perverted from the excellent uses He designed, and have been made curses rather than blessings, we should say, in solemn contrition of the fact: "Alas! my gifts were borrowed—they were another's property, and he has claims upon their use." So of each neglected influence and slighted opportunity: "Alas! it was borrowed!"

Alas! when we waste God's time we have no prophet to recover and restore the borrowed but

IMMORTALITY.

It is only on the hypothesis of immortality, that the grand march of sympathy, that has moved from heaven to earth, can be accounted for. Look at man as a mortal, whose existence and history are confined to earth, and terminated by death, and he is but a worm of the dust. If man has not an immortal part that shall survive the dissolution of the body, then there are many objects in material nature that seem far more worthy of heaven's solicitude and care.

That majestic oak, whose green branches are waving in the breezes of two hundred summers, has seen six generations of our short-lived race live and die, and still it blooms with unfading freshness and beauty.

That lofty mountain, calmly reposing on its granite base, and blending its snow-capped summit with the clouds, has defied the earthquake's tread, the desolating wing of the tempest, and the flames of "heaven's red artillery," has seen a hundred generations of men act over their brief and troubled parts and pass down to the grave, yet there stands firm, the same that it was fifty centuries ago.

The wide and stormy ocean has rolled unchanged by Time, or Art, ever since the tide of time began to roll. The rise and the ruin of empires, the glory and the decay of system after system of philosophy and religion, have made no mark of change upon the broad face of that sublime monument of God's immortality.

The glorious orb of day, shining in the greatness of its strength, has been shining with undimmed splendor ever since the morning stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy over the glories of the new created universe. But the frail and perishing generations of men have been crowding each other from the stage, and we that now live, so full of activity and hope, must soon follow them to the silent house of all the living.

Man viewed merely as a material organism, without moral or immortal relations, whose hopes and history terminate with the grave, is a much less interesting and impressive object than many of the grand materialities by which he is surrounded.

The anxious mind inquires with the deepest solicitude—Is man only a child of dust—an heir of death? Is death really an eternal sleep? Is the light and fire of every bright hope and ardent aspiration to be quenched in the grave? Does knowledge cease? Does love grow cold and friendship expire in the grave? Why then do I live? Why do I love existence, if I am only born to die?

If man lives not beyond the grave, then existence, with its present conditions, is a mystery, a mockery and a curse; for human life, under its its happiest auspices, is a scene of mingled care, disappointment and bereavement, that must at last be terminated with death.

Such are the sad reflections that must disturb the thoughtful mind unblest with the light and comfort of the Inspired Word. God be praised, the full orbed Sun of Inspiration has risen upon the darkness of nature, and brought life and immortality to light. Now we see that man is "but a little lower than the angels," and that he is invested with a spiritual and imperishable greatness that surpasses all material and temporal things, and tells why he has been the object of so many glorious ministrations of Providence and grace. W.

The Publishing House—The Nashville Gazette, noticing the dismissal of the civil suit against our Publishing House, says:

"The remarkable suit, commenced over three years since, to confiscate a portion of the property of the Southern Methodist Publishing House, by the United States District Attorney, was yesterday dismissed by the Government.

The remarks which Judge Trigg took occasion to make on the subject were, we understand, very favorable to the institution, and showed very clearly that if the suit had not been dismissed, it would have been decided against the Government.—He was understood to say, in so many words, that he could not see any reason why the property was seized in the first place. It is indeed a most remarkable instance of the freaks of the law."

The Philadelphia Presbytery has adopted a resolution denouncing the publication of Sunday newspapers as a desecration of the Sabbath and urge Christians not to read them.

LETTER FROM DR. SUMMERS.

THE POPULAR RELIGION.

Mr. Editor—It is not true, as some people assert, that God has abandoned this country, North or South. He has not done so. But we are not surprised at the question, "Is the Lord among us or not?" Verily, one is tempted to fear that we are a "God-forsaken" people.

There is one development of the times which is painfully suggestive: the religion of the country has been weighed in the balances, and found wanting. For a long time I have entertained serious apprehensions that the popular religion was very defective. It did not approve its genuineness by duly developing the domestic virtues, political integrity, commercial probity, and the like. It was deficient in enlightened zeal, in stability, in liberality, in self-denial, in consecration, in devotional sentiments and habits. Thousands and thousands of children were permitted to grow up without a knowledge of the catechism; and not a few of their parents are unable to recite the Creed, the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments—the three great exponents of theoretical, experimental and practical Christianity. Religion has been viewed as a kind of parenthetical affair—to be taken up at intervals. "Getting religion" has consisted in going through a set of set of formal exercises, principally of an emotional character—while there has not been a thorough, uncompromising subjugation of the heart, and consecration of the life to God. "These have no root, which for a while believe, and in time of temptation fall away." The trial has come, and the test has proved too severe. The popular religion has shown its character during the past four years. It has sanctioned—at least it has not prevented the grossest outrages upon all the principles which the Scriptures hold sacred, and all those interests which it is the province of religion to conserve. Violence, carnage, robbery, oppression, fraud, sacrilege, licentiousness, intemperance, have deluged our land as they have deluged the world before the flood. Professing Christians receive bribes, pocket the proceeds of fraudulent transactions, make themselves rich at the public expense, extort, in every sense of the word. Of course, the support of the institutions of the church is considered a matter of secondary importance, or of no importance at all. Ministers are allowed to starve, or eke out a subsistence by some secular pursuit. Ecclesiastical edifices are permitted to fall into decay. Educational institutions are left to languish and expire. "The ways of Zion do mourn, because none," or very few, "come to her solemn feasts," at least, with constancy and devotion.

Perhaps the most ominous signs of the times are those exhibited by ecclesiastical bodies, which set the example of violence, fraud and calumny, and which, if they were not "withheld," would soon reproduce, in a somewhat different mode, perhaps, the persecutions of past ages and other climes. All this is done, too, "for the greater glory of God."

Is it any wonder that profanity, infidelity and immorality inundate our unhappy land? "For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles," through such hypocrites, "which they say are Jews, and are not, but do lie." I write more in grief than in anger, though tempted to say with Jonah, "I do well to be angry."

O for a thousand Johns, to go through the country—North, South, East, West—"in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just—to make ready a people prepared for the Lord!" Conventions, Conferences, unions, separations—machinery will not do. We want, on the part of the ministry, an enlightened, zealous, laborious co-operation with the Holy Spirit, to bring about a thorough, widespread, radical reformation of manners. We want, on the part of the people, sincerity, earnestness, sound morality, and such devotion and consecration to God as will make religion the business of their lives.

MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON THE RELATIONS OF THE CHURCH TO THE COLORED PEOPLE.

The committee appointed to take into consideration the relations of the Methodist Episcopal Church South to the colored population within the bounds of the Montgomery Conference, and to report thereon, beg leave to submit the following:

A great change has taken place, since the last session of our Conference, in the civil attitude of the negroes towards their former masters, and the white population generally; whether for better or worse, remains to be seen. But Christ's kingdom is not of this world. The relations of its members are spiritual and are not necessarily subject to the changes and disturbances of earthly governments. The bond and the free belong alike to the church, and may equally enjoy its benefits and illustrate its graces. They were component elements of the Apostolic churches, and the Methodist Episcopal church South has gathered the master and the slave alike into her fold and cared for both from the beginning.

We cannot recognize as a result of the late revolution any necessity for a change in the relations of our colored members. They are still entitled to our pastoral care and to all their rights and privileges, and the means of salvation, as heretofore. And the colored people generally constituting a large portion of our resident population, have special claims upon christian benevolence and efforts. They were made in the likeness of God and redeemed by the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ.

A patent and painful result of the late revolution meets us in the state of our missions among them. These missions have ever been a marked feature in our operations. They were the peculiar care of the Church, and up to the last session, this field of evangelical labor was increasing in interest. A year ago the statistics showed 15,710 colored members, besides a large number of catechumens under pastoral oversight.—Including other Conferences comprised within the limits of the State, it appears, comparing Church Statistics with the census, that we had gathered into church membership one out of every five of the whole adult colored population of Alabama. This was no trifling result of evangelical labor directed toward the slaves. It is a record which is on high, and will go down to history.

Our last Annual Report shows, besides the colored population served by pastors in connection with white churches, thirteen missions exclusively to people of color, supplied by preachers from the Montgomery Conference. These missions were on the large plantations, and contained 3,938 members, and 1,831 children and youths under catechetical instruction.

Since the collapse of the Confederacy and the advent of the Federal armies, most of them have been abandoned, and the rest are more or less disorganized. None of the missionaries have expressed a willingness to return to them, nor do they speak encouragingly of the appointment of successors.

The church is bound by every humane and christian consideration, to labor as much as ever for the salvation of the negroes. But, that for the present, we cannot continue our former plan of operations, is evident from the following:

1. The masters and owners of the slaves once constituting these missions were contributors, more or less, to the support of the missionary. This source of aid is now cut off; they no longer feel the intimate dependence and responsibility between themselves and the negroes which once they did.

2. The negroes in large numbers have left their old homes and wandered off, to the loss of all ecclesiastical reckoning. And this disposition to drifting and instability continues.

3. Those proprietors of plantations who are still disposed to aid in furnishing the Gospel to the freedmen who may be employed by them, are not able to make any reliable pledges to this effect at the time our annual appointments of preachers are made; for they know not what kind of negroes they are to have, or whether they are to have many or few, or any at all, for the ensuing year.

4. For obvious reasons, the treasury of the Missionary Society is not in a condition upon which to predicate drafts for the support of the missionary.

5. It would not be advisable to send him forth depending for his support upon contributions from the negroes themselves.

The effect of the influences and evens of the past year upon the religious condition of the colored people, if measured by our Statistics, is unfriendly—even disastrous.—We trust they do not establish a general principle, and that there may soon be a favorable reaction. While the white membership of this Conference during the year has increased 2,105, there has been a decrease in the colored membership of 6,609.

The only encouraging reports come to us from those colored congregations which have been served by pastors in connection with whites. In several instances there has been an increase of membership under these circumstances, and the attendance upon the preached word and ordinances, the order and spirituality of the colored congregations are reported very favorably of.

The Conference Missionary Society, appreciating the importance of this subject, and desiring to get all the information bearing on the case, and seeing the propriety of being guided by inferences from a broad array of facts rather than by theories, spent the afternoons of Wednesday, Thursday and Friday in hearing from missionaries, presiding elders and those pastors under whose observation the colored people had more immediately come.—The result of these three sessions, spent in eliciting pertinent facts from every quarter, and in thorough discussion, has doubtless brought us all to one mind on this subject.

The principal colored church and congregation of the Conference withdrew three months ago and joined themselves to a religious organization composed exclusively of people of their own color, known as the African Methodist Episcopal (Zion) Church. The secession has been peacefully accomplished.

Your committee, with the light before them, recommend, that in case similar defections follow, they be treated with kindness and forbearance, and a ready acknowledgment of all their rights in the premises. We believe that their best religious interest would be subserved by continuing with the white churches, and this should be made plain to them by the real benefit resulting from it.

Our people should take into consideration the social and constitutional infirmities and disabilities of the race, and their signal unpreparedness for the situation in which, without their own procuring, they find themselves.

Be kind and patient toward them, and by all humane and christian reasons try to help them to a better future than a severe philosophy of all the facts seem to promise.

In conclusion, your committee submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1. That we recommend, under the peculiar circumstances, to the Bishop or President of the Conference, not to appoint missionaries to the colored people, after the usual manner, the ensuing year; but that the Presiding Elders, and preachers in charge of circuits and stations be required to do all they can in supplying the Gospel to the colored people, wherever they are accessible, and maintaining the ordinances and organization of the church among them.

2. That we recommend to those who employ freedmen a liberal co-operation with the Conference in carrying out the above resolution.

3. That we consider it a duty urgently incumbent upon our members and worthy of the best pastoral care and oversight, that Sabbath Schools be organized for the benefit of the colored children and youth, wherever practicable, in which they may be taught the principles of the christian religion, and also to read the word of God.

4. That we recommend to our people to countenance and encourage day schools for the education of colored children, under proper regulations and trustworthy teachers.

FLORIDA CONFERENCE.

This Conference commenced its twenty-second session at Madison Court House, Florida, November 29, 1865, Bishop Geo. F. Pierce presiding.

The attendance was not very large, owing to the general derangement of our finances and conveniences of travel.

William S. Rice was received on trial. Elijah S. Tiner, admitted on trial at the late session of the Georgia Conference, was transferred to Florida by the Bishop.

There remain on trial—A. Holcome, J. M. Potter, A. V. Mann, J. O. Sparks and D. L. Brannlo.

A. T. Hollyman, G. B. Swann, W. A. McLaw, discontinued at their own request.

G. R. Fisher was discontinued.

Oscar A. Myers was admitted into full connection and ordained Deacon.

C. P. Jones was received by transfer from the North Carolina Conference.

J. M. Bridges, John R. Harwell, George C. Andrews were located at their own request.

The superannuated preachers are, R. H. Luckey, Wm. W. Griffin, E. L. T. Blake, M. Bedell, T. Taylor, T. C. Coleman, D. Roberts, C. Raiford and R. I. McCook.

Wm. L. Murphy, a man of prayer, of faith and of zeal, a good and useful preacher, died during the year in great triumph.

Josephus Anderson, S. P. Richardson, John W. Mills and Samuel Woodberry were elected delegates to the General Conference. The reserves are, T. H. Capers and N. B. Ousley.

Our statistics show an increase in whites, in full connection, 480; on probation, 93; colored, on probation, 136; and local preachers, 11; a decrease of colored in full connection, 619.

The committee on Periodicals reported the following, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, 1. That we heartily concur in the action of the Georgia conference, in the transfer of the proprietary interest of the Southern Christian Advocate to J. W. Burke & Co., and that we will unite with the Conference in carrying out the articles of agreement with said company.

2. That we will use all diligence to give the Southern Christian Advocate an extensive circulation within our bounds.

3. That the thanks of this Conference are due and hereby tendered the Rev. Mr. Abbey, for his zeal and energy in taking care of the interests of the church, vested in the Publishing House at Nashville.

A resolution to request the General Conference to retrocede to the Georgia Conference that part of the State of Georgia now embraced in the bounds of the Florida Conference was adopted.

The following resolution was also adopted:

Resolved, 1. That the removal of the Rev S. P. Richardson from the bounds of the Florida Conference is regarded by us with sincere regret; and that in the mission which takes him from our midst, he has our earnest prayers for the greatest success, and for health, prosperity and all divine blessings upon himself and his family; and that we part with him, sincerely hoping that, in the providence of God, he may be returned to us again.

The Conference Stewards settled with the widows and orphans at the rate of thirty-five cents on the dollar.

Our next Conference will be held at Quincy, Fla.

We have requested the Bishop to appoint our Conference sessions to begin hereafter on Thursday, so that the Committee on Examination may have from Tuesday, 10 A. M., till Thursday, to conduct the examination of the undergraduates.

S. CAROLINA CONFERENCE RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, 1. That as members of the South Carolina Conference, we will endeavor to sustain the class meeting, and by every laudable effort induce those who may be committed to our pastoral care to adopt proper views of the institution and to discharge their duty in reference to it.

2. That under a grave apprehension of the danger, by popular amusements, such as theatres, circuses, balls, and the like, we pledge ourselves to save the church from the seductions which they present to its members, especially to the young.

3. That this Conference has heard with deep emotion of the recent decease of our venerable and beloved sister, Mrs. Bass, and that we extend to the bereaved family of Mrs. Bass our kindest and most affectionate sympathies.

4. That the first Friday in April, and the first Friday in September, are set apart as days of fasting and humiliation and prayer throughout the Conference territory.

CATECHISM.

Resolved 1. That we hereby request our delegates to the ensuing General Conference to consider the propriety of the preparation of a book of catechetical instruction, embracing the doctrines and discipline of our church, to be used in the proper instructions of candidates for full membership in the M. E. Church South.

2. That they be also instructed to present to the same body the importance of inserting in our Book of Discipline a form for the reception of members into full connection in our church.

RELIGIOUS WELFARE OF THE COLORED RACE.

Resolved, 1. That the South Carolina Conference feels a deep and abiding solicitude in the moral and religious welfare of the colored people within our bounds, who have so long been the objects of our regard and pastoral care, and that we will continue to put forth our best efforts in their service and for their good.

2. That the subject of providing for the supply of the religious wants of the colored people be referred to the Presiding Bishop and Presiding Elders.

3. That the Quarterly Conferences within our bounds are advised to grant license to preach and exhort to suitable colored persons, so far as may be done consistently with the laws of the State.

CHANGES IN DISCIPLINE.

Resolved, That our delegates to the next General Conference are hereby requested to use their influence and votes to promote the following legislation:

1. The material strengthening of our Episcopacy, by largely increasing the number of Bishops.

2. The enlargement of the powers of the Bishops, by rescinding the restriction upon their authority, which forbids them to return a minister to the same pastorate for a longer period than two years.

3. The incorporation of the lay element into the higher legislative bodies of the church.

CHURCH SOUTH.

1. That in the judgment of the South Carolina Conference, the M. E. Church South ought to maintain its organization distinct and separate from the M. E. Church North.

HOLSTON CONFERENCE.

The Holston Conference of the M. E. Church, South, convened in Marion, Va., September 14. Bishop Early, of Lynchburg, was telegraphed to attend and preside over the body. From the Bishop, in person, whom we have had the pleasure of seeing at the office of the Episcopal Methodist, we learn that the attendance of the preachers was large, and the session of the Conference harmonious and full of interest.—The usual minute business was transacted, and the preachers assigned to their work as in days gone by.

The following brethren were elected Delegates to the General Conference, namely: E. E. Wiley, William E. Y. Cunningham, James Kennedy, James Atkins and John T. McTeer. Reserve Delegates: R. N. Price and Carrol Long.

The Bishop gives a good account of the preachers and membership in this Conference, and expresses the opinion, that with a wise and judicious management of the question of delicacy which must arise from the occupancy of a large portion of the territory by a Northern Methodist Conference of the same name, in a comparatively short time our houses of worship will be restored, and the Conference occupy its original bounds, and prosecute its work in quietness.—*Southern Chris. CITY PRESS.

We are under many obligations to the True Delta, the Picayune, the Crescent and the Times for the very complimentary notices with which they welcome the re-appearance of the Advocate.

THE SITUATION.

Just after the close of the war, many of the friends of our Zion feared that tho Methodist E. Church South had gone down amid the conflict and issue of the battle-field. Enquiry was often made—can we, do we survive? Many churches had been burned, and in the principal cities of the South those that remained were occupied by Northern Methodist ministers, who seemed determined to cut short the work and take us all in by a coup de main. Even very intelligent persons, in the absence of information, seriously snpposed that the terrible period of fire and blood through which we had passed had drained all substance of life from the body of the Church. Cut off from the means of communication one part of our people scarcely knew whether another part still existed. Persons residing in Kentucky knew nothing of the important fact that during the war three large churches had been built by the friends of Southern Methodism in the city of Baltimore. Conferences on one side of the Mississippi knew not whether those on the other had even been held. Though with few exceptions the several Annual Conferences of the Church South convened regularly each year of the war.

Mr. Abbot, in a history of the war which he is concocting and dispensing, states that the soldiers of the South had bnt few religious opportunities. And this deplorable "fact" is received as the truth by thonsands—a statement which shonld be set down as the very largest among the "pearls of History." If the army was almost without the Gospel, one may well imagine how much the people at home snffered for lack of the bread of life.

Though the fact is the period of the war was remarkable for extensive revivals of religion throughout the armies and States of the South. Nor have the fruits of that glorious harvest vanished. The wonder only is how few comparatively are wanting at onr altars, and how many have returned strengthened in all the elements of their moral and spiritual life.

Tho Annual Conferences of our Church have been held during the fall, the last being that of Louisiana, and were presided over by onr Bishops. The attendance of preachers was large, the sessions were replete with interest, the preachers energetic, hopeful, full of benevolent design and enterprise, and ready at once to adapt themselves to the somewhat disturbed state of things which lay before them. At the Memphis Conference alone, 185 ministers were appointed to its fields, and in the Tennessee Conference even a larger number.

Certain ministers of the Kentncky and Holston Conferences have affiliated with the Northern Methodists, bnt elsewhere onr preachers abide by the ship to a man. While per contra the news from the recent session of the Virginia Conference, which we gave in the Advocate last week, indicates a speedy accession of ministers and members which will largely overbalance all our ecclesiastical losses.

Our schools and colleges are rapidly resuming their regnlar worl; the Publishing Honse has been restored to ns by the Government; our Advocates have reappeared with unabated zeal and orthodoxy, and it does one good like a medicine to read the tone and spirit of these church messengers.

So far as we are able to comprehend the situation, we observe that nnity, unanimity and energy characterize every department of Southern Methodism. In all the elements of strength, we are as woll off as we were before. Our people are steadfast in grave hopo and a godly purpose. They have received a baptism of sorrow and persecution which ever has been necessary to the development of christian life—a baptism for which every church is "straightened nntil it be accomplished." How often the baptism of the Spirit comes after the baptism of fire!

Instead of vast fields occupied by the negro and small towns from which the white laborer and the mechanic were eliminated more and more each year, the future vineyard of the church now spreads away before us amid thousands of small farms and a constantly increasing white population. Those missionary labors which hitherto have been expended on plantations to be reaped only in Heaven, will hereafter be spent on farms and reaped both on Earth and in Heaven.

The immenso substance of our church has passed away, and we have comparatively but few substantial houses of worship, few colleges, and scarcely a single benevolent foundation to show for it all. We now see that a people vastly poorer could have accomplished full as much. The present poverty of our church, it may be, will serve a better purpose than her wealth ever did, and its depth "abound to the riches of her liberality." We close by quoting the cheering, firm language of the editor of the St. Louis Advocate:

"The members and friends of the M. E. Church South may rest assured that the Church is neither dead nor sleeping.—True, it has passed through a terrible ordeal, and been subjected to a degree of fierce and bitter persecution, exceeding that which ever befel a christian denomination in this land since the witch-burning, Quaker-hanging, Baptist-whipping days of Puritanic rule in Massachusetts. But it survives. The ministers and members are more closely and more firmly attached to the church than ever before.

"The attachment of our people to the Church of their choice is worthy of all commendation. Rarely or never was there more unity of feeling, or internal peace in the Church than at present. With, perhaps, one or two slight exceptions, this is the case in every quarter from which intelligence has reached the Advocate. As soon as the preachers reach their work, they are hailed by the people as messengers of truth, and welcomed as the servants of the Most High. The scattered flocks are being gathered again—coming together in the fullness of Christian sympathy—until their devotions are characterized by fervent zeal and holy joy; while hundreds are being converted and added to their numbers."

THE SAVIOUR AT THE WELL.

Christ always gracious and accessible, was never more so than while conversing with the Samaritan woman. He talked with this fleshly person as if she had been a College of Apostles—of the true church, of the gift of the Spirit, told her, in what the worship of God really consisted and that he himself was the Messiah. The grandeur of these truths revealed, indicates the earnestness of Heaven and shows that the mission of Christ is to the people; that there is no revelation to the Magi which is not made with equal splendor to the Shepherds.

He sought to awaken her to the consciousness of an unsatisfying portion—that every spring and every well of earth cannot supply one soul-reaching draught. "He that drinks of this water shall thirst again."

Every earthly passion intensifies its thirst, enlarges its demands and becomes clamorous by indulgenec. Even that honest labor which provides for our natural wants yields no cheer to the soul. An endless repetition with a decreasing power to satify or enjoy, liko the city water carrior, it trudges daily the same path, draws from the same fountain, and returns with the same burden. The purest and noblest pleasure which can possibly enter through the avennes of sense fall far short of our highest nature. So that age without contentment overtakes the man. Too weak to be any longer active, too nervons to endnre the sounds of music, too solitary to dismiss the forms which one by one have disappeared from the circle of his home, he would gladly pass away from a region of change and decay, but alas, there is darkness beyond!

And who is it, O unhappy man, that so kindly addresses thee, but the Saviour Christ? There is a spirit in thee not reached by these outward things, and which is yet in some sort responsive to the words of this gracious Saviour. Thou child of the Almighty, thou art made of his Spirit. He challenges thy service and thy love; thou art under his law; thou art conscious of his bar; thou wast made to have a thousand thoughts of God; there are powers in thee for God's use, for his only; "the Spirit and the Bride" call thee.

To the woman the Saviour proffered the living water, a draught of life: "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst." As there is no longing like that of one fully seeking God, there is no satisfaction like that of finding him. To find our whole condition toward God changed from fear to confidence, to feel that He hears and forgives, this is a new and profound spring of peace. It meets the demand of our being, hushes the alarm of nature, and fills the emptiness of life. He that drinks thereof tastes of that pure river of life "which makes glad the City of God."

Nothing is more wonderful than a fountain bubbling from its sandy bed. How often in childhood have we watched the upward flow, the dancing pebbles and its never ceasing motion. Whence came that supply, unfailing amid the heat of summer, rolling on over the thirsty soil in brooks of sweet water, refreshing the grass, watering the flowers and enriching the earth.—Thus the life of the soul, the gift of God, is not a stream but a fountain, having life in itself—taking its origin from the Spirit, so that it begins to be and then exists a distinct and ever living fountain, an inward implanted divine life rising in the soul and flowing toward heaven—"In him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." All else in life has its weariness, plethora, insipidity; but this water becomes sweeter at every draught. No sands can drink it up, no demands lessen it; and how much neglect does it survive, how often the heart puts to the test all the gracious riches of Christ! The body, the mind, soon give out in vivacity, not so with a soul flowing with God's current. Through long years of mercy its exhaustless tide supplies constant thought, constant love, constant hope.

Every grace seeks its kindred skies. Taking on the shapes of everlasting life, the soul by ceaseless thought of God springs up into the fulness of the life in Heaven. Having the same responses to God here as there, the same thoughts, the same delights—the early fruit here, the full harvest there—the stream opening out into that region of wide life.

He sat thus on the well—a well whose waters had been released from their deep channels by Jacob and from which the patriarch, his wives, his children, his camels, his herds and generations afterwards drank, which yet flowed and presented to Christ and the disciples its cooling streams. So too the Saviour—himself a well of life—made glad the heart of the patriarch and still pours forth the Holy Spirit. He that searches and knows all things, even the deep things of God, draws from the depths of his own inspiration, and cries, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink."

THE WATCHMAN.

We are in receipt of the first number of this beautiful sheet.—After looking at papers for many years, we pronounce the typography of this one perfect. It is published in New York—"A weekly Journal devoted to Religion as distinguished from sectarianism; Politics in its higher phases and above party issues; Litcrature, Science, Art, Domestic and Foreign News."

The Rev. Dr. C. F. Deems, of the M. E. Church South is the editor, and its eight pages indicate throughout his marvellous industry and genius. He is "aided by Judge Reade, of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, of the Presbyterian Church; the Rt. Rev. Bishop Atkinson, of the Episcopal Church; the Rev. Thomas H. Pritchard, Virginia, of the Baptist Church, and others."

The "aim" of its publication is well set forth in the language of the editor—

"Faithful to his own denomination, the editor trusts that he is so well known to all the churches for liberality, that any publication of his may unhesitatingly be sent into the family of any Christian community, especially as he is to be assisted by able members of the several churches. It may be the mission of this journal to make all Christians see one another in a lovelier light. The editor has an earnest desire, and will make a hearty effort to produce such a publication, that where a family can take only one paper, this will more nearly supply all its wants than any other. A home gazette, a repertory of all the best current literature, a summary of all important intelligence in every department of human effort, a journal of progress, an advocate of truth in all things, a friend, a guide, a blessing—this is what the Watchman is intended to become."

We know of no one whose qualifications and experience will better enable him to realize his own perfect ideal of a Religious Family Journal than the Rev. Doctor.

SOUTHERN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE AND MIRROR OF THE TIMES,

Published by J. W. Burke & Co, for the M. E. Church South, and edited by Rev. Dr. Myers, appeared on our table last week. They are in fact two papers in one—presenting the secular and the religious sheets—so that the two can be cut apart and bound separately. The price of this double sheet is only $3. We need not say that we most heartily commend this excellent paper, now in its 29th volume, to all Southern Methodists. It was fortunate that we were kindly furnished by a friend with a file of the Advocate since its resumption, for it has yielded a large part of the Conference matter and Church news which we have laid before our readers, and we shall continue to extract largely from it until we can get exchanges and communications, of which, as yet none have come to hand.

EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE.

The East Texas Conference met on the 11th November, the time appointed by the last Conference, because the appointments of the Bishops were not received in time to become generally known.

Rev. W. H. Hughes was elected President. The attendance was large, and all business was transacted pleasantly and harmoniously. The emergencies of the times seemed to be appreciated by all, and measures designed to meet those emergencies were readily devised and adopted.

On the subject of Sunday Schools, the following resolution was adopted:

That, as a Conference, we will organize Sunday schools in every neighborhood where we can collect ten children; and that we will organize Bible classes for the benefit of church members, wherever practicable; and that we will give those Sunday schools and Bible classes our personal superintendence.

The educational interests of the church were favorably represented. The Female Seminary at Paris is still under the superintendence of Rev. James Graham. McKing's College, near Clarksville, has also continued in successful operation during the war. Rev. J. W. P. McKinzy, its scholarly, pious and energetic President, has sent out many a shining light into society and a useful laborer in the Master's cause.

A resolution was adopted, appointing a committee to project and carry into execution, as far as possible, before next session of Conference, a plan for the establishment of a school, where the children of itinerant preachers and candidates for the ministry shall be educated without charge.

The Texas Advocate has been published for some time past. Its editor, Rev. J. E. Carnes, was granted a location at this session of the Conference.

Rev. E. M. Marvin was in attendance at the Conference, and preached three times during the session, with a most powerful and happy effect. By request of the citizens of Paris he is protracting the meetings and with good results. There have been several conversions, and the interest of the meeting is still increasing.

CLOSE OF THE BRITISH CONFERENCE.

We give from the N. Y. Advocate and Journal a few paragraphs respecting the late session of this body.

MEMBERS IN SOCIETY.

The returns show that there were in Great Britain, in March last, when the members are reported to the district meetings, 330,827 church members—a net increase of 1,159—and 19,091 probationers. During the year 5,557 members of Society have died; 27,319 have removed to other circuits; 18,793 new members have been received into the church; and 49,463 persons have been admitted on trial for church membership.

On the mission stations there were reported 62,545 members, which is a decrease of 2,832 since the previous conference. The falling off was chiefly in the West Indies, and was attributed mainly to the extreme poverty of the people; hunger and nakedness preventing many who had been members of Society from even attending public worship. It was suggested that a deputation be sent out specially to inquiro into the causes of the decline of our societies in the West Indies.

THE STATIONS.

On Wednesday, the 9th, the discussion of the revised list of stations was resumed, and occupied over five hours. It was taken up again on Thursday evening and Friday morning. The Recorder's "Conference Notes" says:

"There is no unmixed good on earth; not even the telegraph is so. Many a representative in the Conference this year has felt tempted to wish that the telegraph wires were all broken for a day or two, or that a "magnetic storm" would prevail, rendering all messages unintelligible till the stations were confirmed. For this year the task of stationing the ministers has been more difficult than perhaps was ever known. The usual course is as follows:

"First, the Stationing Committee meets before the Conference and prepares the first draught. Immediately after the Conference commences, all the business necessary to the preparation of the second draft is commenced; that is, the list of supernumeraries and of candidates is prepared, and the applications from circuits for additional ministers are considered. Then the Conference knows exactly what are the demands of the connection, and what materials it has at its command for their supply, and immediately the Stationing Committee retires for the preparation of the second draft. More than ten days have elapsed since its predecessor appeared, and much valuable ink and paper have been expended in saying, "By all means let us have this man who is down for us;" or, "Really, we can't do with that minister; some other appointment must be made." These intimations of the opinions of circuits, of course, weigh heavily with the committee, and frequently changes are made in accordance with them.

"The first reading takes place immediately after the committee has closed its labors, and upon this reading no remark is made. In future, however, this practice is to be abolished; and since the second draft is printed and in everybody's hands, it is to be "taken as read," that the time of Conference may be saved. Meantime letters and telegrams are flying in all directions; and the effect of these is seen in the second reading, when every member of Conference has a right to challenge any appointment and endeavor to secure a change.

"This is the great field day. With the exception of a few cases that may be reserved, it is understood that the matter is decided by this debate. About sixty changes were made this year in the second reading, and some of these were very perplexing.

"The third reading sometimes comes on immediately after the second. It did so at the Camborne Conference; but more frequently an interval of one or two days is allowed between the second and third readings. This latter is not generally a long business. The stations are taken by districts, the secretary asking the question—"Any change in the London district?" "the Bedford district?" and so on. This year the third reading occupied a very long time, the whole of the special session on Thursday evening, and some two hours on Friday morning. Then, at last, the Secretary, with an eager jerk, shut up his official book of stations and proposed their confirmation. In two seconds more those stations, so keenly canvassed for three weeks previously, had become law. Here a brother said thankfully to himself, 'There! I'm safe;' and there another brother said to himself, 'Well I don't like it, but I must go and do my best.' And so all, without a spice of ill, even to those who have been the means of their personal disappointment, set out for the great work to which their commission has thus been renewed. It must be acknowledged that this is a cumbrous machinery. Whether it could be improved is hard to say. Mr. Punshion evidently thinks it can. We must wait till next Conference reveals the scheme which he appears to be elaborating.

Mr. Punshion on Friday gave notice of his intention to move at the next Conference for a committee to consider whether any, and if any what improvements could be made in the method of stationing the ministers."

The Conference closed late on Friday evening. After the confirmation of the stations, the attendance began to thin out very fast. The officers pushed on the business hour after hour, till at half past 9 o'clock when the journal was to be signed the house looked so empty, it was thought necessary to call the roll of the Legal Hundred, in order to be sure that the necessary forty were present. There were but thirty nine, and an aged brother who had just retired was recalled, to enable them to go through the formality of signing the journals in presence of a quorum of the "Hundred."

The usual vote of thanks to those who had entertained the members during the session, was passed; the hymn, "Blest be the dear uniting love," etc., was sung, and Dr. Hannah closed with a fervent and impressive prayer.

Persecution in East Tennessee.—The constitution of the United States guarantees the right to all men to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience. But it appears that no respect is paid to this provision of that document in Tennessee, where it is openly and shamefully violated. Members and ministers of the Southern Methodist Church are the peculiar objects of vindictive and cruel persecution; they are deprived of their houses of worship and threatened with violence if they attempt to hold religious services in certain places. Rev. Jacob Brillhart, an estimable minister of the Methodist Church, for attempting to exercise the functions of his office, near Athens was mobbed and ridden on a rail. The Bishop vouches for him as being a good man and worthy minister. And this is the treatment to which he is subjected, because like hosts of other good men, he adhered to the Southern cause during the war. Will nothing be done to restore the reign of order and justice to that distracted country? Will not President Johnson see that the same rights and immunities are guaranteed to the Southern people there that they are permitted to enjoy elsewhere?

Lyons & Co.—We call the attention of the reader to the large and descriptive advertisement of those enterprising Clothiers, Messrs. Lyons & Co.

THE PROPER PLAN.

The planters in several parts of South Carolina are pursuing the very sensible policy adopted in some of the parishes of our own State, viz: drawing wisdom from multiplicity of counsel. Public meetings have been held, and the labor problem, with all its attendant questions, thoroughly discussed and canvassed, so that the most practical and feasible mode of reorganizing agricultural industry might be discovered and adopted. Asin our own parish of St. Mary, there seems to be a better prospect of fair crops in the districts of the Palmetto State where these meetings have been held than elsewhere. The cause of this may doubtless be found in the fact that the public discussions, the resolutions adopted, and the knowledge that the military openly endorse the plans decided upon, give the freedmen greater confidence in the good intentions of the whites, and they consequently make contracts and go to work with greater readiness. This matter is worthy of the consideration of all our planters, for a similar course would doubtless have a similar happy effect in other quarters.

In a late number of the Kingstree Star, and the proceedings of a meeting held in that town, which was attended by the most influential planters of the surrounding section. The discussion apparently was lengthy and earnest, and embraced all the points touching the relations that must for the future exist between the white race and the black. All were anxious to treat the negro kindly and properly in every respect, and it was the universal opinion that the greatest evil which could befall either the freedman or the general public, would be in letting him lands. As an employe of others, with the power over him to force compliance with a contract once entered into, the negro is a most efficient useful part of the social organization; but placed in possession of lands, subject to no will but his own, and if the soil was made to yield enough to keep him from starvation, the State would be the inmate indeed. These were the sentiments of experienced men, who had watched and studied the negro character for years, and they were embodied in their platform, which was clearly laid down, and will doubtless be strictly complied with.

The resolutions are as follows, and a copy was forwarded to Captain Blake, the Bureau agent, who, we should judge, coincides in the views therein expressed:

Resolved, That it is the duty of planters to offer to their late slaves, liberal compensation for their labor, so as to enable them to live in comfort. That the interests of the community requires the immediate dismissal of such negroes as refuse to contract for the ensuing year.

That it is the sense of this meeting that a landowner renting land to negroes, to be worked free from the control of himself or some responsible agent, is, in the present condition of the negroes of this District, doing a course ruinous to them and highly detrimental to the peace of the community and the interest of the whites.

That we bind ourselves not to infringe the letter and spirit of these resolutions, and to discourage the infringement by others as far as our influence extends.

That the military authorities of this district be earnestly requested to render assistance in carrying out these resolutions.

THE CONFEDERATE CRUISERS.

Minister Adams has been indulging in another official correspondence on the subject of the "ravages of Confederate privateers," especially of the Shenandoah. This time it is with the Earl of Clarendon, the successor of Russell. The noble Earl gives the following decidedly pithy conclusion to the correspondence:

FOREIGN OFFICE, Dec. 2, 1865.

SIR—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th ult., having reference to a letter which my predecessor addressed to you on the 3d ult.

There are many statements in your letter which I should be prepared to controvert if I did not feel that her Majesty's Government considers that no advantage can result from prolonging the controversy, of which the points are generally exhausted, but which might possibly, if continued, introduce acrimony into the relations between this country and the United States—two nations who are kindred, origin and mutual interest and mutual desire to be knit together by bonds of the closest friendship. Such a desire is generally felt by the Government and people of this country, and her Majesty's Government and people of the United States.

I, therefore, while abstaining, therefore, from any discussion of the passages in your letter, to the correctness of which I am unable to subscribe, it is nevertheless my duty, in closing this correspondence, to observe that no British vessel departed during the war from any British port to erulse against the commerce of the United States, and to maintain throughout all the difficulties of the war by which the United States have been distracted, but in the termination no nation rejoices more cordially than Great Britain, the British Government has steadily and honestly discharged all the duties incumbent on them as a neutral power, and have never deviated from the instructions imposed on them by international law.

I am, &c.,

CLARENDON.

RELIGIOUS WORK FOR THE NEW YEAR.

Rev. Mr. Dickinson, pastor of the Leigh Street Baptist Church, Richmond, closed his sermon on last Sunday with some valuable hints as to what he wanted his flock to accomplish this year. They are applicable to every congregation in the land. We clip from the Times:

"We must provide for the poor and destitute connected with this church and congregation. Many will have been in affluence and saw the subjects of abject poverty, and also without any fault of theirs. Many of a former years have been most liberal in ministering to the necessities of others and need themselves to be aided. We must have any and every sacrifice that may be called to be made that Christ's poor may suffer.

"We must educate the poor children who may be found in such numbers in this portion of this city. There is no easier—no better way of doing good, than by educating the poor, and thus fitting one for a position of usefulness, who, but for such attention, would have grown up in ignorance and vice, and become a burden and a disgrace to society. There are many children in this community who are without the means of education, because of the late war. Such have a peculiar claim upon us, and the writer was happy to be able to say that he was about to be able to furnish every such child with at least the elements of a good education.

"We must aim this year to secure the salvation of every impenitent person within the range of our influence. An aged minister on his dying bed, was asked what was the greatest thing—"My son," he replied, "the greatest thing is to save a soul." Let us attempt the greatest thing, and we may during this year to see even a greater number brought into the fold that composed the eighty ingatherings of the past year.

"There is one thing more that we must do. The field is the world." The great and good John Wesley said,—"My parish is the world." So each of us ought to feel, and see something to those who are perishing in the dark places of the earth for lack of knowledge. We must, then, even in our poverty, do something this year towards sending the Gospel into the "regions beyond."

By the loss of the house of General Ivy by fire, near Florence, Ala., $30,000 worth of property was destroyed. Among the interesting historical relics destroyed in the conflagration was a magnificent sword presented to General Jackson by the citizens of New Orleans, and bequeathed by him to Andrew J. Colfee.

GOOD WORDS WELL SPOKEN.

While earnestly commending and endorsing the spirit and language of the following stirring appeal from the columns of the Aberdeen (Miss.) Sunny South, we cannot but feel deep regret at the intimation it contains that the old proprietors of the fertile fields of our sister State are forsaking their loved homesteads and permitting the soil, where so many fond memories cluster, to pass into the possession of strangers. We had hoped that the spirit of emigration, which seized our people when the cause for which they had so long and arduously struggled ended in defeat, had passed away, and it is with sincere sorrow that we learn our mistake. We, too, believe that "there's life in the old land yet," and hope the earnest words of our cotemporary will take deep root and be productive of much good fruit.

We append the article referred to:

"THERE'S LIFE IN THE OLD LAND YET."—"Lands for sale"—"mules, wagons, plows, and other farming requirements at auction," has become so common an announcement of late as to really distress us. Why will our old planters give audience to despondency? Will they not be convinced that "there's life in the Old Land yet?" Surely the soil has not lost its wondrous power, nor the sun its will to call the cotton and the grain from the mould. Courage! friends; courage! The South is never lost until her own proud sons resign her rich fields to the stranger. Rent your lands for the season if you cannot till them, but retain the titles; do not permit your beautiful land to be revolutionized by passing into the hands of those who love you not. Be patient, and all will in time be well. There is happiness yet in the womb of the future. There is a smile for every tear, and a day of sunshine for each day of tribulation, you have known. "Learn to labor and to wait," and your patience will assuredly meet with its reward. Fanaticism cannot always rule the councils of the nation. Reason will return to assert her ancient sway in the Capital, and the sublime spirit that you have manifested since the surrender will win you the admiration of the world—the earnest support and countenance of the West, and force justice from New England. The day for despondency has probably passed away forever. The freedmen are manifesting a willingness to contract and to work, and the laborers of Europe are begging you to employ them. You redeemed these rich lands from the forest and the swamp, here you taught your children to love the South, to fight for her and to die for her! Do not in this eleventh hour falsify your noble teachings by speaking discouraging words, and setting the example of desertion. Stick to the Old Land as long as you can consistently with honor, and "do not give up the ship" until you are satisfied that her wreck is inevitable.

THE GRAVE OF STONEWALL JACKSON.

We have been requested to give publicity to the following circular to the members of the old "Stonewall." We hope that it will meet with a ready response, and that each one may look upon the object to be effected as a labor of love:

WINCHESTER, Jan. 1, 1866.

To the Survivors of the Stonewall Brigade:

I write to you on a subject in which you must ever feel the deepest interest. A strong reverence for the memory of Stonewall Jackson, and a strict regard for our renewed allegiance to the United States, need not be inconsistent, much less conflicting. Were he living, he would still be our friend, although not our General. He is dead! It is right that we should not neglect the memory of so good a man.

When Gen. Jackson died, Mrs. Jackson had his body taken to Lexington and buried, as she thought most consistent with his wishes and his character, in the grave-yard of his church. There, after his brilliant and renowned career, he sleeps in a simple grave—quietly and well.

Shortly after the death of our General, when the Stonewall Brigade met together to take such action as they deemed proper to show their respect for their lost General and friend, they determined, appropriately and delicately, to endeavor to get Mrs. Jackson's permission to place a simple monument over his remains.

I was instructed to communicate this earnest wish of the brigade in the matter, and to request the compliance of Mrs. Jackson with that wish if it was agreeable to her feelings. She kindly replied that she sincerely appreciated the motives which prompted the request, and that it was a pleasure to her to be able thus to gratify a body of soldiers and friends whom she loved as they had loved her husband. She accordingly granted the request, with the only condition that the proposed monument should be characterized by simplicity as the General's life had been. Subscriptions were accordingly raised, confined to the members of the Stonewall Brigade and the Rockbridge Artillery, and the sum of six thousand dollars was, in a week, placed in my hands, and by me deposited in bank in Richmond. As it was not deemed practicable to erect a suitable monument during the war, the money was converted into Confederate bonds. It was lost. General Jackson's grave is unmarked by a single stone. The Stonewall Brigade exists no longer as an organization, but many of its men still survive, and with them a sacred regard for the memory of their first commander. To the survivors of this brigade and the Rockbridge Artillery—formerly an important part of it—I now propose, having received the consent of Mrs. Jackson, to erect a suitable monument over the grave of our friend. It is a tribute to the mightiest and best beloved of our dead, which I concede can in no wise conflict with our duty to State or country. We may surely mark the spot where lies the body of him, whom history will make live forever.

To the end of this letter are appended the names of gentlemen in different parts of Virginia, where the former members of the brigade principally reside, to whom the subscriptions can be paid. When the necessary sum is raised, arrangements will be made to have the monument erected at once, after consultation on its style and character with Mrs. Jackson and the influential friends of the General. It is desirable that the matter should be conducted with the same delicacy which characterized the original undertaking. No appeal, I hope, is necessary to the honor and feelings of the survivors of that old brigade. To our keeping has been confided the remains of that great and Christian soldier, whose honored name we shared for four eventful years.

Very respectfully,

HENRY KYD DOUGLAS,

Formerly Inspector of Stonewall Brigade, and Assistant Inspector General to Gen. Jackson.

Will the following gentlemen act in this matter as indicated in the body of the letter? They will please communicate with the writer upon sight of this address, and if there is any reason why any one cannot act as requested, inform him of the fact, and suggest the name of some one to supply his place. They will please endeavor to bring the subject to the attention of those addressed, and get others to interest themselves. The specified subscription may be one dollar or half a dollar. Those who are able may give as much more as they wish, but it is right that in this matter the tributary mite of the General's humblest friend should not be declined: Gen. James A. Walker, Pulaski county; Gen. William Terry, Wytheville; Col. F. W. M. Halliday and Major R. W. Hunter, Winchester; Professor Hunter McGuire, M. D., and Lieutenant R. Fisher, Richmond; Maj. Jacob R. Braithwite, Baltimore; Littleton Macon, Charlottesville; Professor James White and Captain Archie Graham, Lexington; Col. J. Q. A. Nadenbousch, Marthasburg; Captain E. F. Barnhart, Shepherdstown; Colonel William Allan and Captain A. S. Garber, Staunton; General J. R. Jones, Harrisonburg; Colonel A. Spangler, Mooresfield; Major John Newton, Greenville; Captain C. H. Shearer, Charlestown; Capt. —— Grace, Hampshire county; Mellenry Howard, Baltimore, and any others who may feel an interest in the matter.

All papers favorable please copy.—Richmond Enquirer.

☞ At the annual sale of the pews in Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's Church, on Tuesday evening last, the first choice was sold for a premium of four hundred dollars. The total income to the church from the sale of the pews this year is estimated at nearly forty thousand dollars.

FURTHER PARTICULARS OF THE CAPTURE OF BAGDAD.

[From the Matamoros Ranchero, 7th inst.]

From a gentleman who left Bagdad at 9 o'clock yesterday morning, we obtain some additional particulars of the surprise and capture of that place. Our account before published is mainly correct.

There were some four hundred negroes, under command of United States officers, who comprised and had complete charge of the filibuster expedition, all under command of Reed.

The captain of the post was taken prisoner by three American officers while asleep in his room.

The commander of the post, and Mr. Le Grand, and Mr. J. Cooper were missing, and their whereabouts were unknown.

The negroes remained in possession of Bagdad until after daylight yesterday morning, when they re-crossed to Clarksville. After which, Cortina's men crossed and took possession of the place, and held it up to latest advices.

Mr. Castanares, collector of the port of Matamoros, with his son, were on their way to the City of Mexico, made their escape across the river to Brazos, by tying white handkerchiefs around their hats,

Every species of moveable property were crossed from Bagdad to Clarksville. Even iron safes were crossed and their contents rifled on the American bank, in full view of United States troops and citizens.

Seventeen dead negroes were found in the Le Grand warehouse, which shows how well the Antonio did her work.

One French war steamer was lying at the mouth of the river, and another was cruising up and down the beach opposite the town.

The French mail steamer which was to have left on the 6th inst., sailed for Vera Cruz immediately on the commencement of the attack, on Friday morning last.

Dr. Rance, of this city, with his family, were at Bagdad waiting an opportunity to embark for New Orleans. Their trunks, fourteen in all, were rifled of their contents by the negroes, leaving the doctor and his family with nothing but the clothes on their backs. Many others shared the same fate.

The Sheriff of Cameron county, Texas, crossed to Bagdad yesterday and hung a negro—cause unknown.

When our informant left it was positively ascertained that Mr. Alonzo, the Alcalde of Bagdad, and Lieut. Delmontes, were killed, and Capt. Gomez and Lieut. Castro, wounded. Two American ladies are also reported to have been killed.

Two children being met going to market by negroes were murdered by them and then robbed of their market money.

Several Frenchmen, citizens of Bagdad, are known to have been assassinated. Four wounded Imperial soliers were at Clarksville.

The negroes are impudently parading the streets of Clarksville, displaying whatever they may have taken from Bagdad.

A large amount of property which the filibusters could not take with them they destroyed.

The Imperial troops in Bagdad, after their capture, were quartered in the old St. Charles Hotel as prisoners.

All persons found parading the streets of Bagdad are shot down.

The gunboat Antonia arrived up from Bagdad yesterday morning, with a good sized shot hole through her between wind and water. We have been unable to obtain any further particulars of the part she took in the affair of the filibusters at Bagdad, more than a general confirmation of our previous account. Two men were killed and one wounded on the Antonia.

TEXAS.

The Houston (Texas) Telegraph of the 12th inst. learns from gentlemen who reside near Independence, Washington county, that the majority of the negroes have left the plantations and started for the towns and cities. Many planters have rented out their land, and very little cotton will be planted this season. A few planters are anxious to hire negro field hands, and will pay them good wages.

The same paper says:

The City Marshal intends to ferret out and bring to punishment all those parties who have imported obscene photographs, and clandestinely sold them to boys and young men. This is a move in the right direction. There is a very stringent law upon the statute books of this state against this crime. The man who imports these things, to circulate immorality and obscenity among the rising generation of young men, is a worse man than Judas Iscariot, who sold his Savior for thirty pieces of silver. We hope the last one of the miscreants will be arrested and severely punished.

The Houston Daily Telegraph of the 10th inst. announces the arrival of the stern-wheeler Indian No. 2, Capt. Grace, and that of the steamer Shreveport, in that city, both direct from New Orleans. Both steamers are to be employed in the trade between Houston and Galveston.

The Galveston Civilian and Gazette of the 18th inst., speaking of the many crimes now committed in that city, says:

We believe that in the whole history of crime, it never occurred before, that a carriage driver was attacked by his passengers, and yet here in Galveston, within three days it has been done twice. In one instance the hackman was left for dead, and in the other found dead. Almost every morning we are informed that some citizen has been assaulted, and some house or store robbed, and that too with a degree of boldness which cast all past outrages entirely in the shade. On Monday night Mr. Slater, boarding with Mr. Richardson, of the Galveston News, as he arrived at the gate was met by two men, each with a six shooter in his hand, one of whom demanded his money or his life. He pushed aside the revolvers, and at the same moment they were discharged. One of the men then seized him by the shoulder, and after turning him around in such a manner that the light fell upon his face, remarked that, "it is all right," and left, the parties evidently mistaking Mr. Slater for another person. Such are the daily reports, and the amount of outrages committed of late are beyond conception.

The cab driver found dead was a Mexican by the name of Gonzales. Sufficient evidence is on hand to fasten suspicion of guilt upon one Geo. Hutchinson.

The Galveston (Houston) News, of the 19th instant, complains as follows:

Some very hungry, heartless and wicked individual purloined two turkeys from our back yard last night. They had just arrived from rural parts and were ignorant of the present thieving and robbing mania which exists here. So they perched upon the fence, slept, and dreamed perchance of the quiet barnyard, of the forest, the crib—when violently awakened, yanked off the fence, thrust into a sack, and no doubt conveyed to some receiver of stolen goods.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

Gen. Longstreet and family have arrived in this city, via Mobile, and are stopping at the St. Louis hotel. As this distinguished gentleman has engaged in business in New Orleans, his name will henceforth be enrolled as one of our citizens.

The renowned soldier of other days, but peaceful citizen of the present, General Hood, was yesterday invited to a seat within the bar of the House of Representatives.

Major Gen. Humphreys, and corps of assistant engineers, returned to the city yesterday, per steamer St. Nicholas, from the trip of inspection of the levees above this place on the Mississippi. The levees of the Atchafalaya were also visited, we are informed. We may soon expect to learn something definite regarding the prospects for the completion of the work, which is of such incalculable importance to the future welfare of Louisiana.

The war-worn veteran Gen. Hood is in the city, the guest of Major Austin.

☞ The son of the editor of the New York News has arrived and enrolled himself as a student of the University of Virginia for the present session.

LOUISIANA.

From the Monroe Intelligencer, of the 20th inst., we clip:

The planters in this neighborhood have commenced working in earnest; most of them have secured the services of as many laborers as they need, and are putting the plantations in order to make a crop. The freedmen are working faithfully, and we may, perhaps, look for an average crop of corn and cotton on the cotton lands this year. Few plantations can yet be leased or bought, and all will, undoubtedly, soon be occupied. The rich coast between Columbia and Monroe, and the fine farms on Bayous Desiard and Bartholomew never overflow, with few exceptions; they produce well and should be sought after.

The river is falling slowly at this point; the weather has been warm during the week; very little rain has fallen; we have no river news from upper Ouachita; it is, however, too low for boats to Camden.

The bulk of the business transacted in Monroe and Trenton this week was in plantation supplies. We noticed, daily, wagon loads of ploughs and farming utensils leaving the warehouse, and more arriving by every boat. Sanders & Kinderman a few weeks since received 300 ploughs, and have nearly sold out. Cotton has arrived slowly, probably on account of the opening of navigation in Boeuf river and Bayou Bartholomew.

On account of the great scarcity in building materials we note very little change. Messrs. Herring & Gerspach are erecting a steam saw-mill in front of Mrs. Carson's plantation, above town. Our enterprising neighbor, H. M. Bry, is establishing a brickyard in the rear of town, and will soon give the masons employment. He will also put his steam saw-mill in operation soon. We see a large livery stable building opposite the Monroe Church by H. G. Dobson. There are several small cottages going up, and many old store fronts are being repainted. In Trenton, several new commercial firms will soon open.

Before the war, Monroe boasted of several shoe and boot makers. Now, that its population has doubled, and it is a place of some importance, there is not even a cobbler in it. Monroe can support one or more shoe shops. Will not some industrious mechanic see to this matter and move to our town?

A regiment of white U. S. troops stationed at Camden Ark., headed by a Sergeant, a few days since, proceeded with a band of music to Gen. Mays' Headquarters, and asked him to pay them, feed them better or discharge them;

The General quieted them by promising to telegraph to Headquarters at Little Rock and to give them a speech in the evening.

We understand that Mr. Miller, Treasury Agent at Camden, Ark., has been placed under arrest by Gen. Mays, in command at that place, for malfeasance in office.

Miller was released on bond.

The Shreveport News of the 13th inst. has the following:

On Wednesday night the residence of Mrs. Leonard, about five miles from town, on the Mansfield road, was attacked by about twenty colored soldiers and a few whites. They informed the people of the house that they understood there was money in the house, and they intended to have it. One of the party in the house fired upon the assailants, whereupon a volley was fired into the house and its inmates driven off. On their way to this place, the robbers stopped at a camp and robbed and it, and attempted sundry other outrages. Capt. E. Leonard was somewhat hurt by the assailants, by a blow on the head with a gun.

J. W. Everett, charged with obtaining money under false pretences, by selling merchants' cards as circus tickets, plead guilty, and gave bond in the sum of $250 for his appearance at the next term of the District Court. The joke proved rather serious.

A gentleman of this city employed a negro to cut wood, and agreed to pay him $2 50 for doing it. The next morning the negro asked for the money, and was informed by the gentleman that he did not have it about him, but that when he got down in town he would pay him. The negro left and returned with a colored soldier, who informed the gentleman that if he did not pay the money down on the spot, he must go to jail; this threat was repeated several times, and the gentleman, who was lying down at the time, being unwell, finally got clear of the two by threatening to shoot them. Such things are scandalous, and we hope the military will find out the guard who played the part of judge.

A few nights ago, one of our citizens was knocked down and robbed of some forty-five dollars.

From the Natchitoches Times, 13th inst., we extract:

Since our last issue we learn that the planters have entered their contracts with the freedmen. On many plantations the laborers are already at work. Generally speaking, they have changed hands, few of them remaining at the same places.

Many parties from Texas, Mississippi and other points intend to locate on Red river. Several large plantations have been rented already, at a fair price. The soil of this parish is very rich, and well adapted to the cotton plant. The immigration, which is reported very extensive from the North, ought to inquire about our lands before settling elsewhere. They will find it to their advantage, as the prices asked for lands is smaller in proportion to any other locality where the sugar cane can be raised.

There is plenty room here for any new comers, let them bring us their energy. This is our strong power these days.

ELECTION.—We have no returns of the election of our Senator. Is our friend Dr. S. O. Scruggs, elected or not? Natchitoches has voted en masse for him, but nothing is known from the other parishes.

WHITE LABOR BEING INTRODUCED IN THIS PARISH.—We learn, says the Feliciana Ledger, (20th inst.,) that some of the planters in this parish have hired white men to tend their crops this year, and thus far they are progressing finely. Many predictions are made, on the score that more will be made by at least a third, with white labor than with colored. The experiment is being tested, and if successful the "cullud cits" will hereafter be less choice about who they will make their contracts with, as well as shares, spare time, etc.

The Iberville South, of the 20th inst., has the following:

The weather has been fine this past week, cold the first few days, now warm and spring like. The river got up pretty well, in fact we began to feel apprehensions, but it is now falling, and we hope will fall several feet before another rise comes. Our planters are trying to get to work, but find it very difficult to get the freedmen to go upon their plantations for any length of time. We heard of a case of small pox at the "camps" this past week, but hope the report may prove unfounded. This terrible disease could not break out in a worse place in our community than about the "camps" at the fort.

LABORERS.—During this week there have been planters from nearly every adjoining parish, besides a large number from ours, who want to employ laborers. They offer wages, they offer an interest in the crop and all the inducements for making contracts, yet the streets are black with loafing, ragged negroes, and the planters return home, vowing a determination to exhaust every effort to procure white laborers rather than depend upon Cuffy.

It is the opinion of planters in this latitude that another year will see the negro suing in vain for work on the plantations, many of them learning from present experience that the negro is incorrigibly given over to idleness and vagabondage. The next fall will doubtless witness streams of honest white men flocking to the South to reap their rewards from her generous climate and fertile soil. When this comes to pass, the "so-called" freedmen will be shoved aside, and be left to rue the day they threw away their great opportunity. So mote it be.—Baton Rouge Advocate, 19th inst.

MARRIAGE OF MISS LANE.—Miss Harriet Lane, the niece of ex-President Buchanan, noted throughout the country as the most accomplished and elegant lady that ever presided at the White House, was married at Wheatland, the residence of ex-President Buchanan, at 1 o'clock, on Thursday, to Mr. Henry Elliott Johnson. The bridegroom is a wealthy banker, of Baltimore. The ceremony was quietly performed, in the presence of a few friends, by Rev. Edward Y. Buchanan, the only brother of ex-President Buchanan. The parties started on their bridal tour the same afternoon.—Lancaster Intelligencer.

MISSISSIPPI.

MISSISSIPPI CENTRAL RAILROAD.—We are glad to learn that the bridge on this road over the Tallahatchie has been finished, and that the road is now completed to Hutchie river. The train runs to Bolivar.—Canton (Miss.) Citizen, 18th.

The following persons have been appointed postmasters in Tishomingo county, Miss.: J. J. Gibson, Corinth; Mrs. Frances C. Gray, Jachito; W. S. Parks, Rienzi; T. W. Rice, Burnsville; Geo. P. Hamerly, Iuka.

We published, a few days ago, from the Meridian Messenger, a statement that, at the instance of Gov. Humphreys, five companies of troops were to leave for Kemper county to look after some troubles up there.

The force was to be commanded by Capt. Gregg. Referring to the above, the Clarion of the 20th inst. says:

We have the most satisfactory means of knowing that the Messenger, unintentionally, we know, done Governor Humphreys injustice. He knew nothing whatever of the matter until his attention was called to the paragraph in question.

We have heard some statements of the matter referred to, as given by the military. One "Orange," a freedman, who formerly belonged to a Mr. Gully, living near DeKalb, in Kemper county, contracted in Lauderdale county with a gentleman for labor, which contract included his whole family. Returning to Mr. Gully's, he was refused to take his family. Upon affidavit of Orange at Meridian, a sergeant and nine men were sent with Orange to Mr. Gully's to obtain possession of his family.

They were met by an armed force, who took Orange from the guard, tied and beat him and sent the guard back to their quarters. The sergeant made his affidavit, upon which a force of five companies was sent to Kemper with orders to arrest Mr. Gully, and to return as soon as this was effected. We understand that strict orders were issued to prevent all depredations. This is the version of one side.

We have some knowledge of the freedman Orange, and know him to be a great knave and his statements entitled to no respect whatever. We feel confident that if the facts had been fully inquired into, his complaint would have been found frivolous, and the necessity for military interference obviated.

The Jackson (Miss.) Standard learns that a rich old bachelor in a neighboring city married a beautiful young lady recently; and that before the ceremony took place, he "drew up the legal documents donating his intended $400,000 in cash and property," as an offset for his old age and many sins.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT.—One day last week Zoph Farrell, living near Salem, in the eastern part of this county, had his left arm caught in the machinery of Shono's mill, and so badly mangled that it had to be amputated just below the elbow. Zoph is well known to members of the old 44th Mississippi, having belonged to company K. He made a good soldier, and the arm just amputated was disabled by a wound received at Chickamauga.—Holly Springs Reporter.

The Jackson (Miss.) Standard of the 20th inst. announces the death of Dr. M. C. Russell, of that city.

The Port Gibson Standard, of the 20th, says:

It is reported that Col. Osmond, or Osburn, who commanded in the raid made on this place at the time so many of our citizens were carried off and imprisoned, was found dead in his bed, on his plantation in Bolivar county, his throat having been cut. No clue has been discovered as to the perpetrator of the deed.

FOUND DEAD.—A negro man belonging to the estate of Wm. Young, was found dead in the pasture, about a mile from Mrs. Young's residence, on Wednesday. His back was filled with buckshot, indicating that he had been murdered. His name was Barnett. He formerly belonged to Edin Brashear, and was given to Mrs. Young in 1839. What fiendish cruelty could have prompted the killing of this old and faithful servant?

ALABAMA.

THE APPRENTICE BILL.

Gov. Patton has very properly vetoed the Appropriation Bill on the broad ground that it is class legislation, and that the present provisions of the Code cover the whole apprentice question. It must be plain at this time to the whole community that class legislation is bad policy, because it saddles us with the Freedmen's Bureau for an indefinite time, and gives the Radicals a stick with which to break our heads. If it could be demonstrated that distinctive laws were necessary to secure order, the case might be different; but the progress of events proves that the dangers which we imagined to be threatening are vanishing. Hence, as a question of policy, the Governor is right. It is the part of prudence to regain by diplomacy what we lost by arms—civil law.

Col. Bethea in attacking the Governor's veto, said that he would never be instrumental in placing the negro upon a social and political equality with the white man—as though it were necessary to pass distinctive laws to prevent such equality. No act of the Legislature of Alabama, general or special, can make the negro a social or political equal of the white man. The Constitution settles the political question, and society determines the social question. If the old Apprentice law binds out a white boy and a negro boy in the same way, it does not elevate one in the scale of society or depress the other in the scale of politics.

If the Committee on Ways and Means should provide in the revenue bill that all male persons, indistinctive of color, shall be taxed per capita, Mr. Bethea would certainly not contend that the fact of the negro paying his dollar poll tax place him upon a social and political equality with the white man who pays his dollar. The operation of a law may be general and equal while the parties subject to its operation may be socially and politically unequal. The Constitution of Alabama fixes the political inferiority of all races in this State to the Caucasian; and so long as the rulers, the courts, the juries, the magistrates and the mental vigor of the land remains with the Caucasian race, all fear may be dismissed as to social and political equality being established by binding out apprentices under a general law.

We sincerely hope that the Legislature will sustain the Governor's veto. Their constituents have no fears as to the "social and political equality" of races, but have many fears that the passage of special laws will retard reconstruction, and give the authorities at Washington an excuse for retaining the Freedmen's Bureau.

The fact that Mississippi has passed special laws proves nothing, except that immediately after their passage the military authorities took exclusive control of the negroes, and disturbed society to such an extent that outrages have been perpetrated in that State to which Alabama has been a stranger.—Montgomery Advertiser.

PETROLEUM.—The Montgomery Advertiser, in an article on the resources of Alabama and the domestic channels for investment of capital, says:

A company, under the presidency of E. C. Hanson, is now organized in this city. An immense number of acres of land, in the very heart of the coal region of the State, and where according to geological survey, the beds of iron, coal and slate are almost inexhaustible, has been leased by this company. The company obtained a liberal charter before the recess, and at the office correct maps and surveys of the portion of Alabama where petroleum is most likely to be found can be seen, and most valuable information derived by those who desire to enter into the business.

LADIES WILL "GOAK."—One of the "bureau" officials, while travelling in the cars in Alabama, noticed a lady with a negro girl in attendance, and he remarked, "Madam, I see that you have one of my children." "Yes, sir," replied the lady, "I perceive the resemblance." A slight tittering was observed in that portion of the car. The "bureau" was somewhat appeased when a friend informed him that it was only a new version of "how like his father," which the ladies are prone to observe on the appearance of a new baby.

DEATH IN A BALL ROOM.—At a social assembly, in the old Masonic Hall, in West Cambridge, Mass., a sudden death put a hasty end to the festivities. As Mrs. James Durgin was taking her place on the floor to participate in a cotillion, she fell and expired almost instantly. The lady was much esteemed by her neighbors and friends, and her family have the sympathy of a large circle at their sudden and severe bereavement.

MOBILE NEWS.

HEAVY STORM.—We were visited by a regular young hurricane night before last. The wind carried locks window shutters and sidings through the air at a fearful velocity. The lightning flashed wildly through the window panes, and Heaven's artillery shook the city, followed at interval by torrents of rain. The sky presented a panorama of terrific grandeur. The "moon scene," however, was left out, being "a hand short," no doubt. (vide A. Ward.) So far as we were able to learn, no damage was done, but a number of boats were swept from their moorings. Such storms are in strange contrast with the north-westers we read of up North about this time.—Register, 21st inst.

From the Register of the 23d inst. we make up the following:

Lieut. Gen. Hardee, late of the Confederate army, is now in this city.

Mayor Withers is at Montgomery for the purpose of laying the new city charter before the Legislature.

The Hexter trial will be resumed on the 5th of February, when the depositions of parties residing North will be adduced in evidence for the defence.

ARRIVAL OF TROOPS.—Two companies of the 15th Infantry arrived in this city yesterday, and will join the First Battalion in the duties of provost guard.

CHEAP ENOUGH.—It only costs ten dollars to cowhide a man in this city.

NEGRO LABOR.—The demand for negro labor is daily increasing. The Work-house is being rapidly depleted, and vagrant negroes are being picked up daily in large numbers by the police. All applications will be attended to by the Freedmen's Bureau or municipal authorities.

Cotton stealing continues as "lively" as ever, notwithstanding the exertions of the police to suppress it. Many negroes are hired by the Government to pick up loose cotton, or get permission from the military authorities, and under this guise they extend their field of labor to cotton belonging to citizens. It seems to be a regular mania, and the negroes are not the only ones infected.

The city authorities say they are determined on breaking up cotton stealing. All we have to say is—"save the pieces."

RUNAWAY AND COLLISION.—We are informed that the two engines, Forty-seven and Sydney Smith, used for switching on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, came in collision on Saturday evening a short distance from the depot. The Sydney Smith was completely destroyed, and the Forty-seven badly shattered. Our informant understood that the Forty-seven ran off from one of the stations, a few miles out from this place. Fortunately, no one was injured.

The municipal authorities are furnishing planters and others with negroes. The demand at present exceeds the supply.

Improvements are being made on every hand, preparatory to the spring business. A number of business houses are being enlarged and otherwise improved. We are also gratified to observe that many of our citizens are repairing and painting their residences. The trees, shrubbery, gardens and door yards are also receiving a proper share of attention, and will soon assume a fresh and beautiful appearance. There are no vacant houses in the city, and all of the dilapidated dwellings have been repaired and put in good condition.

GEORGIA.

LOSS OF THE STEAMER CHRISTOPHER.—We learn from purser Farr, of the steamer Wm. G. Gibbons, that the steamer James Christopher, which had gone to take the cargo off the steamer R. H. May, was totally destroyed by fire about one mile above Martin's Landing.—Augusta, Ga., Constitutionalist, 16th inst.

SCHOONER ON FIRE.—The schooner Messenger, Capt. Holding, loaded with lime, arrived at this port yesterday. On the 7th inst. the Messenger took fire, and her hatches, etc., were immediately battened. Capt. Holding is of opinion that the fire has been smothered. The captain and crew have, since the 7th inst., remained on deck, all access to the cabin and their clothing, provisions, etc., having been securely sealed, with a view to save the vessel and her cargo.—Savannah Herald, 13th inst.

The steamer Asher Ayres, with 1023 bales cotton on board, while making her first trip from Hawkinsville, Ga., on the Savannah river, was destroyed by fire on the 9th inst. One negro woman, with her three children, two negro men and a Portuguese boy, named Johnny, deck hand, were lost. The steamer's papers were also lost.

A REMARKABLE REGION.

An expedition against the Powder river (Oregon) Indians passed through a very remarkable tract of country, which is described by Mr. L. G. Bennett, Engineer. Rising from the plain, sometimes to the altitude of five hundred feet, were masses of hard clay, in the form of pyramids or ruined temples, crowned with spires and minarets, and worn by the winds into a variety of fantastic shapes. Often these huge masses of clayey rock were standing in the midst of the plain, isolated and alone. At other times they stretched away in long ranges of bare hills. Veins of trap rock traverse these hills, while on the plain around them are scattered iron, (quartz, scoriæ, and various crystalized and ingeous rocks, indicating the action of heat. On their summits and around their base are found fragments and sometimes almost perfect fossils of marine and other animals, the most common of which were turtles. Many of those seen by Mr. Bennett were three feet across, and one that measured seven feet across the shell.

Other parties reported seeing one that measured sixteen feet across. These have generally fallen down from the cliffs, and are more or less mutilated, but enough remains to show the outlines and determine the size of these monsters of a former age. Mastodon bones and enormous teeth are common. Among the petrifactions of a more recent period was a wolf, nearly entire.

On the ridges separating the Elk, Bear, Minnilwak, Si and Bear Butte creeks, were found large masses of fossil fish and other marine animals, some of a huge size. Often the hills seemed entirely composed of these remains. Exposure to the air and storms have broken them into fragments, yet the outlines of turtles, shell fish and orthoceræ could be distinctly traced. The region presents indications both of volcanic action and of a deluge.

OUR STANDING ARMY.—We entreat Congress to ponder long and anxiously, before consenting to pass Gen. Wilson's bill, proposing to increase the personnel of our regular army to some seventy thousand men. If that bill becomes a law, at least thirty millions per annum will be added by it to the taxes of our people; and for what? "To add forty thousand men to our army," say you? Then you are grievously mistaken. We shall, at most, have but the skeleton of an army; officers without soldiers; regiments on the books dwindled to companies on parade; bloodless, fleshless skeletons, with bony jaws, grinning at the folly which called them into being. Men in Congress! save us from this costly illusion!

Ample experience proves that the ranks of our little army of fifteen to twenty thousand, never were nor could be kept full in time of peace; they were often scarcely half full. Now, war is going out of fashion; and every man in our ranks, beyond the first twenty thousand, will have cost $500 by the time he has fairly joined his regiment. Then why expand? We are groaning under unprecedented taxation, which must be yet more severely felt, as prices decline towards a specie standard. Economists in Congress! save us from the passage of this most needlessly oppressive measure.—N. Y. Tribune.

MARRIAGE EXTRAORDINAIRE.—Parson Bates, well known as a conductor on the Mississippi and Tennessee Railroad, on Friday last, stopped the train going south on that road at Nesbitt's Station, and there married Mr. Marshall Jones, of Panola, to Miss Ellen Nesbitt. Of course, those on the train were participators in the merriment that followed, and our informant tells us that the wedding cake, with wine, etc., was freely divided to all, and joy ruled the hours that passed until Grenada was reached.—Memphis Commercial, 21st inst.

The journal of preceding day was read and approved.

The resolution of Mr. Eustis, of New Orleans, asking that a special committee of nine be appointed, to whom shall be referred all amendments to the Constitution of 1864, came up for consideration.

Mr. Enstis, of New Orleans, addressed the House in support of the resolution. He said that in the late extra session of the Legislature, it was thought imprudent and impolitic, by the committee to whom was referred the subject of calling a Convention, to incur the heavy expense necessary to effect such an object, and that, therefore, the matter had been indefinitely postponed. But as there existed so many reasons why some amendments should be made to the Constitution of 1864, such as to provide for the legality of marriages, deeds of sale, and the like, which had been effected during the war in that part of the State which was not within the Federal lines, and which marriages and sales were not recognized as legal by the Constitution as it now stands. His object in proposing the resolution was to have a special committee appointed, whose single duty it would be to receive, consider and carefully digest all amendments to the Constitution that might be proposed in the House. In this way, they could partly accomplish those changes demanded by the people.

Mr. Jonas, of New Orleans, moved to lay the resolution on the table. He regarded it as an attempt to dodge the question of Convention or no Convention. He maintained that the committee of the extra session alluded to by Mr. Eustis had not finally acted upon the matter of calling a Convention, but had merely postponed it till the regular meeting of the Assembly, in consideration of the fact that so many matters of a pressing nature were before them, and in reference to which they had been more particularly called in extra session. He was in favor of immediate action on the direct question of Convention or no Convention. The Convention would effect all the objects aimed at by the resolution of Mr. Eustis in a more complete and satisfactory manner. He was one of those who had made pledges to his constituents that he would use his best efforts to have a Convention called, as was their urgent desire, and he intended to stand by those pledges. There was no necessity whatever for such a committee as that proposed by Mr. Eustis, because a standing committee was already in existence for the special purpose of receiving and acting upon all amendments of the kind.

Mr. Tucker, of St. Mary, said it was his impression at the time the Committee on Convention reported in the extra session, that the question was merely postponed till the regular session. It was deemed inexpedient to act on the matter then, but he considered it the imperative duty of the Legislature to act on it now, and act quickly. It was almost unanimously demanded by the people and by all the great interests of the State. There was other business of importance before this body than undertaking the great task of amending the Constitution of 1864. There is no power in this Legislature capable of breathing life into that Constitution which never had a legitimate existence—the people alone can do that. He called upon the Legislature not to be laggard in this matter of calling a Convention, and leaving to it the work of forming a Constitution that shall be the legitimate instrument of the people. It should be called at the earliest moment possible. He was in favor of having the matter come before the House at once.

Mr. Thieneman said in his opinion a change had come over the people on the subject of calling a Convention. At first they thought the State would be re-admitted into the Union; but as such has not been the case, and our Senators and Representatives have been refused admission into Congress, he thought the people was very generally of opinion that it would be idle in the present uncertain state of affairs to call a Convention, when they have no guarantee that the Constitution which might be then adopted would be recognized as valid at Washington.

Mr. Elam said the Constitution of 1864 was legitimate and binding as a consequence of the conquest of the State by the Federal authorities. He doubted the wisdom of putting the State to the expense of calling a Convention under the present aspect of affairs, but he had no objection to the resolution of Mr. Eustis.

Mr. Fenner, of New Orleans, regarded the resolution of Mr. Eustis as invidiously reflecting upon the members of the Standing Committee, whose duty it was to act upon all proposed amendments to the Constitution. Its adoption would be equivalent to an expression of want of confidence in said committee.

Mr. McConnell said that as chairman of the Committee on Convention, he would state there was no intention of pressing that matter before the Assembly at present, as they deemed it unwise to do so in view of the position of affairs at Washington. He was opposed to any attempt to amend the Constitution of 1864, because such amending would at once make it the legitimate Constitution of the State, though it was known to be a wholesale fraud upon the people.

Mr. Eustis denied that in his resolution he intended any want of confidence in the Standing Committee alluded to by Mr. Fenner. His sole idea in asking for a special committee was that they might be selected with a particular reference to this subject, and that it would be their special duty to carefully consider and act upon all amendments to the Constitution that might be proposed. He was in favor of calling a Convention; but if expediency postpones the call, he was desirous, by his resolution, of effecting some remedies now demanded by the interests of the people. Some changes in the Constitution are needed at once—hence his resolution.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was then put to a vote. The yeas and nays were then called for, with the following result: Yeas—37; Nays—44.

The motion to lay on the table being lost, Mr. Jonas offered a substitute, directing that all proposed amendments to the Constitution be sent to the regular Standing Committee, and not to a new special committee.

Upon motion of Mr. Elam the substitute was laid on the table. Yeas 44, nays 37.

Mr. McConnell then tendered his resignation as chairman of the Standing Committee on Convention, as the business of said committee was now transferred to another.

Upon this a motion was made to reconsider the motion to lay Mr. Jonas's substitute on the table, the result of which was 36 for and 36 against. The speaker decided the matter in the affirmative.

In this condition of the matter, a motion to adjourn, till 12 o'clock to-day, was made by Mr. Fenner, which was adopted.

Mr. Jonas withdrew his motion. Mr. Eustis then withdrew his resolution.

Considerable debate followed, in which Messrs. Bailey, Scanlan and —— objected to the withdrawal of the resolution of Mr. Eustis. Messrs. Tucker and McCloskey spoke in favor of its withdrawal. A rising vote was taken whether or no Mr. Eustis would be permitted to withdraw his resolution, when it was decided to grant the withdrawal.

Sagacity of the Mule.—An incident occurred on the 1st, says the St. Louis Republican, illustrating the fact that mules are not only the most sagacious of all four-legged animals, but they sometimes do things on purely scientific principles. A drove of about two hundred of these large-minded beasts were brought to the Illinois shore, opposite this city, and it was concerted that the best way to get them across was to start them on the ice and let them walk over. As soon as they reached the ice, instinct taught them that they had embarked on a dangerous journey, and instantly the oldest mule in the drove—one, too, that had never been at a circus, and had no education, and one at a time, the whole two hundred "fell in" and followed their leader in single file, with safe spaces between, and thus stretching themselves into a long line, they crossed the river. The circumstance was witnessed by a number of gentlemen who were impressed with the wonderful illustration of mule sagacity.

Financial and Commercial.

MONETARY.

Office of the Christian Advocate, New Orleans, Friday, Jan. 26, 1866.

The most prominent feature in the financial movement to-day, was a still further advance in rates of domestic exchange.

Gold opened at yesterday's closing quotations—130½@140, and continued within these limits through out the day. As heretofore, the market was amply supplied, but the demand was of a very restricted character, from the opening to the close. The following comprise the whole of the sales that have been authenticated to our satisfaction, viz: $3000, $4000, $5000, $6000, $10,000 and $10,000 at 139½; $15,000 at 139⅝; $10,000 at 139¾, and $6000, $6000 and $6000 at 140. In silver, the movement was again confined to driblets, and no sales of importance transpired in either American or foreign coin. We still quote gold at 130½@140, and silver at 133@137 for American coin, and 138½@139½ for Mexican dollars.

Foreign exchange has exhibited no quotable variation to-day. The market was fairly supplied through out, and the movement, as for several days past, was confined to only a few buyers. We subjoin the principal sales, viz: £4000 at 106¾ for gold; £1000 at 147¾; £250 at 147½; $10,000 Liverpool marginal credits, taken by one bank, at 148; £500, £2000 and £2200 at 148¼; £2000 at 148½@148¾; and £2000 at 148¾@149. In frame the movement was rather free, and the sales included 75,000f. at 3.77½@3.78¾ for bank; 50,000, 65,000 and 100,000f. at 3.80; and 260,000f., taken by one bank, at the same figure; and 100,000f. at 3.81¼. We still quote sterling as 149@149¾ at bank; clear bills 147@148; and bill of lading bills 145@146; and francs as 3.75@3.75¾ at bank, and 3.82½@3.81¼ in the outdoor market.

Domestic exchange has still further advanced today. The checking rate at bank was ¼ ₱ cent. up to noon, but at that hour most of them put up the rate to ¾ ₱ cent., at which figure operations were subsequently effected up to the close of business. The counter demand was uniformly active and steady, and the outdoor supply, which exhibited a decided increase, was taken by buyers at the annexed figures, viz: $50,000 at ⅞ ₱ cent. discount for New York sight; $125,000 do., taken by a bank, at ¾@¾ ₱ cent. discount; $25,000 and $60,000 at 9-16; $50,000, $63,000 and $70,000—the latter bank checks—at ½; $12,000 1 day's sight at ½; $6000 5 days' sight at the same; $20,600 3 days' sight at ⅝; and $15,000 and $25,000 30 days' sight at 1¼ ₱ cent. discount. The quotations at the close of business this evening are as follows: New York sight, ½@¾ at bank and 9-16@11-16 out of doors; 5@10 days' sight, ⅝@1 ₱ cent. discount; 15@20 days' sight, 1⅛@1½ ₱ cent. discount, and 30 days' sight, 1¾ ₱ cent. discount.

Stocks and bonds have been inactive to-day; offerings were light throughout, and the movement was restricted. 0 shares Carrollton R. R. at 88 ₱ cent. by the party who sold 100 shares of the same yesterday at 86 ₱ share; 35 shares City Railroad, with privilege and dividend at 187½, and $12,000 city bonds to railroads at 80.

Uncurrent bank notes have been almost wholly neglected since our last. The market was but nominally supplied at best, and the only sale that has been satisfactorily verified for us was one of $2000 Union Bank and Bank of New Orleans, mixed, at 89c. We still quote Crescent City Bank, Bank of New Orleans and Union Bank at 85@90c., Merchants' Bank 75@77c., and Louisiana State at 72@75c. ₱ dollar.

COMMERCIAL.

Office of the Christian Advocate, New Orleans, Friday, Jan. 26, 1866.

COTTON—The market opened this morning with a rather active and general demand, which having been freely met by factors at yesterday's closing rates, resulted in sales before 2 o'clock P. M. of 3373 bales, divided among buyers in the following order, viz: 1000, 600, 600, 300, 200, 150, 100, 100, 100, 73, 70 and 20 bales. The Press dispatches published in the evening papers brought operations to a standstill, however, and subsequently no business was transacted, so far as we have been able to ascertain. The dispatches referred to above report a decline of ⅛@1d. in the cotton at Liverpool on the 12th inst., with sales for the week ending that day of only 50,000 bales, the latter evidently being an error. Advices of this morning from the New York market also came to hand, but they were of too ambiguous a character to have any effect upon the market. In a day or two we may probably feel the influence of the Liverpool news, but thus far it has only developed a more general determination on the part of factors to resist further concessions. We would repeat yesterday's quotations as having been the rates at which the principal movement was transacted to-day, but it is hardly necessary to add, that in the present condition of the market, they cannot be regarded as better than nominal, viz: Ordinary 38@40c., good ordinary 43@44c., low middling 46@47c., and middling 49@49c.

SUGAR AND MOLASSES—The receipts since yesterday comprise 103 hhds. sugar and 381 bbls. and 84 half bbls. molasses. A good demand has prevailed for both sugar and molasses at very stiff prices, with sales of some 300 hhds. of the former at 13c. for common, 13½c. for fair, 14½c. for fair to good fair, 14@14¾c. for seconds, and 15¼c. ₱ lb for strictly prime, and of the latter, about 400 bbls. sold at 83c. for prime, 90c. for strictly prime and 94c. ₱ gallon for choice, together with 60 half bbls. on private terms.

WESTERN PRODUCE—The market for flour is not quite as firm to-day, while grain exhibits no alteration whatever. We append the particulars of to-day's transactions.

FLOUR—Only a moderate demand prevailed to-day, with sales of about 1800 bbls at $7 25@$7 50 for superfine, $8 25 for superfine, $9 50@11 for extra and $13 ₱ bbl for choice. Yesterday, not previously reported, 1200 bbls. at the above ranges.

CORN—We noticed a good inquiry both for the local trade and for shipment, resulting in sales of some 8500 sacks, including 4000 at —, 1375 mixed at $1 07½, 1500 yellow at $1 10, and 1250 white at $1 15 ₱ bushel.

OATS—The transactions comprise 1000 sacks at 50c. ₱ bushel.

BRAN—We heard of sales to-day of 575 sacks, including 275 and 300 sacks at $1 70 ₱ 100 lbs.

HAY—We noticed considerable movement to-day, resulting in sales of 700 bales Western at $25 ₱ ton.

PROVISIONS—We notice only a jobbing trade at yesterday's rates for oven weight mess. Bacon and lard command previous figures. We refer our readers to the annexed particulars for the condition of our market:

PORK—The stock of old is nearly exhausted, and new is retailing at $33 ₱ bbl. We noticed a sale today of 150 bbls. full weight at $31 75 ₱ bbl. Prime mess is scarce, and commands $30 ₱ bbl.

BACON—We have no alteration to notice in our quotations. Ribbed sides are scarce; shoulders and clear sides in fair supply, and commanding 14@15c. for the former and 20c. ₱ lb for the latter.

LARD—There is a fair demand for this commodity; 18c. was offered and refused for round lots of prime in tierces. The retail rates are 18½@19c. in tierces and 19½@20 ₱ lb in kegs.

COFFEE—Dealers are supplying the demand at 28c. for ordinary, 29@29½c. for fair, and 31c. currency, for prime to choice Rio.

WHISKY—Rectified is selling in small parcels at 32@35 ₱ gallon.

SUNDRIES—We quote Western butter at 30@40c.; Northern do. at 45@50c. ₱ lb, Northern cheese 20@23c., English dairy 24@28c. ₱ lb; full weight star candles 24@25c., short weight do. 20@21c. ₱ lb; soap 10@15c. and starch 5@13c. ₱ lb.

GUNNY BAGS—There is but little demand, a few small lots are selling at 30c. for second and 35c. ₱ piece for new.

SOAP—50 boxes sold to-day at 10c. ₱ lb.

ESCULENTS—Potatoes are selling at $4@$4 15; onions at $3 50@$4; and apples $1@$7 ₱ bbl.

BAGGING AND ROPE—There is no movement whatever; quotations are merely nominal, and for the present we omit them.

FREIGHTS—Owing to the abundant offerings of steamship accommodation coastwise, freight by sailing vessels cannot be reported as much better than nominal. The rate for cotton to New York by steam is ⅛c.; and to Boston 1-16 ₱ lb. Freight agents ask ¼@⅜c. for cotton, by sailing vessels, to the above ports. The rate by steamship to Liverpool is ½d., at which the Alabama is now loading. By sailing vessels, the rate to Liverpool is rather firm, at 11-16@¾d., and to Havre at 1½c. There is no flour going forward to the North or to Europe, and we therefore omit quotations for that article, as they are only calculated to mislead parties interested.

PREACHING.

There are few subjects upon which there is a greater diversity of opinion, than upon "pulpit efforts." One hearer says of a sermon, as he goes from the church—"very fair;" another, "excellent;" third, "splendid," &c. Now, what is the standard by which these persons judge the discourse? The first regards it simply in the light of an intellectual effort—a display of mind on the part of the preacher. Its character for evangelism—its influence upon the spiritual interests and destiny of the hearers are left entirely out of the account.—He may have regarded it as a literary or elocutionary production. Not a sermon designed for either of these spheres, is as much out of place as a tropical flower in the frigid zone. A pulpit performance that descends into the arena of ordinary literary criticism, and covets the application of its rules and standards, ceases to be a sermon. It may be a fine lecture—it may have furnished pleasurable excitement—be a graceful entertainment—entirely innocent in morals; but it has no claim to be regarded as an Gospel. Of such an effort, made by a popular minister, accustomed to draw large congregations, a highly cultivated and pious man remarked "Brother C., my soul would starve under such preaching as that." It bought no spiritual food; yet, could pass the ordeal of criticism.

Sermons are not to be slovenly in thought and diction, or ungrammatical. We abhor such; and the man who persists in such, ought to be made to vacate a place of which he is unworthy. Those who describe sermons as "splendid," for the most part regard them as an entertainment, during which time passes pleasantly, and designed to produce repose. The moral effect, the spiritual necessities of the hearers, are never considered. If the sermon could, in connection with its literary qualities, have brought eternal things impressively to view; if their spiritual history had begun to gather brightness, and the moans of a coming tempest had been heard in the distance, how differently the preacher would have been viewed, and the sermon described!

In considering different sermons, while not every one has a classification of his own. In my own mind, I have arranged those I have heard under the following heads:

1. Platitudes. I have placed under this head those—and I am glad to say the number has been small—which were not only decidedly flat, but showed an utter want of ideas and sense. The mind of the speaker seemed to be a vacuum, and the fire without fire. For where there is really no preaching power or can be, if the fire of God is in the heart, no man can be flat. It will kindle itself, and the tears, prayers, and groans that cannot be uttered, make men feel that something is wrong. Where there is a want of all these, the case is dreadful. All dullness in preaching is sin!

2. Commonplace. This is the next step above the other.—In these cases there were ideas, but they were only such as had been received by absorption and indolent attention. The men never took the trouble to think. They took no pains to prepare for preaching, beyond the time necessary to find their text; and it matters little what that is, for they are about as much alike one as another. For such material, they rely upon what may happen to occur to them while in the pulpit. To thinking minds such performances have neither power nor interest. It is hard for them to avoid a feeling of contempt and they are only saved from it by a feeling of pity. To the mass of hearers there is no profit. If the sentiments uttered, though commonplace, have only been in a divine bath, they would have come forth gilded and refined, and so been acceptable. But the man who habitually utters commonplaces in the pulpit, is the man who lives at a distance from God's throne.

3. Common Sense. There may be no originality, properly speaking, no genius in the sermon; but we see that the ideas of the discourse have not passed through the mind in the crude state in which they received them from others. They have been recast and remoulded, and appear as though the speaker's own thoughts. And though nobody was specially edified, all are pleased, who can be satisfied with a sermon. There is nothing flat, nothing commonplace; and though there is nothing profound, yet there is good sense throughout, and matter for reflection and matter that will profit.—Good common sense preaching is profitable preaching—let us have it all the time.

4. Fresh and vigorous. This kind of preaching is not common. It is the result of the application of a well-disciplined mind to judicious reading—to close, independent thought, in which the man ignores for the time, until he has thoroughly canvassed the subject—all that has been said or written upon it. He places himself in such a position in regard to the subject in hand that he can take in its proportions, relations and teachings, and grasps the principles embraced by it with a strong hand.—His utterances, when they do not present new truths, present old ones in new and striking lights, and new combinations; and the whole is so stamped with the impress of the speaker's mind and thought, that it has a peculiar freshness about it.—Such a speaker has no use for stock phrases as substitutes for ideas, or verbal pontoons to span chasms void of thought. When he has nothing to say he has done.

To attain to this style of preaching requires, in addition to the requisite natural endowments, more patient thought and systematic labor than most men are willing to bestow upon subjects. I do not mean to be understood to say that the beginner is to ignore the labors of others. I mean only that he must learn to think independently of them and use them only as helps.

5. Grand. This style of preaching is so rare that it hardly requires description. It is recognized by all whenever met. It is the result of a combination of intellect, thought, study and prayer, aided by the special presence of the Holy Spirit. And when of the highest order, is the highest of all intellectual achievements—not only as it deals in matters of the utmost importance to man, and more mightily moves him than any other appeal, but that it deals in the grandest themes that ever employ mind, whether of angel or man, and deals with those themes with more ability than others ever display.

My preaching brother, under which head do you range? H.

RECEIVING MEMBERS INTO THE CHURCH.

I think it probable that the coming General Conference will abolish the Probationary System in our Church. In view of such a result, the Louisiana Conference passed a resolution praying the General Conference to establish a solemn and uniform method for the reception of members into the communion of our Church.

There will doubtless be considerable interest felt in relation to the nature of this "solemn and uniform method." To suggest something, and if it may be, call forth something better, I propose a plan for consideration. I would adopt a solemn form of address to candidates for admission, questions to be asked, and vows taken. Let this form have general publicity through our Church papers, the Discipline, and if need be, in a small tract, in large type, for general distribution. So that all persons desiring to attach themselves to our Church may know the form and requirements of reception.

For example—let the Pastor say to a candidate for admission: "We devoutly trust that you have seriously and with prayerful solemnity considered the gravity and importance of the step you now take. The Church of God, into which you now visibly and openly enter, is the most ancient, the most honorable and useful association on earth. It is an institution of Divine origin, purchased with the blood of God, preserved through perils and ages, and is destined to last forever. In taking this solemn step you follow an illustrious company of Apostles, the noble army of Martyrs, and all who through patience, suffering and triumphant faith have overcome the world and have entered into rest. The Church is the light of the world—let your light so shine that men may take knowledge that you have been with Jesus and have learned of Him. Holiness becometh God's house; adorn by innocency of life your holy profession; giving all diligence to make your calling and election sure; always maintaining the form and cherishing the power of godliness, and praying for the peace of Jerusalem.

We now propound to you the following questions; if you adopt them, you will repeat the answers after us:

1. Have you faith in God?

The answer is—"I have."

2. Have you faith in Christ as the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe?

The answer is—"I have."

3. Will you endeavor, in humble and hearty reliance upon the promises of God and the gracious assistance of the Holy Spirit, to be faithful unto death?

The answer is—"I will so endeavor."

4. Do you accept the government of the Church, as set forth in our Book of Discipline, and will you abide thereby?

The answer is—"I will."

Then the Pastor shall say—"Beloved, by authority of my sacred office, as an ambassador for Christ and minister of the Church, I receive you into the goodly fellowship of saints and the communion of the Church of God. Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God and of Jesus, our Lord."

We think some such form will be more impressive than the present method. The act of church-joining will, with some such service, be felt to be what in fact it is, one of the gravest and grandest acts of life.—The candidate for admission into the communion of the church feels, at the solemn hour of his espousals, like taking solemn vows, and making a holy covenant with God.

The questions we have proposed are somewhat general; and we would have them so, in order that experimental and individual peculiarities may not be embarrassed and barred. If we establish some particular standard of experimental attainment, we shall hinder, if not bar the door of the Church to some modest and humble souls, that might feel it presumptuous or untrue for them to claim such an experience.

I am by no means specially wedded to the form here presented. I have presented it as a suggestion, in order to awaken attention to the subject and elicit the thoughts of others. W.

THE ANCIENT JEWISH YEAR OF JUBILEE.

Of all the Jewish institutions, no one was more remarkable, more interesting or valuable in its uses, than the institution of the year of Jubilee.

This institution was intended chronologically to mark the revolutions of time into periods of fifty years. It was also intended to preserve the genealogies of tribes and families. But its grand purpose was to maintain that general equality of social and financial position originally contemplated in the settlement and division of the Promised Land. It was for this purpose an infinitely wiser contrivance than any of the Socialist theories of modern times, with which philosophers have vainly sought to equalize the condition of mankind. This institution was not intended to drag down and reduce the rich, but to elevate and render comfortable the poor; or rather to prevent abject and extreme poverty altogether. This institution, which contemplated the restoration of all landed property and homesteads once in fifty years to their original proprietors, did no wrong to any one. It was a public arrangement and known to every citizen. In all buying and selling of real estate, this great fact was recognized, and the value of the land estimated by the number of years to elapse from the sale to the year of Jubilee, when such lands would revert to their original owners.

Under this gracious arrangement, no family in Israel could ever be hopelessly reduced. It could not be many years until the owners of the land, or at the furthest their children, would be restored to its possession. This fact would prevent the family from losing caste to any considerable extent in their social relations. Their neighbors would recognize the fact that they were of an ancient and honorable stock, and they would in a few years be restored to their former position and independence. Their temporary poverty would not seriously affect their social intercourse, or mar their prospects and wishes in forming matrimonial connections.

This institution, then, must have operated to maintain the dignity of families and the self-respect of individuals. They would not be likely to abandon themselves to dishonor, knowing, as they did, that brighter fortunes awaited them.—They would struggle to maintain their social rank and be worthy of their position.

The whole working of this institution was adapted to create and maintain a high sentiment of individuality and self-respect. This we are wont to regard as one of the peculiar excellences of our institutions; they develop and recognize each man's individuality; that each, politically considered, is the equal of any one of all; and that all are alike equal before the law, in its justice and in its fostering regards.

No institution could have been more promotive of patriotism than this, which secured to families, by an inalienable right, their revered and beloved homesteads. These homesteads continued in the possession of the same family for centuries. The venerable man of three score and ten sat beneath the shades planted by his ancestors, and under whose boughs he had sported in childhood. There flowed the fountain from which his forefathers, in ages past, dipped the cooling draught; and where oft, in heat and weariness, through many long years he had come to be refreshed. Around him spread the plains, and rose the hills—scenes with which he had been familiar all his days.—Such surroundings, and such gentle and holy memories, must have inspired an interest and cultivated an intense love for their homes, and their country, which we can scarcely realize. Few among us could be found who would not for sufficient price sell their homes. Few among us die where they were born. This universal spirit of change no doubt promotes and fans to a flame the spirit of enterprize; but it is more than questionable whether we can say so much for its beneficial influence upon patriotism, and individual dignity and stability of character. FROM WESTERN ALABAMA.

New Year—The Dead—Edwin Cull—Dr. Sassnett—R. A. Baker—The Church at Greensboro, Ala.

Mr. Editor—A happy New Year to you, and a prosperous one to the Advocate. It looks like a biting irony to write of happy and prosperous New Years; but let us, by the grace of God, make the year happy and prosperous. According to Faber, Cumming and other prophets, this year—606 plus 1260 equals 1866, Q. E. D.—is the grand Millennial Year. But you and I know better, and it may not be amiss for sober and sensible men to explode and refute the mischievous and baseless fancies of those visionaries.

It is demonstrably false that Jesus Christ will make a bodily advent to our earth before the millennium. He will do no such thing.—That is a negative which I will engage to prove when circumstances favor the undertaking.

I have just been meditating on the mortality among the great and good of the world since we of the South were en rapport with the rest of mankind. I wish you would take the pains to make out a necrology for the past five years. What names will you have in the list!—Isaac Taylor's will be there. What an exquisitely beautiful tribute to the memory of that wonderful man was that of your gifted correspondent, Tullius!

Since the war, I have received a letter informing me of the death of a young kinsman of mine, Edwin Cull—the author of some admirable papers on the Greek Tragedy, which appeared in the Quarterly Review of the M. E. Church South, a little before the war. He was a graduate of Columbian College, Washington, D. C., and a Tutor of Languages after his graduation. To fit himself more fully for the Professor's chair, he repaired to Berlin to pursue his studies in that University. There he died of consumption, in November, 1862. His brother and brother-in-law—a Baptist minister—reached Berlin four days after his death, and took his remains to Washington, where they now lie with those of his kindred in the Congress Cemetery. My correspondent says—"Edwin would shortly have received the degree of Doctor of Philology. Although our best scholars, such as President Felton, of Harvard, &c., had tried to get that honor, none of them had succeeded, and no American has ever been able to obtain it from the University of Berlin. He was considered by the best scholars of Berlin the most wonderful and best scholar in America.—He was spoken of in the highest terms and with the greatest enthusiasm by all the scholars of Germany who were acquainted with him. They were astonished to find one so young—not quite 21 years of age—so profoundly learned."—The death of such a young man is a great loss to the country. If the Quarterly should be ever renewed, I expected to get considerable assistance from him, if I had anything to do with its editorial management.

Then there is the death of that great-hearted, noble, intellectual, Christian minister and philosopher, Dr. Sassnett! What a loss have we sustained in his removal to Paradise! What a loss have I sustained! But this is no place for the expression of personal griefs. I hope some competent hand will give us a worthy memoir of our departed friend.

Then, too, there is the death of that great layman, Robert A. Baker, another of my most intimate, much-loved and devoted friends. The whole Southern Methodist Church should go into mourning for Robert A. Baker, and funeral sermons should be preached for him, at least all over the Alabama Conference.—When such a standard-bearer falls, we may well ask, "Who will be baptized for the dead?"

In this connection, I may as well give you the proceedings of a meeting held last night at the parsonage, in reference to this mournful event.

"At a meeting of the Trustees and Faculty of the Southern University, held in Greensboro, Alabama, on the 1st of January, 1866, the Rev. Dr. Wightman was called to the chair and T. N. Lupton appointed Secretary.

The chairman stated the object of the meeting to be to give expression to our feelings in regard to the death of Robert A. Baker.

On motion, a committee of three, consisting of the Rev. Dr. Summers, J. J. Hutchinson and Dr. Wadsworth, was appointed to draft suitable resolutions.

The committee reported the following, which were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas, It has pleased Almighty God to remove from this world, by a sudden death, on December 22d, 1865, our beloved brother, Robert A. Baker, late of Summerfield and Mobile; and

"Whereas, Brother Baker was 'a priace and a great man in our Israel,' foremost in promoting all the interests of the Southern Methodist Church, of which he was a consistent, zealous and extraordinarily useful member from his youth; and

"Whereas, Brother Baker was one of the founders of the Southern University, an ex-President of the Board of Trustees, and a member thereof at the time of his death; therefore,

"Resolved, 1. That we mourn the loss of Robert A. Baker as a great public calamity and an affliction of no ordinary severity to the M. E. Church South.

"2. That we especially deplore the death of Brother Baker, as by it the Southern University has lost one of its earliest and most devoted friends.

"That we request the Chancellor of the University to improve this mournful event by preaching a suitable sermon in the University chapel on July 2d, being the Sunday immediately preceding the next commencement.

"4. That we sympathize with the bereaved family and friends of brother Baker, in the loss which they have sustained by the death of such a husband, father and friend.

"5. That copies of the foregoing be transmitted to the esteemed relict of brother Baker, and to the Southern Christian Advocate and Selma and Mobile papers for publication in their columns.

"On motion, the meeting then adjourned. T. N. Lupton, Sec'y."

I will only add, that Dr. Wightman promises, D. V., to comply with the request in the third resolution.

You will see by the appointments of the Mobile Conference, which I sent you from Mobile, that I am stationed this year at Greensboro. The church here is in a condition similar to that of nearly all our churches in this country. It needs rehabilitation very much. The colored members are loyal to our church, and we have no idea of adopting the suicidal policy of surrendering them to strangers. We shall labor for their salvation as heretofore.

The University is doing well; it has an able and laborious faculty; students are orderly; and the Preparatory Department, under Mr. Hutchinson, is quite prosperous.—The Rev. T. Y. Ramsey, my predecessor in the station, has charge of the Female Academy here, with competent assistants. He deserves and will be likely to realize good success.

I hope the Advocate, under new auspices, will prosper exceedingly. But my sheet is full.

Thos. O. Summers.

LETTER FROM DR. SEHON.

Mr. Editor: Since we parted, I have attended the session of three Annual Conferences.

These re-unions ever delightful to me, are doubly so now, after the seasons of trial and sorrow, through which for years we have passed.

The first was the Kentucky, held in Covington. The Conference was one of great importance and interest, Bishop Kavanaugh presided most ably. I had the pleasure of addressing the Conference on the subject of missions. No missionary money however for the present necessities of the work, was at the command of the General Treasurer; yet I am confident the ensuing year will witness a large increase in missionary zeal and spirit upon the part of the Conference, and a corresponding advance in their annual collections for the cause.

I next attended the Louisville Conference, Russelville, Ky. The Conference was largely attended and was one of the most pleasant and harmonious I ever witnessed. Resolutions were adopted for a more extended and vigorous effort, in favor of the cause the coming year.

The anniversary meeting was largely attended, followed by a good collection. I am confident, that a good report may be expected from this Conference next fall.

This is my own Conference, and you can scarcely conceive the feelings I had—after an absence of four years—to hear my name called, and take my seat again in my own Conference. Sad and fearful have been the changes of the past, but, thank God, peace has once more dawned upon our land, and the future holds out great hope to us, as a church and people.

From this, I passed to the Tennessee Conference, held in Edgefield, opposite Nashville. It was largely attended, and every way a delightful and harmonious session.

A most interesting missionary report was read to the Conference by Dr. Madden, the chairman of the Committee on Missions. Missionary collections were made at the different Methodist Churches after the several sermons of Sabbath evening—and for the times, a reasonable amount was collected.

Bishop Kavanaugh presided here as above at the Louisville Conference, to the entire satisfaction of all the preachers and people.

I am making use of every means in my power to raise funds to pay off the heavy debts which press upon our Treasury. The largest of them, is for the China mission. I am exceedingly anxious that this debt should soon be paid—indeed that all should be. As a church, we will never repudiate a single debt.

We want now $3,000, to send to our missionaries in China. This amount I am now in hopes of soon realizing from the sale of some property which we hold as a society. I would that the ability was mine, and the amount should at once be paid.

If possible, you must aid us in this work, as you always have nobly done heretofore in sustaining the great cause of Missions.

I hope, Providence permitting, to be with you at the session of your Conference and to have then the privilege and pleasure to present the cause to the brethren.

Your paper is every where, a welcome visitor, and I most sincerely wish you could have a support, such as its merits demand. Your agent, Rev. R. A. Hollaud, was faithful to his trust in presenting the claims of the paper; but the heavy claims of similar character from sections nearer home prevented his success to any great extent. E. W. Sehon.

From the St. Louis Christian Advocate.

REV. BISHOP THOMPSON.

Many of the readers of this paper will recollect something of Rev. Dr. Thompson, who for a long period was editor of some or other of the Northern Methodist papers, and who is now one of the Bishops of that Church. Well, some time during the last summer, this Bishop delivered an address before an Educational Convention, held at Delaware, Ohio, in which address he is reported to have used the following language:

"Of the increase of the public wealth, which has been very large since the war began, by reason of the stimulous given to manufactures and commerce, the increased prices of agricultural products, and the opening of new sources of wealth, such as oil wells, our Church has had her full share—perhaps more than her share; for no Church has been more loyal than she, if any as patriotic, active and earnest in suppressing the rebellion. Had she been as indifferent to the rebellion as some sister Churches, the Government could not have carried the nation through a single year of the war. Of the 200,000 men sent to the field of conflict from Ohio, Methodism has had a large share; and, as a consequence, she has had her proportion of the honors and profits of the war. Beginning with Grant, the ablest living General, and, I verily believe, in many respects the equal of Napoleon I, the greatest military genius of modern ages, a long line of army officers have gone from Ohio Methodist families. And when army contracts have been awarded, and grants to purchase cotton in rebellious States have been made, our people have not been altogether indifferent or ignored. Without unduly or dishonestly seeking to profit by the war, the attitude which our Church has borne to the Government has naturally and necessarily increased her wealth."

This is rather a remarkable statement to have been made by one calling himself an overseer in the Church of Christ. It is but seldom that the veriest political tricksters come out so openly in acknowledgment of their portions of the spoils, much less to make a sort of boast thereof. But the Bishop assumes that but for the Northern Methodist Church the Government could not have carried the nation through a single year of the war, and then admits that when army contracts were awarded, and grants made to purchase cotton, "our people have not been altogether indifferent or ignored!" Very pious and holy people, still not altogether indifferent to contracts and speculations in cotton! Very good and heavenly-minded; still, Ahab-like, they could look upon the vineyard of some poor, defenseless Naboth! Very unearthly, and free from worldly-mindedness, being subjects of that kingdom which is not of this world; still they were not entirely ignored when the spoils of war were to be distributed!

But, seriously, it is true—alas! for the credit, of the Christian name, too true—they grew rich on the spoils of war. Contracts were given, permits to buy cotton granted them, and by some means or other they became possessed of many things not specified in the Bishop's list. Churches were seized, parsonages were taken, and, by some agency or other, horses, mules, carriages, pianos, silver-plate, jewelry, valuable libraries, and even wearing apparel, found their way from the rebellious States to the loyal States of the North. Did any of the Bishop's people grow rich by these means? The question is not impertinent. When bishops take churches in the manner that Bishop Ames and Simpson took some of our churches in the South, what might not their people do with such an example as that before their eyes?

They grew rich, and now "the spoils of the poor" are in their houses! They grew rich on the sufferings, wretchedness and misery of their fellow-men! They say those people who suffered were guilty. Suppose they were. Does the judge or the executioner strip the culprit whom they condemn and execute? Did the fact that those people deserved punishment authorize the robbery of their effects? or was that considered a part of the punishment? If so, if it were considered a part of their punishment, then what shall we say of the principle which, to punish a man for his own personal crimes, would rob his wife and children of their food and clothing? Is that right? Is it humane? Is it Christian-like?

"They were not indifferent." O no; no one ever accused them with indifference in that matter. And if any were now to accuse them, the accusation could be easily disproved by the destitution, the nakedness and hunger, the suffering and sorrow, the prayers and the tears of many a heart-broken widow and grief-stricken orphan! In the face of the overwhelming evidence to the contrary, it would be useless to charge them with indifference. The Bishop's statement will generally be admitted, and the charge of indifference will not be made.

Revival in Washington.—In the Fourth Presbyterian Church, in Washington City, the Rev. J. C. Smith, D. D., pastor, there is a deep religious interest. Eighty or ninety are believed to have been converted already, and the revival is still spreading. It is expected that at the next communion season over one hundred will join the church. Twelve joined at the last communion.

Revival in Franklin County, Tennessee.—Rev. H. L. Rosser reports to the Christian Observer an interesting work of grace, as the result of which twenty-eight were added to the Presbyterian Church, three to the Methodist, and eleven others hopefully converted. He says: "The key to the success of the revival movement now abroad over Middle Tennessee is, I think, identical with that suggested by Mr. Caughey, in his work styled 'Methodism in Earnest.' If it be asked, 'What is the secret philosophy of these revivals?' the simple answer is 'The power of the Holy Spirit, accompanying hard, patient, steady, constant labor, with many tears and much crying to God in private prayer, has produced these results.'"

Revivals in the West.—A late number of the Western Presbyterian contains an account of a recent season of refreshing in the churches of Washington and Murphysville, Kentucky, in the bounds of Ebenezer Presbytery. In the former of which the Rev. John H. Condit is pastor, after a season of ten days special prayer and preaching of the Word, eighteen persons were received into the church on profession of their faith in Christ, and two backsliders were brought back to the fold. In the latter church, under the ministerial care of the Rev. Mr. Evans, pastor at Mayslick, twenty-seven additions were made to the church. Eighteen months ago, this church numbered but twelve members, to which ten were added last year. It now numbers forty-nine members.

Religious Interest at Charlotte Court-House, Va.—The pastor writes as follows: "There is a protracted meeting now going on in the 'Village Church,' and ten or twelve remain every night for conversation with the pastor and elders. I have been assisted in the pulpit by the Rev. Thomas Wharey and the Rev. M. Lacy. There is a general spirit of seriousness throughout the whole community, and some are rejoicing in hope."

By letter from Rev. J. Backer we learn that a revival of religion is in progress in Summerfield.

A POLITICAL PULPIT.—The Round Table, New York, says: "For the last four years the thanksgiving sermons of most of our clergymen have been little less than stale campaign speeches, labelled with a text from the Scriptures, and padded with some theology and more partisanship."

DEATH OF A MISSIONARY.—The Boston Recorder gives the sad intelligence of the death of Rev. Henry Ballentine, for thirty years a laborer in India. He was returning to his native land in the hope of recovering from the effects of his long and arduous toil. He died at sea.

COLORED CHURCHES.

The Colored Churches of the Methodist E. Church South in New Orleans have not been transferred to the Methodist Church North, nor to any other Church. The Trustees who have held them from the beginning, still hold them.

Dr. Newman, with a marvellous facility of statement, has made the impression very generally, through his own paper and "The Methodist," that these Churches have been transferred, and that a great jubilee was held by the colored people of this city in consequence thereof.

So far from this being the case, we waited upon the Commanding General, and in the presence of Dr. Newman, refused to make any such transfer, and stated that no man had any authority to sodo. On the evening before the issue of "Special Order No. 119," restoring our Churches, we again saw the Commanding General and urged our right to these Churches and that the President in our opinion intended in his order to make no exception of any Church. That these Churches were as fully the property of the Church South as any other Church property. The General said the colored Churches wished "to escape from Church vassalage;" and on the next day he issued "Special Order No. 119," restoring our Churches to us, excepting those "in possession and use of colored congregations."

We immediately wrote to the President, on that day, stating the whole case—that the Commanding General refused to restore these Churches to us; that they were worth $25,000; that we wished them exclusively as heretofore for the use of the colored people; and asked him to again interfere with an order and save us from this stupendous proselyting of the War Department; which had turned over to another denomination Churches that had belonged to us for twenty years and more, and were built for the use of our own colored members.

After the issue of "Special Order No. 116," two arbitrators were appointed to estimate upon damages suffered by our Churches during their occupancy by the Northern Methodists and upon claims for rent due; and on the other side, upon the value of the permanent repairs put upon the Churches by said occupants.

The arbitrators agreed; and gave a very considerable amount of damages and rent in our favor. The Commanding General, however, determined that only half per cent. rent on the value of the Church property could be allowed. This decision reduced the amount of damages to so inconsiderable a sum that in order to get possession of our Churches throughout the State, without more difficulty, we waived all claims against the Government for rent and damages, upon the express condition that the General would at once order the restoration of all our Churches.

In making up his statement of this matter it is marvellous to see how adroitly Dr. Newman weaves in the following document. If he had only set forth that the order had already been issued by the General Commanding which restored the Churches, but refused to give up these colored Churches, and that therefore, so far as the Commanding General was concerned, they were already out of the question, it would have been transparent that this document referred only to the question of damages:

"I hereby relinquish all claims against the Government of the United States on account of rent or damages done to our Churches during the occupancy of them, upon the understanding that no claims of any sort are to be made by the Government against us, and that the Churches be turned over at once to our possession, throughout this Department. This agreement has no reference to the colored Churches.

J. C. KEENER,
President of La. Conference."

We quote this as published by the Rev. Doctor. It was quite important for him however to italicise the two last words in order to fully make the desired impression. This statement appeared in his issue of January the 6th. We made no reply to it, expecting daily to hear from the President in a way that would put the Rev. gentleman right before the Churches and the world. Our silence has had an unfortunate effect. In his issue of the 27th he thus continues the theme and assumes the air of a man telling the whole truth by accusing the editor of the Christian Advocate of telling only half:

"The editor of the Christian Advocate tells only half the truth when he says—but for the absolute orders of President Johnson, all of our Churches would have figured largely in the report of this famous Mississippi Mission Conference.' It would have been honorable to him, and only honest, had he added, that by the absolute orders of President Johnson the colored Churches of Louisiana were reserved to the colored people; and that the white trustees holding said Churches, together with the Rev. Dr. Keener, were required to, and did sign a relinquishment to the effect, that if the members of said Churches desired to connect themselves with another organization they would agree to the change. If this is the result of the 'forty-horse proselyting power of the War Department,' it is such an act of simple justice as the piety of the Church was not equal to; and it was a disregard of honor to place these same churches among the appointments of the Louisiana Conference after the relinquishment had been signed, and the members thereof had publicly announced their withdrawal from the Southern Church."

Now the reader will be greatly surprised to learn that "the white trustees and Dr. Keener" were never "required" to make any such relinquishment, nor have ever made it. If the requisition was made it can be shown; and if signed it is doubtless on record; but until shown, we shall not hesitate to protest against an imagination at once so vast and so vivid as that which the Rev. gentleman possesses. The President demand that Church trustees should sign a relinquishment of their trust and rights, indeed! Why the bare statement is its own sufficient refutation. In the "Order 119" of General Canby, which we subjoin, and in that of "No. 120," issued some days after, no such "relinquishment" is mentioned or required.

This statement should be placed on file with the per capita statement—the contribution statement—the Mobile statement, and other visional statements published in the Methodist of October 7th and elsewhere.

Far be it from us to attempt to follow the Doctor in his romancing flights. It would require an industrious, a very industrious and observing man to keep him within the field of vision. But it is not difficult to perceive that he has arranged with an artistic, sensational power of the first order, the somewhat diluted statement of the 6th; and, secondly, the stronger one of the 27th; with the view, possibly, of something hereafter still more astounding in the highest regions of pure fiction.

As far back as September 7th, while we were in the City of Washington, one of our official members, who was not a trustee of our colored Churches, in a letter to Gen. Canby, volunteered the statement that, "If our colored people wished to join any other organization, they will be free to do so, and we believe no objection would be made."—Doubtless it is upon this remark that the Doctor intends to rely hereafter for proof of his assertion that "the white trustees" had been "required to sign a relinquishment" of the colored Churches. This informal observation, of September 7th, was referred to several times by the Commanding General, during our conference with him in November. But it was expressly disclaimed by us, that it was not made by authority, and that as the proper representative of the Conference we made no such offer. The remark however of the letter was substantially true. Our Church has acted upon it in dealing with its colored members in the city of Charleston and elsewhere. They were permitted to join the church of their choice, the African Methodist Church, and the property was decded to them accordingly. But this is a very different affair from yielding up to the War Department, upon "a requisition," our Church property; or consenting to have it turned over by Secretary Stanton to the Rev. Bishop Ames for the benefit of the Methodist Episcopal Church North—just because the two chose to combine against us. The nucleus of colored churches which that Church so much covets to form its splendid creations upon, will never be afforded by those who have so long labored with the colored Methodist congregations of this city, and who have so sincerely at heart the spiritual welfare of the colored people. Nor is it necessary for either the War Department or Dr. Newman to interfere in order to secure a generous treatment of our colored congregations, which we have created and fostered for thirty years and to whom we presented at one time an entire church, (Soule Chapel) toward the building of which the colored people had never contributed a single cent.

We now offer to the reader positive evidence of the truth of the assertions we have made. By the subjoined Special Orders of General Canby it will be seen that the relinquishment of claims for damages was signed after the issue of Special Order 119. This Order, which unconditionally restored the principal churches, was issued on the 18th of November, the relinquishment of claims for damages was signed two days after, on the 20th. The Rev. Doctor makes the impression, however, that this relinquishment referred to the colored Churches, but Special Order No. 120 states definitely that it referred to "Special Order No. 119," Paragraph 7, Section I, which reads: "If all claims for compensation for use or damages is relinquished, the transfer will be made at once." And we state particularly in the document itself that the relinquishment "has no reference to the colored Churches."

We now insert the official documents connected with this matter in the order in which they transpired.

All such property in possession of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, will be surrendered as soon as the Assistant Commissioner can make the necessary arrangements for the occupation of other buildings. For ingenious perversion of the "truth of history," this statement, which has been so extensively ventilated—which boldly affirms that a relinquishment has been made of the colored Church property in this city in favor of the Northern Methodists, finds a parallel only in that sublimer audacity which not only attempts to appropriate churches, but has itself photographed in the very act. But unfortunately for the "truth of history," the assertions of Dr. Newman, so roundly made, reach the market for which they are prepared, where there is but little chance of pursuit and exposure.

TOLERATION.—The Methodist Episcopal Church has been granted entire freedom in the kingdom of Denmark. The American Minister in announcing this grant to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Church, says, "I congratulate you on an event, the like of which has not occurred before in behalf of any foreign church since 1748!"

He who lives for himself alone, lives for a mean fellow.

DEATH OF COL. BAKER.

The Methodists of Alabama feel profoundly the great loss which the Church has suffered in the sudden decease of Col. Robert A. Baker, in his 61st year. Eminently devoted to the advancement of the kingdom of Christ, we knew of no layman in whom the best points of our present Methodism were so fully illustrated. At the Annual Conference, at the altar, and in the class-room he was equally efficient. During the last twenty-five years he has not failed to impress his opinions and character upon the policy and spirit of the Church. In our regret at the loss of so valuable a man we are consoled in the reflection that such men do not wholly pass away—"Their works follow them." Other men spring up, catch their spirit and their mantle, and go forth in double might. Let us expect to find the inheritor of the excellent qualities of this good man among his brethren beloved, or, it may be, out of his own house! One who was long and intimately acquainted with him pays the following tribute to his memory:

"Col. Baker was born and spent the early part of his life in North Alabama, and although not favored in youth with the advantages of a thorough education, he acquired a large stock of useful knowledge, and possessing, in a very eminent degree, a clear and practical mind, combined with a versatility of talent, he soon became distinguished among his fellow-citizens as a man of uncommon usefulness and promise. For many years he was honored with a seat in the Legislature of this State, and for several sessions presided over that body as Speaker of the House, with distinguished ability.

He was equally distinguished in the private walks of life. As a planter, and lastly as a merchant, he was successful, and always enjoyed the confidence of those who knew him.

"In the various enterprises of the day he felt a deep and abiding interest—always ready to aid with his counsel, his services and his means, every interest productive of benefit to the State, and to the welfare of the community. And notwithstanding, as has been already mentioned, he was not a scholar in the technical sense of the term, he felt an uncommon interest in the subject of education. As an evidence of this, he contributed largely of his means and aided by his personal efforts the advancement of the cause. He presided over the deliberations of the Board of Trustees of several of our most respectable High Schools and Colleges in the State, so that his name has become widely known as a patron of learning, and his memory will be cherished with gratitude by many who would otherwise have plodded through life without its advantages.

But one of the most delightful recollections of our deceased friend grows out of his private and domestic life. An affectionate husband, a fond father, a considerate master, and a firm and unwavering friend. His influence over his friends and intimate acquaintances was large, but he never abused it, or betrayed the confidence reposed in him.

"As a Christian he excelled. His piety was only equalled by his benevolence, and his consistency of conduct was always in harmony with his professions. Religion was at once his standard of character and ornament of life, which was so pure and simple that it never lost its lustre. His church and his family were the chief objects of his concern, and so beautifully blending their influence as incentives to action, that it was difficult to say which was predominant. Though a Methodist for 40 years, he was no bigot. His was the charity that recognized Christians as "all one in Christ;" and while his preference was decided and strong in favor of the church of his choice, the passport to his confidence was not limited by a denominational shibboleth.

"But he is gone; his family and his church will have cause to lament his loss, and his friends will sorely miss him. None knew him better than the writer of this brief notice, and none will feel his loss more than he does. And as a closing tribute to his excellence and worth, we may justly exclaim, in the language of inspiration, 'Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace.'"

D. W. G.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE.

In the proceedings of the North Carolina Conference we notice that the Conference requested "Bishop Early to use his influence with his colleagues to have the General Conference changed from New Orleans to some central point." What are the good brethren of North Carolina afraid of—the cholera?—the yellow fever?—an overflow of the Mississippi?—or that the city cannot support such an addition to its population for four weeks? The ability and hospitality of the friends of Southern Methodism in New Orleans, we can assure them, will be found fully equal to the occasion. Our good housewives may not be able to spread before their worthy guests all the delicacies of "some central point," but if there be fish, crabs, oysters, oranges, bananas or any other thing of good repute, we entreat the brethren to think on these things, and not to condemn in advance the holding a General Conference in New Orleans.

The Southern Church has financially, socially, ecclesiastically no more important point in its territory. And no place could the preaching of the able men who compose this body be effective of more real benefit than it will be at this great heart of the South-west. If Bishop Early "labors" with his colleagues, in accordance with the resolution, we hope that he may find them quite impracticable upon the point.

The friends of Southern Methodism in this city have been looking forward to the meeting of the General Conference at this point for the past eight years; and are now greatly surprised that at this late hour it should be seriously discussed whether to hold it here or elsewhere.

The official boards of the several city congregations have, during the week, passed resolutions of "cordial invitation to the ensuing General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal South to hold its session in this city, as in accordance with the action of that body in 1858."

The following is the resolution passed on this subject by the Felicity Street Church Board:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Board the General Conference will be cordially received and well sustained in this city; and that in view of the general interests of the church and of Methodism in New Orleans, we strongly deprecate any change in the place for the ensuing session.

W. S. MOUNT, Sec'y.

Feb. 1, 1866.

It should not be overlooked that a large number of Methodists throughout the Valley of the Mississippi wish to be present at this ensuing General Conference, and we know of no other point which will afford them the same facility for attending it.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

FROM TENNESSEE.

A letter to the St. Louis Advocate says:

"I am afraid you have not heard all the good news. Baltimore was represented at the late annual meeting of the Virginia Conference. It is expected that the next session of the Baltimore Conference will be held by a Southern Bishop, and that its members will receive their appointments from him. This expectation has been raised by what was said to our brethren of the Virginia Conference. May it be realized is my prayer! This being the case, we can afford to look, for a few years, on the puny attempts of Wm. Herd Rogers & Co., in East Tennessee. And our genial friend, Dr. Thomas B. Sargent, of East Baltimore, was also present in Virginia. I should like to see both these Conferences represented at New Orleans.

"The Protestant Methodists of the Southern States are preparing to unite with us. Their Fraternal Messengers have appeared before several of our Southern Conferences. These distinguished gentlemen did not hesitate to say that their Church desires to unite with ours—"to become one in name," etc. They will be represented at our General Conference by several prominent ministers, whose business it will be to arrange for a union with us.

"I notice some Christian bodies, just north of the Ohio river, who profess to preach the pure gospel, and labor only for the kingdom of Christ, have recently united together. Delivering prayers to intelligent audiences, tinkering and tampering with State-laws, and dabbling in politics, they seem to leave to others, and engage themselves in the holier work of saving souls. Sensible men they! They are disposed to be friendly to us; they actually appoint delegates to meet us in council. Very sensible they! They see many of the clergy of the 'Polar Regions' sin-stained and corrupted—' of the earth earthy'—and they fraternize with us, who speak the Christian language in its simplicity, purity and power. Extremely sensible men they!

"Do you read the good news from California? We are stronger there than I expected. What a full Conference, and what bright prospects before them in that golden land! Mr. Editor (whoever you are), we are getting old; our locks are silver-gray; let us go to California, and get young again. Let us go and travel huge circuits and enormous districts, and hold glorious camp-meetings. Let us go, and sing, and suffer, in those auriferous regions, on our way to the Golden Streets on High.

"I have just returned from Springfield, Tennessee, where our brethren are blest with a gracious revival of religion. Since my last letter, revival news comes up from Lebanon, Sparta, Franklin, Huntsville and Gallatin. At all these places, we have regular stationed preachers, and hundreds are coming into the Church. 'The returned chaplains,' as your St. Louis brother terms them, are doing good work, and the Lord seems to bless their labors abundantly.

FROM MISSOURI.

Arrests of preachers for presuming to preach the gospel of Christ without first obtaining a license from the State continue. Little or no regard is paid to age, denomination, talent, learning or usefulness; but special attention seems to be given to Catholics and Southern Methodists. Whether these be regarded as worse, or as better, than other denominations, the Advocate has not been informed, but they have certainly received a very large share of attention from those "zealous for the law."

True, not a few Baptists have shared like honorable attention, and some Presbyterians also have found themselves in bonds; but Catholics and Methodists are those most sought after. Well, be it so. Time will reveal some strange and some astounding things.

It is marvelous that the movers in this great anti-Christian raid can not, or will not, learn that they are using two-edged tools; and the sharper of the two edges is turned toward themselves.

FROM KENTUCKY.

Rev. J. F. Redford, writing from Franklin, under date of December 18th, says:

"Since my last notice, I have had some interesting revivals. At Stevenson's meeting-house, we had eleven conversions, and ten additions to our church; and on last Friday night we closed one of the most interesting revivals I ever conducted, at Bethel-grove, where we had thirty-four conversions and fourteen additions to the Church. Quite a number of our most influential and experienced citizens professed and joined at this church: at which place we have just finished a beautiful country-house for the worship of God.

PRESBYTERIAN.

REVIVAL IN NORTH CAROLINA.—A friend, writing to us from Western North Carolina, says: "' The ministrations of the word are well attended in this country now, and without distracting cares, fears or anxieties. Five of the churches immediately around Statesville have been revived, and many added to the fold of Christ. Here (Statesville) at this time, a good state of feeling exists. The past month has added more than fifty to those who profess the name of Christ. Much seriousness prevails at the Female College, and at an evening meeting held in the Presbyterian Church, thirteen professed a hope in Christ. The Rev. Mr. Krider, pastor of a neighboring church, died, three weeks ago, after a time of ingathering in his church.

EPISCOPAL.

The movement that began in September, in behalf of the destitute clergy of the South in the Episcopal Church, was fully organized in October, and the amount already contributed is over six thousand dollars. The churches in Baltimore gave as follows: St. Paul's, $695 58; St. Luke's, $487 99; St. Peter's $500; St. Barnabas', $305 00; Church of the Ascension, $740 50; Mt. Calvary $300 00.

The Rev. Mr. Tinsley takes charge of St. John's Episcopal Church in Warrenton, of which Rev. Mr. Bestem was pastor, and who has accepted the call to Christ Church in Norfolk. Mr. Tinsley joined General Hunton's brigade as a private at the breaking out of the war, but was soon after made chaplain, and gave great satisfaction.

The Rev. Dr. Hawks' new congregation in New York are about to build or purchase a church for their use, and it is said that the beautiful new French church, "du St. Esprit" will be sold to them, its own congregation being very much reduced in numbers. The attendance on the service of Dr. Hawks, now held in the University chapel, has very much increased of late, and seats are not to be had.

A clerical brother in Columbia writes though his church has been burnt down, he still has a lecture room. The spirit of this is what we desire to call attention to. Though mercies are taken away there are some left. With such a spirit, we cannot but hope a kind Providence will give His people means to build another church for the glory of His great name.—Southern Churchman.

DECISION IN A CHURCH CASE.

The Supreme Court of this State rendered a decision last week in the case of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at Louisiana, Mo.—The church-house there, a fine and costly building, had been claimed by the Northern Methodists, and by them occupied for some considerable time past. At length they appealed to the civil law to perfect what they considered their title.—From the decision of the Circuit Court the case came to the Supreme Court, where, last week, it was decided in favor of the Church South, the rightful owners.

By this decision of the Supreme Court has been set aside the judgment of the Circuit Court for Pike county, which Circuit Court, on petition from some Northern Methodists, appointed trustees for the church, through which appointees the Northern Methodists held possession.

The Missouri Republican of Tuesday last publishes the decision of the Supreme Court in full, with the editorial remark that—

"It will be seen that the church robbers have been overthrown, even by Governor Fletcher's Supreme Court; and we shall probably hear of no more attempted church usurpations in the State."

It is doubtful whether there will be "no more attempts at church usurpations in this State"—very doubtful; but the Advocate will next week publish the decision referred to, with some remarks thereon.—St. Louis Adv.

THE CAMPAIGN IN KENTUCKY.

GEN. BRAGG'S OFFICIAL REPORT.

IMPORTANT DEVELOPMENTS NEVER MADE PUBLIC BEFORE.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE TENNESSEE,
May 20th, 1863.

Sir—Constant occupation and the absence of my records during the active service in this quarter, have prevented, until now, a full narrative of the events incident to the campaign of this army last autumn, in Tennessee and Kentucky.

Early in July, 1862, under instructions, a division of troops, under Major Gen. McCown, was sent from my headquarters at Tupelo, Miss., to the Department of East Tennessee. In the latter part of that month it became evident we were being pressed there by a heavy corps of the enemy, sent from Corinth, under Major Gen. Buell. This movement threatened the very heart of our country, and was destined, unless checked immediately, to sever the main line of connection between the East and West. At this time the army in Mississippi had much improved in health and strength, and had progressed rapidly in discipline, organization and instruction. Leaving a sufficient force, I determined to move to Chattanooga, oppose this dangerous operation of the enemy, and, if practicable, drive him from our important provision country in North Alabama, Middle Tennessee and Kentucky.

Early in August, the infantry force for this purpose—four divisions—was concentrated near Chattanooga, and awaited the arrival of the artillery, cavalry and baggage train, which necessarily moved across the country by land.

Major General E. Kirby Smith, Commanding the Department of East Tennessee, met me by invitation in Chattanooga, and most generously placed his whole command at my disposal. It was soon determined, upon his suggestion, that all his force should be used to operate upon the enemy left at Cumberland Gap, and he was requested to confer with Brigadier General Humphrey Marshall, commanding in Southwestern Virginia, with whom he was already in correspondence, to secure his co-operation also in the movement.

After returning to Knoxville, General Smith asked for further assistance; and two fine brigades under Brigadier General P. R. Cleburne and Colonel Preston Smith were sent to him, in addition to the division which had gone from Tupelo. The balance of my immediate command, the Army of the Mississippi, divided between Major Generals Polk and Hardee, made every preparation, and awaited only its baggage train and artillery to cross the Tennessee River, and enter upon its arduous and perilous campaign over the mountains dividing East and Middle Tennessee.

The movement of the artillery and wagons across the mountain region of North Alabama having been successfully accomplished, late in August we commenced crossing the river at Chattanooga, with very limited means. The enemy, with a largely superior force, occupied the lines of the railroads from Decatur to Bridgeport, Alabama, from Decatur to Nashville, and from Nashville to Stevenson, with large detached commands at McMinnville and Cumberland Gap. Having crossed the river at Chattanooga, the column took up its line of march on the 7th of August, over Waldron's Ridge and the Cumberland Mountain, for Middle Tennessee. Major General Smith had already successfully passed through North-eastern Tennessee, and gained the rear of Cumberland Gap, held by the enemy in strong force, and fortified.

Leaving a sufficient force to hold the enemy in observation, his dislodgment being considered impracticable, he moved as anticipated, with the balance of his command on Lexington, Ky. This rich country, full of supplies so necessary to us, was represented to be occupied by a force which could make but feeble resistance. How well and successfully that duty was performed, has already been reported by General Smith. The complete victory over the enemy at Richmond, Ky., and his occupation of Lexington, rendered it necessary for me to intercept General Buell, now rapidly moving toward Nashville, or to move toward the east so as to secure a junction with General Smith when necessary.

On reaching Middle Tennessee, it was found that the enemy's main force, by use of railroads and good turnpikes, had concentrated in Nashville, and was strongly fortified. With a heavy demonstration against this position, my force was thrown rapidly to Glasgow, Ky., and, to my great satisfaction, reached that point on the 13th of September, before any portion of the enemy passed Bowling Green. As soon as my object was discovered, they moved in haste by rail and turnpike, but reached Bowling Green only in time to find we had seized and were held both roads near Cave City.

An assault on the enemy's superior force, well fortified, at Nashville, gave no promise of success; while any movement for that purpose would have enabled him to throw the whole force to his rear rapidly, thus rendering certain the capture or destruction of Gen. Smith's small command at Lexington; whereas, by the flank movement adopted, the enemy's communications were severed, and his forces separated, while my own connections were secured. Without losing a gun, we had also compelled the evacuation of all Northern Alabama and Middle Tennessee, south of the Cumberland.

Prepared to assail Buell's forces should he attempt to pass north, I determined to rest my tired troops at Glasgow, where some subsistence was to be had. While thus engaged, I learned that the commander of my outpost at Cave City, had advanced upon and assaulted the enemy's fortified position at Dumfordsville, (the railroad and pike crossing of Green River,) and after a gallant fight against largely superior numbers, had been repulsed with considerable loss. Unwilling to allow the impression of a disaster to rest upon the minds of my men, the force was rapidly prepared, and our march moved on the evening of the 15th, with a very scanty supply of provisions.

Hardee's wing moved by Cave City, direct on Dumfordsville, and Polk by Bear Wallow Gap, crossed the rear some miles to the right, and gained the enemy's rear on the afternoon of the 16th. An immediate demand for the surrender of the garrison was made, and after a few hours' negotiation an unconditional surrender was obtained. We secured 4267 prisoners, ten pieces of artillery, 5000 small arms, and a proportional quantity of ammunition, horses, mules and military stores.

This surrender having been received and completed on the 17th of September, instructions were made for an attack from Gen. Polk's main force, supposed to be advancing in our rear from Bowling Green. Efforts were made to draw him to an attack by exposing a division in his front, while the main force held a position south of the encampments on Green river. I failed to accomplish this object. With my effective force reduced by sickness, exhaustion, and recent affair before the entrenchments at Dumfordsville, to half that of the enemy, I did not prudently afford to attack him in his selected position. Should I follow him further toward Bowling Green, I might fall back to that place and behind fortifications.

Instructed, at the end of four days, to three days' rations, and in a hostile country, utterly destitute of supplies, a serious engagement brought on anywhere in that direction could not fail (whatever its results) to fatally crippple me. The loss of a battle would be calamitous disastrous. I was well aware, also, that he had a practicable route by way of Morgantown or Brownsville to the Ohio river, and thence to Louisville. I was, therefore, compelled to give up the object, and sent for subsistence. Orders were sent for a supply train from our depot at Georgetown to meet us in Bardstown, and the march was commenced for the latter place.

Instructions had been given Gen. Smith for a simultaneous movement of the column from Lexington to Shelbyville, that combined operations might be immediately undertaken against Louisville. Orders had also been given for a close observation on the enemy at Cumberland Gap, and that he should be prepared in any attempt to escape. On my arrival at Bardstown, I learned from Major General Smith, then at Lexington, that the enemy was moving from Cumberland Gap, endeavoring to escape by the Valley of Sandy River, in Eastern Kentucky, and that he had sent his whole available force in pursuit.

A sufficient force to prevent this escape, and to hold the enemy in check there and compel his surrender, had been ordered, and was confidently expected, from another quarter, to have followed General Smith's movement in time for this purpose. Circumstances, unknown to me in our then isolated position; and over which I could not exercise control, had prevented this consummation, so confidently relied on and so necessary to our success. The delay necessarily resulting from this pursuit of the enemy by General Smith, prevented a junction of our forces and enabled Gen. Buell to reach Louisville before the assault could be made upon that city.

The troops at Bardstown, much jaded and foot-sore from the long and arduous march, were placed in position for rest and recuperation during the absence of the column from Lexington. Having made all needful arrangements for them, ordered our supplies at Lexington transferred to a position selected as a general depot, near Bryantsville, and provided for opening a line of communication through Cumberland Gap. I left Bardstown on the 28th for Lexington, to confer with Gen. Smith and inform myself fully as to our condition and the resources of the country.

Major Gen. Polk, left at Bardstown in command, was directed, if pressed by a force too large to justify his giving battle, to fall back in the direction of the new depot near Bryantsville, in front of which I proposed to concentrate for action. Arriving in Lexington on the 1st of October, I met the Provisional Governor of the State, who had previously been invited to accompany me, and arranged for his installation at the capital on the 4th. The available forces of Gen. Smith, just returned to Lexington, were ordered immediately to Frankfort. Finding but little progress had been made in the transfer of our accumulated stores from Lexington, and learning of a heavy movement of the enemy from Louisville, I ordered Major Gen. Polk, in writing, dated "Lexington, 1 o'clock p. m., 2d October," and sent by two routes, "to move from Bardstown with his whole available force, by way of Bloomfield, toward Frankfort, to strike the enemy in flank and rear," and informed him that Major Gen. Smith would attack in front.

When received at Bardstown on the 3d, the General submitted this order, which is not mentioned in his report (see exhibit No. 1) to a council of wing and division commanders, and determined to move as originally instructed by me on leaving Bardstown.

Fortunately, notice of this determination reached me at Frankfort, in time to prevent the movement against the enemy's front by Gen. Smith; but it necessitated an entire change in my plans, the abandonment of the capital, and the partial recovering and ultimate loss of our stores at Lexington. Not doubting that some imperative necessity, unknown to me, existed with the General for this departure from instructions, I conformed at once to his movements, and put Gen. Smith's command in motion, to form the junction south, still covering the supplies at Lexington as far as practicable. Proceeding rapidly to Harrodsburg myself, I was met there by Major General Polk, on 6th of October, with the head of the column which had marched from Bardstown on the 3d.

After a full and free conference with the General, my first views remained unchanged; and as he reported to me at midnight of the 6th of October, when, inclosing a written report from Major Gen. Hardee, at Perryville, "that he did not regard the enemy in large strength near there" (see exhibit No. 2), I received early on the morning of the 7th the orders to concentrate all the forces in front of the depot at Lexington (see exhibit No. 3). But before this order was put in full operation, information was received that the enemy, in limited force, was pressing upon Gen. Hardee at Perryville; that he was no where concentrated against us, but was moving by separate columns; his right (see map herewith marked A) was near Lebanon, a corps in front of Perryville, and his left, two entire corps, extending by way of Mackseville to Frankfort, a line of at least sixty miles. This presented an opportunity, which I promptly seized, of striking him in detail.

Accordingly, written orders were given to Major Gen. Polk, dated Harrodsburg, October 7, 5:40 p.m., (see exhibit No. 4) to move Cheatham's division, now at Harrodsburg, back to Perryville, and to proceed to that point himself, "attack the enemy immediately, rout him, and then move rapidly to join Major Gen. Smith," as before ordered; and it was added, "no time should be lost in this movement." Meanwhile, during the same day, I had received repeated and urgent applications from Gen. Smith (near Frankfort) by express, representing the enemy to be in strong force in his immediate front, and earnestly asking for reinforcements. Accordingly, Wither's Division had been detached and sent to him, (before receipt by me of the information from Perryville,) and was far on the way thither at the time when the movement to Perryville was ordered; and this will account for my being without the benefit of this division in the battle which ensued next day at the latter place.

Major General Polk arrived at Perryville with Cheatham's Division before midnight of the 7th, and the troops were placed by General Hardee in the line of battle previously established. Our forces now in this position consisted of three divisions of infantry, about 14,500, and two small brigades of cavalry, about 1500 strong. Information reached me during the evening and night of the 7th, at Harrodsburg, which indicated that no attack could be made on General Smith's command the next day, and I immediately changed my purpose to join him, and determined to go to Perryville. From unofficial sources, I was led to fear the existence of serious misapprehension in regard to the position and strength of the enemy's force near Perryville, as well as to the location of our supplies, supposed to be at Bryantsville, when, in truth, but two days rations for the army had yet reached that point.

Having ordered the attack, and that no time should be lost, I was concerned at not hearing the commencement of the engagement early in the morning, but was much relieved for the time by receiving from General Polk a note, dated Perryville, 6 A. M., 8th October, informing me that the enemy's pickets commenced firing at daybreak, and that he should bring on the engagement vigorously. (See Exhibit No. 5.)

To my surprise, however, no gun was heard and on my arrival, about 10 A. M., I was informed that it was determined not to attack, but to assume the "defensive offensive." After a hasty reconnoisance and consultation, orders were given for some changes deemed necessary in the lines of battle, a portion of it being withdrawn, was restored, and Major General Polk was ordered to bring on the engagement. Impatient at the delay after this order, I dispatched a staff officer to repeat it to the General, and soon thereafter, I followed in person, and put the troops in motion.

Major Gen. Buell, commanding the forces there, in our immediate front, in his official report, says: "I had somewhat expected an attack early in the morning on Gilbert's corps, while it was isolated. Those delays had postponed the action until it was now past noon, and a second corps of the enemy (18,000) had reached the field."

The general officers, at the meeting about daylight, (see Gen. Polk's report,) who resolved on this delay, must have acted without correct information, and in ignorance that my orders were urgent and imperative for the attack; moreover, I was within one hour's ride, and was not consulted or informed.

The action having at length commenced, was fought by our troops with a gallantry and persistent determination to conquer which the enemy could not resist; and though he was largely more than two to our one, he was driven from the field with terrible loss. Night closed the operation just as a third corps of the enemy threw the head of its columns against our left flank. We had entire possession of the battle-field, with thousands of the enemy's killed and wounded, several batteries of artillery, and six hundred prisoners. For the details of this action, so creditable to our arms, I refer to the reports of subordinate commanders, herewith forwarded. In the progress of the engagement, we had advanced so far as to expose our left flank to the third corps, just arrived from the direction of Lebanon. I, therefore, caused our line, which rested upon the field till midnight, to fall back to its original position.

Assured that the enemy had concentrated his three corps against us, and finding that our loss had already been quite heavy in the unequal contest against two, I gave the order to fall back at daylight on Harrodsburg, and sent instructions to Major Gen. Smith to move his command to form a junction with me at that place. There I again offered the enemy battle, which he declined, and moved to possess himself of my line, toward Cumberland Gap. My whole force was accordingly retired on the 11th, upon Bryantsville. There the enemy again declined to advance upon me, but occupied himself in the destruction of the numerous mills, and other sources from which we drew our only supply of breadstuffs. There was no accumulation of this essential article at any point, except at Lexington, which had been now lost, though the country afforded an immensity of grain. The necessary concentration of my forces rendered accumulation from the small country mills impracticable, and our supply was reduced to only four days' rations. To attack and route an enemy largely superior in numbers (for simply to cripple him would not suffice), or to evacuate the country in which we could no longer subsist, became now an imperative necessity. Moreover, I was informed that still another force was moving on my right flank, from Cincinnati, in addition to the overwhelming one with which I was already contending.

The season of autumnal rains was approaching; the rough and uneven roads leading over the stupendous mountains of Eastern Tennessee and Kentucky, to and through Cumberland Gap, would then become utterly impassable to an army. Should I remain till then, and meet with a reverse, the army would be lost. Had the foregoing considerations permitted a doubt to remain in my mind as to the course of duty, it would have been entirely removed upon the receipt of the intelligence of our disasters in North Mississippi, by which the whole country in our rear was left open to the enemy's victorious forces there. Accordingly, all necessary arrangements were made and the troops put in motion by two columns, under Major Generals Polk and Smith, on the 13th of October, for Cumberland Gap. After a rapid march, with some privations in the absence of baggage trains, which had been sent ahead, we passed the Gap, with immaterial loss, from the 19th to the 24th of October.

The column of Major Gen. Polk was vigorously pursued by the enemy for several days, but was so successfully protected by the cavalry, under the admirable management of Cols. Wheeler and Wharton, that but little annoyance was felt.

Though compelled to yield to largely superior numbers and fortuitous circumstances, a portion of the valuable territory from which we had driven the enemy, the fruits of the campaign were very large, and have had a most important bearing upon our subsequent military operations here and elsewhere.

With a force enabling us at no time to put more than forty thousand men of all arms, and in all places in battle, we had redeemed North Alabama, and Middle Tennessee, and recovered possession of Cumberland Gap, the gateway to the heart of the Confederacy. We had killed, wounded and captured, no less than twenty-five thousand of the enemy, taken over thirty pieces of artillery, seventeen thousand small arms, some two million cartridges for the same, destroyed some hundreds of wagons, and brought off several hundred more, with their teams and harness complete; replaced our jaded cavalry horses by a fine mount, lived two months upon supplies wrested from the enemy's possession; secured material to clothe the army, and, finally, secured subsistence from the redeemed country to support not only this army, but also a large force of the Confederacy to the present time.

In four weeks after passing Cumberland Gap on the memorable and arduous campaign, jaded, hungry and ragged, (as necessarily incidental to that service,) this noble army was found with serried ranks in front of the enemy at Nashville; better organized, better disciplined, better clothed and fed, in better health and tone, and in larger numbers than when it entered on the campaign, though it had made a march at least three times as long as that of the enemy in reaching the same point, and was, moreover, entirely self-sustaining.

Too high an estimate cannot be placed upon officers and men capable of such fortitude, resolution, courage and self-denial; nothing short of the patriotism which pervades our ranks, and the intelligence, zeal and gallantry displayed on all occasions, and by all grades, can account for such results.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BRAXTON BRAGG,
General Comd'g.

Gen. S. Cooper, Adjutant and Inspector General, Richmond, Virginia.

LATEST FROM THE OIL REGIONS.—The arrival of the Gen. Siegel from Burksville yesterday, with a cargo of 300 barrels of oil, intensified the already existing excitement in our incipient oil market. This installment of petroleum comes from a well on Creelsboro creek, in Kentucky, just beyond our State line. The rumors from Burksville, brought by the Gen. Siegel, throw into the shade those reported yesterday. The well upon Eagle creek, near the junction of that tributary with Obed's river, in Overton county, is casting forth a volume of coal oil, spouting some eighty feet into the air, and astonishing "the natives" immeasurably. Burksville, according to latest reports, is beginning to feel as "big" as Pithole, Pennsylvania.—Nashville Gazette 19th.

From the same paper we take the following:

An accident occurred at the Hines School yesterday, which caused some excitement. From what we could learn, it appears that Master William Howell had a pistol in his coat pocket, and that William Burt was passing by him and rubbed against the coat, when the pistol exploded, and Burt lost the two middle fingers of his right hand, which were amputated at the second joint.

Gov. Brownlow has sent a message to the Tennessee Legislature, recommending the establishment of two new Penitentiaries—one at Memphis and one at Knoxville—in consequence of the alarming increase of crime in that State.

A Tennesseean, in the course of a private letter, states the case as follows:

Now, suppose the fanatics shall declare us out of the Union, will it not be a pretty commentary on a four years' war for the Union and the Constitution? What will become of the idea of the great Union army, of the Union cause, the flag of the Union, and all that sort of thing? We of the South fought to get out. They fought to keep us in, whipped us, we thought, back again, and then declare we cannot come in—not one of us! Well, it does look strange, but it may be all right. I shall make no fuss about it; it is their business, not mine. I shall behave myself, in or out. I am utterly opposed to a mere factious opposition to the Government. It is unmanly. We fought our fight out, got whipped, and now intend to do our duty by submitting to the laws like gentlemen.

SOLDIERS KILLED.—Thursday, about dusk, Patrick Welch, a private in the 15st Illinois regiment, now garrisoning Columbus, was stabbed with a Spanish dirk by Joseph Hand, of the same regiment, from the effects of which he died early on Friday morning. As told us, Welch was under the influence of liquor, and had insulted and afterwards struck Hand. The latter not desiring a difficulty, though Welch, when intoxicated, several times previously, had grossly insulted him, started off, when Welch pursued him with a stick. When nearly up with him, Hand turned and struck Welch with his knife. The blade entered the right shoulder just below the collar bone, inflicting a mortal wound. After going for a surgeon and doing what he could for Welch, Hand delivered himself to his officers, and that night was put in the city guard house. He is, we understand, to be sent to Macon for trial. Welch was an Irishman, who enlisted in the regiment at Peoria, Illinois. Hand is from Schuyler county, in the same State.—Columbus (Ga.) Sun.

DOING WELL.—The Livingston Journal of the 20th says:

We have made it a point to inquire of our planting friends relative to the working of the freedmen, and are glad to learn that as a general thing they are conducting themselves well. Some report them working better than ever before. We find that they are doing best where they have an interest in the crop. There is no doubt that this is the best way to contract with them. Each succeeding day's work increases their interest in their work, and lessens the probability of their abandoning their contract. We predict that when "picking time" comes, and the hands realize that every lock of cotton is money to them, the fields will be picked cleaner than ever before. The freedmen have "a good thing," if they will only "save it."

DAILY.—The Huntsville Independent has commenced a daily issue.

SELMA MESSENGER.—The Selma Times, of the 17th, says that Col. T. B. Roy, late Chief of Staff to Lieutenant-General Hurdee, has purchased the interest of the late Mr. Baldwin in the Messenger, and is associated with Mr. Grace in its editorial management.

SMALLPOX.—Huntsville and Livingston papers both report the smallpox as on the increase in those places respectively.

MILITARY.—The Huntsville Independent says that Brevet Maj. Gen. Grierson, who has been for some time commanding that military district, has been mustered out of service, and Col. Johnson, of the 44th United States Colored Infantry, is now commanding the district. The 18th, 42d and 110th regiments United States Colored Infantry are soon to be mustered out of service. The 44th regiment United States Colored Infantry will be left there on duty until their place can be filled with white regulars.

EAGLE KILLED IN BARBOUR COUNTY.—The Columbus (Ga.) Sun, of the 21st, says that on the 17th two little boys named Henry Glenn and Joe Ledbetter, shot an eagle near Glennville, Alabama. The "Imperial bird" measured three feet from head to tail, and six feet one inch from tip to tip of his wings. The sight of an eagle is a rare occurrence in Eastern Alabama.

OUTRAGE ON A FREEDMAN BY SOLDIERS.—A freedman, last night, purchased a pair of shoes from the firm of Price & Bryan, and soon after leaving their store he was assailed by two Federal soldiers, who threatened his life if he did not give up the shoes. Sam forked them over, but his indignation was exceedingly aroused, and returning to the store he secured an axe-handle, with which he intended to do some heavy work; but, on returning to the point where he had been robbed, both Yankees and shoes had disappeared under the "blanket of the dark," and poor Sam was left alone to ponder over the meanness of his pretended friends and the fatal mistake he made, in leaving his home after dark. For the fourth time we warn freedmen not to venture out after dark, except in cases of absolute necessity.—Eufaula News, 18th.

ANOTHER.—One or two negroes were shot night before last by unknown parties, near this city. Such baseness and meanness, now that the Yankees have left, will not again be perpetrated with impunity in our midst. We hope, now, to see the return of law, order and quiet, and to hear no more of the robbing, shooting or maltreating of negroes.—Eufaula News, 18th.

RECOVERING FROM SMALLPOX.—The Meridian Messenger, of the 21st inst., has the following. Mr. Hooper was formerly a compositor in this office:

Mr. Hooper of this journal, whom we announced last week at the residence of his father-in-law, in Clarke county with the smallpox, has we learn, passed the most dangerous stage of his illness, and is now convalescent. Two of the servants have contracted the disease from him.

FROZEN.—We learn from the City Marshal, that Mr. Lyon, a tailor, was found about 4 o'clock Sunday morning in a nude and freezing condition on Main street. He was kindly cared for, but expired Sunday night. It is supposed that, being addicted to strong drink, he became intoxicated, was pilfered of his clothing, except shirt and drawers, and was thus left exposed all night.—Meridian Messenger, 21st.

The Jackson Standard says:

We heard a freedman, a few days since, object to entering into a contract with a planter in this county because the latter would not allow him in the summer months, in the day time, two hours for sleep, besides the dinner hour. That darkey was fond of his nap.

Justices Wallace Wilson and Wm. Binford have been elected to the position of Judges in the County Court for this (Holmes) county. Wm. A. Crenshaw has been elected by the Court Judges to the office of County Court Attorney.—Lexington Advertiser.

The Lexington Advertiser records the death of Col. Otho W. Beale and Col. A. M. Sessions, two prominent citizens of Holmes county.

The Mississippi Standard of the 24th inst. contains the following:

The following are extracts from the proceedings of the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge, at its Grand Annual Communication, in January 1866, just closed; which are published for your information, to-wit:

To the M. W. Grand Lodge of Mississippi:

The Select Committee to whom was referred that portion of the M. W. Grand Master's address upon deceased soldiers and Lodges of sorrow, beg leave to report, that they have duly considered the subject, and agree with the Grand Master, that we, as Masons, should manifest our regard and esteem, for our noble dead; and as many of them were buried on the field where they fell, and could not under the circumstances, receive the last sad rights we pay to a fallen brother; therefore,

Resolved, That this Grand Lodge recommend to its subordinate Lodges, that a Lodge of Sorrow be held in each county in the State, on the second Saturday of April next, under the direction of the oldest Lodge in the county. That a public address be delivered by some Brother, selected by said Lodge, and that a copy of the address, together with names, age, residence, when and where our Brothers were killed, or died, be forwarded to the Grand Secretary, to be preserved among the archives of this Grand Lodge.

Resolved, That in the funeral ceremonies to be performed on the second Saturday of April next, all Master Masons be included who were made such in Army Lodges, and died in the service, and that their names be placed on the rolls of those Lodges within whose jurisdiction they resided previous to their death; Provided, they are vouched for as such by Master Masons in good standing.

Said report and resolutions were adopted.

D. P. POTTER, Grand Secretary.

UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI.—The Oxford Falcon learns that there are now one hundred and twenty students at the State University, and they are still coming. The country will be glad to know that there was never a more quiet, orderly, industrious and gentlemanly body of students known in any college than they are. Great results may be expected from this on commencement day.

☞ An English paper says that robberies have lately been of frequent occurrence in the Courts of Chancery. Not long ago a short hand reporter had his coat stolen before his eyes, while taking a judgment of the Lord Chancellor. He could not leave off writing for fear of losing a sentence, and could not make a disturbance for fear of committal for contempt. At another time a reporter had a small parcel, containing valuables, abstracted from his coat pocket while taking a judgment of the Lords Justices.

THE BRIDGES ON THE STATE ROAD.—We learn from Col. Hough, the Superintendent of the State, or "Western and Atlantic Railroad," that the bridges on the road will all be completed in a few days, so that both the passengor and freight trains may pass over with safety from one end of the road to the other. Perhaps before the middle of the present week uninterrupted communication will be resumed between this city and Chattanoogn.—Atlanta Intelligencer, 21st inst.

A REVOLTING MURDER.

[Special Dispatch to the Chicago Times.]

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Jan. 22.—One of the most fiendish murders ever perpetrated in this community was brought to light yesterday by the discovery of a frozen and mutilated body on the prairie, just beyond the city limits. Two boys of the town, while at play upon the grounds, found an empty purse and a coat stained with blood, which led to the finding of the dead man. The body, when brought to the city and examined, was found to be mangled and mutilated in a manner revolting to the senses. A ball, probably that from a navy revolver, had penetrated the neck, severing the jugular vein, and another had passed through the body, entering the back and coming out near the nipple of the right breast.

Three other wounds, also probably inflicted with a revolver, were discoverable under the right shoulder. In addition to these wounds, either of which would probably have proved fatal, there were also six cuts from a knife in the back, one in the right arm, two in the breast, and still another in the back of the head. The report of the discovery of the body spread rapidly through the town, and hundreds of citizens visited the Soldiers' Home, in which the remains were laid out, though not until late this evening was the unfortunate man identified, when a lady keeping a boarding-house in the city recognized him as Henry A. Holtz, a discharged officer of the 2d Illinois cavalry, who resided in the vicinity of Decatur.

Every circumstance goes to show that robbery was the object of the assassins, and that probably the perpetrators of the fiendish crime induced their victim to accompany them to the prairie for the purpose of murdering him. Two parties have been arrested upon suspicion of implication in the crime, and the most vigilant and vigorous search is being made, both by the authorities and citizens, to ferret out the criminals, and, if possible, bring them to justice. It is thought that the deceased had a large sum of money upon his person at the time of his death, which was known to those at whose hands he died. As the body was partially covered with snow at the time of its discovery, it is supposed that the murder was committed during the severe storm of Friday night last, when a most fit opportunity was afforded.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE.

From the Vicksburg Herald, 27th.]

The interposition of the authority of the military arm should at all times be dignified and just (at least have that appearance,) to command respect from any one. The action should not be hasty, nor without the certainty of the order being based upon facts. All persons will admit that in such a condition of affairs as exists in the Southern States, with high military officials in our midst, and the country under martial law, the occasion might possibly arise when the interposition of the U. S. arms would be necessary to further the ends of justice. But, we imagine, it never occurred to any one that it was designed for this great power to be used in retarding or preventing the administration of justice. Yet we are constrained to say that the recent action of officials in this place, has created the latter impression. What are the facts?

A negro man murders his fellow-creature (of the same color), in cold blood, by chopping him to death with an axe. He is tried—has the attendance of his fellow-servants at the trial, and upon their evidence is convicted and sentenced to death. Not one word of extenuation is offered on the trial, which could weigh against the mass of testimony showing the crime to have been a predetermined murder. Yet, upon his simple statement of his defence, his reprieve is demanded, and finally he is allowed to escape from jail, the guards placed there by the U. S. authority, boldly unlocking the doors and gates to further that object. The documents laid before the Governor asking the reprieve and pardon of this man were gross and flagrant misrepresentations of the record of the case, and yet these records were not called for by the military authorities. He is turned loose upon his own statement alone, unsubstantiated by the slightest credible testimony.

Again, a set of negro thieves are convicted and sentenced to be punished, according to a law which punishes all convicts alike. The military authority steps in, and says they shall not be punished. It is not pretended they are not guilty—that cannot be denied—but they cannot be punished.

Gen. Wood, the commander of this Department, has now the confidence of our people, as a man of honor and justice. We believe he has been imposed on. We know, from the statements made to him in the case of Harrison, (the negro murderer who was allowed to escape,) that he has some subordinates who make the truth bend very conveniently to their will.

We trust we are not asking too much when we urged upon him to have the fullest investigation made into these matters. It is due to his dignity and honor that his subordinates should not bring his administration into disrepute by this reckless trifling with the most sacred alms of public justice.

HEADQUARTERS POST OF VICKSBURG,
Vicksburg, Jan. 26, 1866.

Editor Vicksburg Herald:

Sir—I am directed no notify you that the sale of persons for jail fees, fines or for any other cause, will be prohibited within this command.

By order of COL. VAN E. YOUNG.
Robt. Wilson, Capt. and Post Adjutant.

We are happy to inform Col. Young that we have none for sale.

A similar notice was served on the Sheriff. The law does not authorize the selling of persons for jail fees or fines, and it has never been done. It does authorize however, the hiring out of persons who owe fines and jail fees, to whoever will take them for the shortest space of time, and pay the fees.

NOTE FROM THE SHERIFF.

Editor Herald:—You are entirely mistaken in saying the order of Capt. Wilson, by authority of Capt. Van E. Young, to cease executing the sentences of the Court on prisoners now in jail, was handed to the Sheriff. The jail is entirely in the hands of the military authorities, and the order was addressed to the captain in charge of the jail, as the order you publish will show. The Sheriff obtained a copy of the order by applying for it at the jail.

The statement that "the same officer ordered the release of a negro prisoner on the simple statement of the negro that a white man had been released the day before," is incorrect, as far as I have any knowledge of it; and probably grew out of a conversation between myself and a Federal Colonel, who gave as an excuse for turning out of jail the condemned murderer, Harrison Brooks, that "a citizen had been turned out." No citizen has been turned out to my knowledge, except by due course of law.

SHERIFF.

This correction of Mr. Shannon only makes the matter worse. It appears the civil officers are not treated with ordinary respect—they are not even informed that civil authority has been overruled.

The explanation of the release of the condemned murderer will explain itself. Because it was said a citizen had been released, (which it appears is not true,) a Federal Colonel, who is placed here to uphold the majesty of the law, in the name of the United States, released a murderer. "Can such things be and not excite our special wonder" that nothing is done to prevent their recurrence in the future?

DEATH OF AN OLD CITIZEN.—The Baton Rouge Advocate of the 24th inst., in announcing the death of John Buhler, makes the following remarks:

This old and esteemed citizen of West Baton Rouge died at his residence in that parish on Monday evening. Mr. Buhler was among the first American settlers in this section of the country, and for many years in the old time was Sheriff of East Baton Rouge. A large portion of the city of Baton Rouge at one time belonged to him, and previous to the war he was estimated a wealthy man. He had retired to his plantation and in his old age saw his hopes of a quiet life pass rapidly away.

Mr. Buhler was over 80 years of age; his remains were brought to this city this morning and interred in the Magnolia Cemetery.

TRIAL OF GEN. H. W. MERCER.—The trial of this gentleman at Savannah, by a Military Court, has closed. We have no doubt that he will be acquitted, as the evidence was clear that he knew nothing of the proceedings of the Court-Martial that condemned the seven men to death, consequently did not order their execution.—Montgomery Advertiser.

THE OPELOUSAS ROAD.

The Franklin Banner of the 27th complains bitterly of the high rates of freight recently imposed by the military Superintendent upon the patrons of the Opelousas Railroad. Our cotemporary says:

Why does this extra charge for freights across this railroad spring up against us at so unfortunate a period? It is our railroad—it was made in and for Louisiana. We do not speak of the seizing of this road in time of war. That was a war measure, and no one pretends to blame the Government for making use of it. But why do the agents of the Government now make this an engine with which to impoverish an almost starving people, and to sink us still lower in misery and want? If these exorbitant prices of freights were a dire necessity to relieve worse suffering than our people now endure, it might be excusable. But what suffering community or individual is relieved by these high prices? We know of none.

As the Opelousas road has quite recently been, or is about to be turned over to the stockholders, and will be managed by a Board elected by them, it is probable that the citizens living along the route will soon be relieved of cause for complaint upon this score. The editor of the Banner must "possess his soul with patience."

☞ An agent at Jackson, Miss., of a Northern company has recently sold and leased for the owners in that State, says the News, the following places: He sold W. Milton Pickett's fine plantation on Big Black river, 2440 acres, fine steam gin, and hogs, cattle, corn, etc., for $20,000 in gold; T. C. Ballon's place near Calhoun Station, 2820 acres, with full supply of stock meat, for $25,000 in gold; and has rented M. Pickett's home plantation, containing about 2000 acres of open land, at a yearly rent of $5000 in currency, with privilege of purchasing at any time during lease at $10 per acre in gold. He has leased most of John Robinson's fine estate in Madison, and three plantations of the estate of Dr. Thomas, and Col. Walter Hearney's Big Black place; all with privilege of purchasing at stipulated prices during the term of lease.

The plantations that have been leased are to be sub-let by the company for which he is acting, to emigrants North, from $1000 to $5000 each, who will settle on the land and farm at their own expense.

BREAKING JAIL IN MOBILE.—Six desperadoes confined in the city jail, succeeded in breaking out on Wednesday night. The following are the rogues who have temporarily succeeded in defrauding justice:

Thomas O'Neil, charged with a heavy robbery in New Orleans; William Barber, a pickpocket and hotel thief; J. Barnes and J. Rivers, arrested as dangerous and suspicious characters; J. Wirt, a notorious expert, and heretofore very successful thief; and Edward Smith, arrested for an attempt to kill.

Some of their friends succeeded in smuggling a saw into their cell by burying it in a loaf of bread. The jail birds sawed a hole in the ceiling, passed through into the garret of the guardhouse, thence to the bell tower, and from there over the shed of a stable to the open streets and liberty.

So far no trace has been found of them, and it is doubtful whether any will. However, if they will keep away from Mobile, their escape may after all prove a benefit to the city.—Times 26th inst.

☞ The New York Sun hints that Mr. Wilson's army bill will be defeated, and for the reason that it provides a standing army just fifty thousand beyond the necessary number. Every army man costs over $1000, and Mr. Wilson's bill would make the aggregate cost eighty or ninety millions per annum.

MONETARY.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, FEB. 2, 1866.

The most prominent feature in the financial movement to day has been a decline of fully 1½@2 per cent. in rates of foreign exchange.

Gold opened heavy at yesterday's closing quotations, and continued inactive throughout the day. Advices for New York, published in the morning papers, showed a decline of ½ per cent., that market yesterday, and subsequent dispatches exhibited a further decline up to 11:30 A. M. to-day of ¼ per cent. discount. Rates in our market also receded, as will be seen on reference to our quotations; but the movement was of such a restricted character, from the opening to the close of business, that prices cannot be regarded as much lighter than nominal. The following comprise the whole of the operations for the day, so far as they have been verified to our satisfaction, viz: $6000 at 139½; $5000, $10,000 and $40,000 at 139¾; $5500 at 139½; and some deliveries of gold recently received from New York, via Charleston, which, having been previously published in the way of regular sales, need not be again enumerated. Sales of silver were confined to a few hundred dollars of American halves at previous figures. We now quote gold at 139½@139¾, and silver at 133@135 for American coin, and 138@139 for Mexican dollars.

Foreign exchange has been dull and drooping all day. The supply, which was previously heavy, had been considerably augmented by recent large sales of cotton, and most of the principal buyers uniformly refused to operate, except at figures which holders steadily declined to accept. Rates fell off, nevertheless, fully 1@2 per cent., at which figures the business for the day has been restricted to the following operations, viz: £1000 bill of lading sterling, bought by a bank, at 147, and £6000 and £2400 do., taken by the same, at 147½; £5400 clear bills at 148, £10,000, taken by a bank, at 147, 148 and 148½; £2500 at 148¾; £1000, £3800 and £7000 at 149, £8000 at 148½ and £3500 at 149¾; bales of francs comprised 100,000f. and 100,000f. at 5.17½@5.16¼, 20,000f. at 5.15, 300,000f. and 400,000f., in several lots, the latter bought by one bank, at 5.18¾@5.17½, and 90,000f. at 5.15. The quotations at the close of business were, for sterling 150 at bank, clear bills 149@149½, bill of lading bills 146¾@147¼; bank-francs 5.13¾@5.16¼, and out-door francs 5.20@5.15.

Domestic exchange has been heavy all day, with a downward tendency in rates, but the market has not shown a decline in the same ratio as is disclosed in the foreign exchange movement. Offerings, though somewhat larger than heretofore, exhibited no excess whatever, and the demand was fair from the opening to the close of the market. The banks checked throughout at previous figures, without meeting, however, more than a moderate demand; and the movement in private and commercial has been restricted to the following operations, viz: $10,000, $20,000, $40,000, $50,000, $75,000, $75,000 and $100,000 New York sight, at ½ per cent. discount; $60,000 Boston sight sight sold in the morning at 7-16 per cent. discount; $25,000, $40,000, $50,000, $50,000 and $125,000 New York and Boston sight at ½ per cent. discount, and $80,000 Boston sight at ⅜ per cent. discount; $10,000 five days' sight at ¾; $75,000 three days' at ¾; $10,000 fifteen days at ½; $10,000 ten days' at ½, and $20,000 fifty days' at ⅝ per cent. discount. Quotations, at the close of business this evening, ruled as follows, viz: New York sight ½@¾ per cent. discount at bank, and ⅝@¾ per cent. discount out of doors; five and ten days' sight, ⅝@¾ per cent. discount; fifteen and twenty days' sight, ¾@1 per cent. discount, and thirty days' sight, 1@1¼ per cent. discount.

Stocks and bonds continue inactive. There is a moderate inquiry for a few favorite securities, which, owing to recent heavy sales, have become unusually scarce, but the general run of securities appears to be very much neglected. Sales, to day, have been restricted to 42 shares Pontchartrain Railroad Company, 25 shares Citizens' Bank and 15 shares City Railroad stock at prices that have been suppressed, and $10,000 Opelousas Railroad bonds on private terms.

Current bank notes appear to have come to a stand-still. Offerings show a marked diminution, and the demand is only moderate although prices continue stiff. The only operations that have come to our knowledge since the close of the previous article were: $100 Louisiana State Bank at 75½c., $1000 do. at 75c., and $1200 Bank of New Orleans at 89c. per dollar. We still quote Union Bank, Crescent City Bank and Bank of New Orleans at 85@90c., Merchants' Bank and Louisiana State Bank at 73@76c., and Bank of Louisiana at 50@55c. per dollar.

REDUCTION OF BANK CAPITAL.—At a meeting of the stockholders of the Canal Bank, held yesterday, it was unanimously resolved to reduce the capital stock of the bank fifty per cent. Books for the registry of the votes of the stockholders will be kept open at the bank for the next sixty days, when if a majority do not dissent, the movement will be considered as carried, and the reduction will follow.

COMMERCIAL.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, FEB. 2, 1866.

COTTON—The market opened this morning with Liverpool advices to the 17th ult., at hand, which were looked upon as far less discouraging than had been generally apprehended, and with New York advices to the close of business yesterday, which were deemed highly favorable. There was a moderate inquiry noticeable throughout the forenoon, but, as offerings were light and asking rates rather stiffer, the movement was of a very restricted character. Subsequently, the difficulty in the way of placing foreign exchange, and, in fact, the heavy decline to which sellers of sterling and francs had to submit, tended materially to weaken prices and retard operations, and the transactions for to-day were limited to 1480 bales, of which one party took 212 after 6 P. M., divided among buyers in the following order, viz: 300, 224, 213, 200, 200, 150, 100, 53, 50, 12 and 10 bales. The market was unsettled from the opening to the close, and despite the rumore of ¼d. advance at Liverpool on the 20th ult., which were freely circulated at a late hour, it closed inactive at yesterday's quotations, which, having been the ruling figures for the day, we repeat as follows, viz: Ordinary, 40c; fair, 43c; good ordinary, 44@45c.; low middling, 46@47c.; and middling, 48@49c.

A THOUSAND CHURCHES ON FIRE!

Messrs. Editors—I have been making enquiries all over the South respecting the destruction of churches during the late war. And while I am not prepared to speak with anything like exactness from statistical information, yet, from all I can learn I am led to believe that not less than from one thousand to twelve hundred churches were destroyed by the Christian army of the most religious people in the world. These buildings cost the Southern Churches of all denominations not less than five millions of dollars. The Baptists and Methodists suffered the most; the Presbyterians next, and the Catholics the least. A full report ought to be obtained, and recorded in letters of brass, as a perpetual memento of the affection and love which have been cherished for us for forty years, and is still felt towards "erring brethren!"

Whole districts of country, where formerly many churches stood, the evidences of at least some civilization, if not "genuine Christianity," are now without a shingle to cover the Sabbath worshippers. Northern ecclesiastics boasted to the Administration of the large numbers the Church had sent to the army.—Every company, regiment and brigade, swelling with Church communicants, "making a league with death and a covenant with hell" to exterminate all "bogus Christianity," and adopting as a primary measure the destruction of church edifices.

Is not that a sight to make angels—of a certain order—glad?—Nine-tenths of these churches were used alike by the negro and his master. Colored and white, either together or at separate hours of the day, worshipped in those houses.—Now the African has no place where he may worship with his brethren, and the "white trash" are laughed at as a churchless set of "Godforsaken wretches." A few churches were left, it is true, in some cities. But these buildings were seized as lawful prizes of war. Best government, best people, best Christians, the world ever saw!!! And now having impoverished us, they tell us our poverty is our ruin. Good brothers! Your Photographic Doctor, who is editing one of the real torch-light Yankee Methodist Advocates, informs the North that—"The war has left that Church (Methodist Episcopal Church South) miserably poor, and her poverty is the precursor of her ecclesiastical ruin in Texas. At present, her members have no church edifice in Houston, * * * it having fallen down, and is now a mass of shapeless ruins." So it is down? Of course.

But, "her poverty is the precursor of her ruin." Wealth essential to church success, and poverty the forerunner of her ruin!! Wonder what the Apostles would say to this doctrine, if they were to speak? or Wesley, or Lee, or the good old Fathers who preached the Gospel in the North before the present race of fanatics was born? But, enough here.

Till within a few years past the people of Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, and other Yankee States, were in the habit of sending their agents "down South," on collecting tours, to obtain funds for building school-houses, academies, colleges, and endowing them, and for paying off old church debts and building new churches; and some years ago these travelling agents were so numerous, that the pulpits were frequently filled for weeks together by "visiting brethren," and the pastor had no chance to preach himself. Then, we were rich. True, we "plundered the poor negro;" but they did not think the "partaker" "had ought" to trouble his conscience about that. But, to be even with us—they hurnt us out clean!

Now, would it not look like doing a right thing for the great Northwest to raise half a million of dollars, and send "down South" to pay for the rebuilding of some of these ruined churches? Five millions of dollars would hardly restore them.

I remember that when a heathen General took Alexandria, and some of his soldiers plundered one of the temples of the gods of that benighted people, he was shocked at such conduct, and ordered the perpetrators of the sacrilege to be summarily punished, and the temple repaired and adorned at his own expense.

By-the-by, a case in point:

Being present at Alexandria a few days after the burning of the town, I heard from the lips of a minister's wife this incident. During the occupancy of the place by Gen. Banks, two Chaplains presented themselves at the door, and wished to obtain board at the Parsonage. She replied, that it was so difficult to obtain provisions, that it would be almost impossible to accommodate them.

"O, sister," said they, "we wish only a little corn cake and bacon;" any little thing. We have to send our salaries home, and cannot afford to pay much."

"So they used to bring to the table," said she, "some Boston crackers and dried apples every day, as their contribution to the meal—emptying their pockets and throwing a cracker or so to each person and child at the table."

When the church and parsonage were on fire, these godly men were standing near, and while she was fainting with heat and fear and exertion, and engaged in pulling her beds out of the rooms, they merely looked on and said: "Sister, don't be uneasy; there is no cause for alarm, we assure you. Gen. Banks has five thousand men engaged in putting out the fire."

Most religious people in the world!

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

THE GOSPEL IS THE POWER OF GOD UNTO SALVATION.

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts." "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." "Without me you can do nothing." "Our sufficiency is of God." "We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God."—"Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth, glory in the Lord."

Such are the teachings of the Book—but is not the wish nor the wisdom of man. Man is ever prone to rely upon some human expedient. One class relies upon claims to antiquity, to venerable and solemn Gothic piles, fretted roofs and long-drawn aisles—statuary, paintings, gorgeous robes and solemn ceremonials. Another class relies upon what is called respectability—a membership rich, refined, high in civil and social station, eminently above and out of the reach of the plebian vulgar. Others rely much upon colleges—an educated ministry—upon logic, rhetorical elegance—and others upon oratory and elocutionary graces.

Of late we have heard a good deal of loyalty, of numbers, and accumulated wealth, as grand evidences of power, and pledges of future triumph. So some enthusiastic, perhaps good, but certainly mistaken men, wrote and talked when Constantine emblazoned the cross upon the imperial robes and imperial banners. "When I am weak, then I am strong," is a grand Christian truism. Its converse is a grand truism too—When I am strong, then I am weak. The Gospel is the power of God unto salvation. Let us never forget this grand Christian axiom, and let us always rely upon it, and go forward in the strength of the Lord—so shall we run through a troop and leap over a wall.

We have been told that our Southern Methodist Zion has been a great sufferer—that many of our holy and beautiful houses have been burnt with fire—that thousands of our membership have been impoverished—that our ministry, our church papers, our colleges, cannot be sustained; that we must give up our distinct organization and church existence, and many such like things. Doubtless, to the shame and blame of some, we have been sufferers, in no small measure, in our "temporal things." But what if it were true to the extent alleged? Was the Gospel, as preached by McKendree and Capers, and the long line of their faithful coadjutors and successors in these Southern lands, dependent for its efficiency or success upon colleges and church papers? Nay, verily; but in the strength of God they went forth, lifted up their voices and blew a mighty blast, before which sin and error fell, as the walls of Jericho, and Dagon before the Ark of God. Will not their sons catch their consecrated mantles, and with buckled harness, shout to the glorious strife—

> "And lead the pompous triumph on"?

The age is doubtless much militarianized; but heroism, self-denial, self-consecrating love and lofty purpose, have not yet fled the Church; there are yet many times "seven thousand" in our Israel who have not bowed the knee to a self-seeking and mammonizing "Baal," and who rejoice that they are counted worthy to toil and to suffer "for his Name." These will go forth, emblazing on their banners—"God forbid that we should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," and

> "The Lord shall in their front appear,
> And perfect what his grace begun."

But though the smell of fire is upon our garments and upon our land, we thank God we have garments still—a land that shall yet blossom as the rose, and bloom as the garden of God; the "parched ground shall become a pool of living waters"—and yet better still we have hearts that glow with love and flame with zeal. We will not "weary with well-doing;" we know we shall reap in due time if we faint not, for we serve the Lord Christ, and he has promised to be with us alway, even unto the end of the world.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

LETTER FROM JACKSON, LA.

JACKSON, La., Feb. 1, 1866.

Mr. Editor—The "New Orleans Christian Advocate" is again out; unfolding its leaves in beauty, and offering its precious fruitage to the famishing and fainting sons and daughters of Zion: another sign of returning peace—another harbinger of returning prosperity, and another rainbow of promise, projected, it is hoped, upon the dark back-ground of a receding and final deluge. At this omen every true lover of Methodism, and of the cause of Christ, throughout the South-west, ought to rejoice and render thanksgiving. My soul does rejoice. God yet is; the Church yet survives; her faithful, laborious, sacrificing agents appear again in the field, at their posts, with their armor on: how silently, seriously, sublimely do they assume their places, ready to do or die; trials and losses behind, perils on either hand, labor, suffering and further sacrifice before, but with faith and love within, and God above, and salvation and heaven the end, at work they go. Here is sublime moral heroism. May the great Head of the Church be with and strengthen her heroes.

I repeat, I rejoice at the revival of the Advocate, and wish it could at once be put into the hands of every Methodist in the bounds of the Patronizing Conferences.

Our people for many years have been deprived of regular preaching, of our periodicals and literature; have seen so many leave the Church, go to the army and to other lands and communions—many never to return; have had so few revivals and comparatively no accessions to the church; have witnessed such a desolation and destruction of our church organizations, churches and property, through the influence of war or the action and occupancy of its agents; and have beheld such a perfect paralysis and the consequent suspension of all our missionary, educational periodical and book agencies, and such irregularity in the exercise of our ecclesiastical functions: that at the close of the war, many feared lest Southern Methodism was to be, or had been, swallowed up, in the great maelstrom that had engulphed the political commercial and agricultural interests of a great people, that had struggled to be free, prosperous and happy, and had lost all in that struggle but virtue. Surely, said they, the ship will founder. Some might be seen in silence standing, leaning and looking over the gunwale of the storm beaten bark, peering into the darkness, if by-chance, they might descry something more seaworthy to bear them to land; of these a few perished the sea and while some sank, others only reached the vessel, to find that it too was well nigh wrecked, and nearer the fatal pool, while they themselves had well nigh or quite made shipwreck of faith.

But thanks to God, the storm has abated, the clouds disperse, the ship has righted, her decks are being cleared, the crew are ready, the pilot is at the wheel, the voice of the Master is heard above the dying wail of the receding tempest, and we hear the welcome order, weigh anchor and spread the sail for the wind is fair and the voyage reopens. The number of the passengers may be diminished, but those that remain are "called and chosen." There is yet "faith in the earth." The old ship may go into dock, at some favorable port, near by, for repair shortly, and well she may after a tempestuous voyage of eight years, without replacing a plank, or closing a ream, or driving a spike; but this delay will neither lengthen the voyage nor diminish the profits of the trip.

The revival of the Advocate and of the other periodicals of the church, by which our people can again learn what is being done, in all departments of our ecclesiastical labor, will do more, to restore our membership to their original stand point of faith in God, confidence in the efficiency and permanency of Methodism, and of labor for a personal growth in grace and for the salvation of others; than will the revival of any other single outward agency of the Church. The Advocate, in the family, on the table, of an evening, or on the Sabbath day; with its glowing columns and pages; of facts, anecdotes and incidents; its letters, spicy, spiritual, controversial; its essays, moral, sentimental, ethical, æsthetical, religious; its poetry, its song—angel's form of praise; its column to little children, story, verse and riddle, but full of simple gospel milk for babes; its solemn obituary, showing how a man in Christ can live, and more, how such an one can die; the Advocate in the family, in the hands of the aged father or mother, is next the Bible. Send it to every family ye faithful pastors of the flock.

INDEX.

CHRIST'S SYMPATHY.

While the storm was fiercely blowing,
While the sea was wildly flowing,
Angry wind and angry billow,
Only rocked the Saviour's pillow;
Jesus slept.

But when sudden grief was rending
Human hearts in sorrow bending;
When he saw the sisters weeping,
Where their brother's form was sleeping,
"Jesus wept."

REV. EDWIN BALDWIN.

We insert the following notice of the burial of this eminent minister from the Montgomery correspondent of the Southern Christian Advocate:

On Friday last we buried, in our city cemetery, by the side of his little boy, "Sunshine," Rev. Edwin Baldwin, of the Mobile Conference. He died on Tuesday, of apoplexy, in Selma; of course suddenly. The corpse was brought up on the steamboat Republic. The bereaved widow and elder children were accompanied by Rev. Josiah Barker and Judge Byrd. The company of mourners was received at the parsonage on Friday morning. They departed that night—Capt. Meagher offering a free passage to them both ways.

Bro. Baldwin had been pastor here for the years 1862 and 1863. His memory is precious with the church and the community. Though his funeral sermon had been pronounced in Selma, by Rev. J. Barker, of Summerfield, yet on its way to the grave the body of our beloved brother was brought into the church of this city, placed in front of the pulpit which had so often been the scene of his earnest prayers and eloquent sermons, and brief but affecting religious services impressed and sanctified the occasion. Revs. J. W. Jordan and I. C. Davis, with the pastor, took part in them. Rev. O. R. Blue was present, but unable to participate, except in the common grief.

Among the congregation that gathered at the tolling of the bell, were many colored people, weeping. The covering of the metallic coffin was removed above the face, and the whites first, and then colored, were invited to pass by and look on his countenance. It retained much of its natural expression, and was very placid in death. The 90th Psalm was read, prayer was offered, a few words spoken to those who had enjoyed his ministry and should not see his face again till the heavens be no more, the hymn was sung—and the procession took its way to the burial ground.

> "Come, let us join our friends above
> Who have obtained the prize"—

The church here will, as soon as it can be done, inscribe a marble slab, or raise a monument over his dust. They took on them the charges connected with the occasion, and I trust will be able to contribute something to the support of his family.

Had our brother lived to the 28th of this month, he would have been 38 years old. He was born in Franklin county, Georgia. His father, a lawyer and man of the world; his mother, a goodly woman, who took her child with her to church, to prayer meeting, to class meeting, to love feast. And though he lost her at twelve years of age, he was often heard to say, that to her moulding influence upon his character he owed, under God, all he was or hoped to be. He was the youngest of eight children, and as far as I can learn, the only one that has died, and the only one in the church. Right here some will puzzle themselves trying to comprehend the ways of God. An old problem.—The Judge of all the earth will do right.

Bro. Baldwin dated his first vital exercises in religion in his fifteenth year; but borne away by adverse moral influences, he did not confess Christ before men and consecrate himself to his service in the presence of the congregation, till 1850, when he joined our church in this city, under the ministry of Rev. J. T. Heard. Subsequently he connected himself with the Methodist Protestant Church, and began to preach in 1851. After four years' ministry in that church, spent in Butler and Sumter counties of this State, he re-connected himself with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and filled successively the following important stations: One year in Uniontown, two in St. Francis St. charge, Mobile, two in Columbus, Miss., two in Franklin St. charge, Mobile, two in Montgomery, two in Selma, and, at the late Conference, received an appointment to Uniontown, to which place he had not removed his family at the time of his death.

While in Selma, during the past year, he, in association with Rev. F. M. Grace, established the Messenger, a daily paper, which has been a decided success. He wrote as he spoke, and the tone of his paper was elevated and moral. He did not resort to the abandonment of the pulpit, but that he might continue in the pulpit—eking out an insufficient support.

A few days before he died he had made a verbal contract, selling out his interest in the paper, and purchasing, within a few miles from Selma, a home for his family. He died supposing these arrangements complete.

I have known few equals to Bro. Baldwin in the delivery of sermons. His elocution was remarkable. I never heard him without being impressed with the duty of the Christian ambassador paying attention to the manner as well as the matter of his high discourse. We have this treasure in earthen vessels, but his was a highly polished one.

I am running into a memoir, which is not my office, and was no part of my intention. One or two things, however, I may not omit to mention: A few days before his death our brother had a strong yearning of soul to see again his sainted mother. The dead, which die in the Lord, are not far from us. Between God's children on this side and on that, there is only a narrow stream and a thin veil. Who shall say that whisperings and voices from the other side are not sometimes wafted over to those whose time is at hand?

He attended the session of the Mobile Conference. The news of the sudden death of a dear friend and former parishioner, Mrs. Julia Elder, was brought into the room where he was seated with a number of brethren. "It seems to me," said he, "that my best friends are all dying, and had my family but a home provided, I do not care how soon I go too."

TRINITY CHURCH IN THE HOLIDAYS.

Trinity Church is a great attraction to strangers; and during the late holidays, not only they but the older inhabitants have been drawn thither by the interesting services. The Christmas adornings of this stately sanctuary were very tasteful and contrasted happily with the superabundant ornamentation with which we have seen some of our rural churches disfigured. There was nothing to draw the attention specially from the worship, and that worship on Christmas day was conducted in a most decorous and solemn manner.

The music was extraordinarily fine in all its parts. The renderings of the chorus from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, was made more impressive by what was to us a musical and affecting novelty. When the choir-boys had given the last line of each, it was repeated by the full choir with all the parts, the volume of sound swelled by many voices in the congregation. The notes were then given by the organ in interlude, and just as the last note was gliding up in praise to the Almighty Lord, through the stone roofing of His earthly house, the bells, high up over all that packed mass and all this great city, repeated the whole strain with the most precise and musical distinctness. The liquid notes glided down into the silence that lay on that profoundly hushed multitude, as clearly as if they ran through the air of a forest when no breeze was on the wing.—Those who can recall the simple, sweet, and noble air of that strain, may, perhaps, imagine an effect which we mention but cannot describe.

We kept at Trinity what the Methodists call "Watch-Night," seeing the old year out and the new year in. At forty minutes past eleven, P. M., of the last day of December, the chimes began. Before that hour, the portion of Broadway in the vicinity of the church began to be thronged. People of all ranks and of different nationalities were there. The church was crowded.—The devout and the profane, the sober and the gay, the rich and the poor, had met together at the house of the Lord who is the Maker of them all. Files of elegant carriages held invalids and ladies. Poor women and children stood on the slushed pavement in insufficient raiment. Many were struggling to enter the church—some to come out. The police were active. Pickpockets were on the alert. Fat drivers of private carriages drowsed in their seats. Fun was riotous. Many hearts were full of sorrow as they remembered where they were on the last night of the preceding year. Lovers were speaking soft things. People that were trod on were saying hard things. Some prayed. Some looked down Wall street, which Trinity faces, as if the Church of God would bear its daily protest against Mammon; and they thought of the terrible struggles of the past year, and the probable struggles of the coming. Such is life!

Mr. James E. Ayliff is the artist who performed. 1. There was the ringing of changes on eight bells, sudden, distinct, soft, the beginning of the end of the year. 2.—Haydn's "Praise the Lord, ye heavens adore Him," very lofty and noble.

While all this was falling on the people and going up to God, we were in the churchyard, standing in the rear of the building among the tombs, all covered with deep snow, under whose sheets lie some sleepers, whose ears for a hundred years have been hearing what utterances there are in the eternal world; and our mind ran forward through another hundred years to come:

> "Who'll press for gold this crowded street,
> A hundred years to come?
> Who'll tread you church with willing feet
> A hundred years to come?
> Pale, trembling age and fiery youth,
> And childhood with his brow of truth,
> The rich and poor, on land and sea:
> Where will the mighty million be
> A hundred years to come?
>
> "We all within our graves shall sleep,
> A hundred years to come;
> No living soul for us will weep,
> A hundred years to come;
> But other men our land will till,
> And others then our streets will fill,
> And other singers gay and bright,
> Shall rouse the drowsy hours of night,
> A hundred years to come."

But our heart was by a young soldier's narrow grave, and then by other graves in far off places.—And so we went by a private entrance into the church, and knelt, and prayed, and gave up past and future to the Father of Eternity.—3. And while thus the chimes fell, slightly softened by the building through which they came, singing Guardini's notes of the hymn—"Quiet, Lord, my forward heart," and our heart was quieted. 4. And then so clear, so almost articulate and syllabic, came "Watchman, tell us of the night," up to twelve o'clock—then a pause—then the tolling of that hour, whose strokes are like the fluttering of a human soul just out of the body, and scarcely gone, palpitating between worlds—and then again came the first notes of the New Year, as they were the last of the old, "Watchman, tell us of the night." "Is that a voice to me? Is that my people asking me in my new work to be true and faithful; and God commanding me to make known unto the people how the stars of Providence are marching up the skies of human destiny? O Lord God Almighty! THE WATCHMAN walketh but in vain, unless Thou, who never slumberest, keep the city."

And he that by that stone pillar made his New-Year's prayer, rose and came away to watch for you, dear readers, through all this year, if God will, and cry the hours of progress, and warn of danger, and strive to win you to that life unmeasured by years—to that new day that hath not night nor winter nor end—to that temple not made with hands, eternal in the heavens!

ON TEACHING YOUR CHILDREN TO PRAY.

> "How can little children's hearts
> Bring forth flowers of love,
> Unless Christ the Lord impart
> Sunshine from above?"

We should not only pray with our little ones in retirement, from early infancy, but teach them how to approach the mercy seat, in the name of Jesus, with reverence and humility. The Rev. J. C. Ryle, speaking on this subject, says—"If you love your children, do all that lies in your power to train them up to a habit of prayer. Show them how to begin. Tell them what to say. Encourage them to persevere. Remind them if they become careless and slack about it." This, remember, is the first step in religion which a child is able to take. Long before he can read, you can teach him to kneel by his mother's side, and repeat the simple words of prayer and praise which she puts in his mouth. And as the first steps in an undertaking are always the most important, so is the manner in which your children's prayers are prayed—a point which deserves your closest attention. Few seem to know how much depends on this. Beware lest they get in the way of saying them in a hasty, careless and irreverent manner. Never give up the oversight of this matter to servants and nurses, or to your children when left to themselves.—That mother deserves no praise who never looks after this most important part of her child's daily life herself. Mothers! surely if there be any habit which your own hand and eye should help in forming, it is the habit of prayer. If you never hear your children pray yourself, you are much to blame. You are little wiser than the bird described by Job, "which leaveth her eggs in the earth and warmeth them in the dust, and forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them. She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers; her labor is in vain without fear."

Prayer is, of all habits, the one which we recollect the longest.—Many a gray-headed man could tell you how his mother used to make him pray in the days of his childhood. Other things have passed away from his mind, perhaps. The church where he was taken to worship—the minister whom he heard preach—the companions who used to play with him—all these, it may be, have passed from his memory, and left no mark behind. But you will often find it far different with his first prayers. He will often be able to tell you where he knelt, and what he was taught to say, and how his mother looked all the while. It will come up fresh in his mind's eye as if it were but yesterday.

Reader, if you love your children, let not the seed-time of a careful habit pass away unimproved. If you train your children to anything, train them at least to a habit of prayer.

> "Prayer is the incense of the soul,
> The odor of the flowers,
> And raises as the waters roll,
> To God's controlling power."

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

KENTUCKY AND CALIFORNIA.

We extract from the St. Louis Advocate—

Rev. L. D. Huston, D. D., during his recent visit to this city, attending the Missionary Anniversary, communicated to us some pleasing facts, concerning his charge at Newport, Ky.

His spacious church there is thronged every Sabbath with attentive listeners and many devout worshippers.

His Sabbath School has increased from less than a score of pupils, to greet him on his first arrival, to 200 or more.

His choir, aided by the rich tones of a cabinet organ, is rarely excelled, and not often equalled, by Zion's songsters in Methodist chapels, in the thrilling, sacred melody produced.

We had the pleasure of seeing, in the possession of Dr. Huston, an admirable photographic likeness of the Rev. Andrew M. Baily. Neither California climate, nor the arduous labors of California itinerancy, have marred the visage, dimmed the eye, nor bowed the form of our long-absent brother; howbeit, his hair, erect as in the days of his youth, is slightly whitened; whether really so, in the original, by the frosts of the golden shore, or only such an appearance in the picture, by the pencil touches of "Old Sol," the artist, we could not divine. The numerous friends of brother Bailey will be glad to hear that he and his excellent wife are still among the living.

He is now in the middle of his fourth year as Presiding Elder of the San Francisco District, and with his family of seven children, is living in comfortable circumstances, on a very pleasant little farm.—His wife is however in rather feeble health.

We took the liberty of copying from his letter to Dr. Huston the following passages, which will be read with interest. Should this meet his eye, we trust he will pardon the trespass on his family correspondence. He says:

"Our Church has stood the storm on this coast, and we yet live. If our brethren in Kentucky knew what the spirit of Northern Methodism is, where they have the power, they would be slow to unite with them.

"I fear you will have great trouble in Northern Kentucky; but we have only to stand firm to our principles and we will have success.—If the subject of slavery were the cause of difference between the Methodist Episcopal Church North and the Church South, the time has now come for us to unite. But that is not the question. Shall the Church legislate upon purely political subjects? The North affirm—we deny. The issue is made up; and we appeal to the God of Truth to defend the right. My only fear is that we will depart from the simplicity of the truth as it is in Jesus. Faith in Christ as a present, all-saving power, is the hope of the world. Let the people have this, pure, unadulterated and simple, and all will be well."

The California Advocate is revived under the title of The Christian Spectator, and edited by Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald. May success attend our California brethren in all their enterprises!

Dr. Carlyon describes a dinner party as "a hospitable attempt upon your life."

A FRIEND OF OURS, somewhat given to reading, recommends Gray's Elegy as a "good thing."

GENERAL CONFERENCE EXTRA.

During the session of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, to be held in this city in April next, we shall issue a Daily Extra, which will be furnished at two dollars for the whole period of the session. Persons wishing it will please forward their subscriptions at an early day.

TO OUR AGENTS AND SUBSCRIBERS

1. The price of the paper is FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE: and it will be sent or 12 months only, unless the subscription price is renewed. NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

A Branch of the Methodist Publishing House is located in this city, and the Rev. R. J. Harp has recently been appointed Agent of it. It has on hand a good supply of our Church Publications—a large one of Hymn Books.

The well known enterprise and industry of the Agent is the best assurance that can be given that all orders will be promptly and correctly filled. The Express Companies for a trifle will insure the safe delivery of any books which our friends in the country may order.—Address Rev. R. J. Harp, New Orleans, No. 112 Camp street.

MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE.

We have not sent one paper generally to the Preachers of this Conference, because we have no list of their appointments for the present year. We hope to have this remedied before our next issue. We have ventured to send to some of our old patrons; but it may be that the directions represent the dead, not the living. In instances where we have sent several papers to the "Preacher in charge," he will please distribute.

GRAMMAR AND HIGH SCHOOL.

Our old friend, Rev. Dr. H. C. Thweatt, gives notice to his friends that he has opened a School for fitting young men for college, &c., at the corner of Magazine street and Louisiana Avenue. The Doctor was formerly Superintendent of the Mans field Female College, and has in various institutions of the Church during twenty years established a high character as an educator. His friends are many and everywhere, in the Church and out of it. For more exact information see his advertisement this week.

FROM THE INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE.—A letter from that venerable and faithful man of God, Rev. D. B. Cumming, who has labored so long and so faithfully among the Indians, writes, informing the St. Louis Christian Advocate that the religious interest in the bounds of the Indian Mission Conference is as great, and the prospects for future good as encouraging, as could have been expected. Fewer of the Christian Indians have gone back to the world, he says, than one would have supposed. This is most gratifying news; and it is hoped all the interests of the Church there will soon be again in a healthful and prosperous condition.

BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.—The Baltimore Conference commenced its session at Alexandria, Va., on the first Wednesday of February, (February 7th) 1866, at 9 o'clock, A. M.

MARRIED—December 27, 1865, by the Rev. Dr. Summers, Mr. WILLIAM N. KNIGHT to Miss SUSAN EVA HOPPELL, of Greensboro, Ala.

A letter from Dr. Summers—the first of a series, we hope—will appear in our next issue.

RETURNING REASON.

We have read with much satisfaction an article from the pen of the Rev. Dr. Whedon, in the recent number of the Quarterly Review of the Methodist Episcopal Church.—The article is entitled, "Spirit of the Southern Methodist Press." It is characterized by good sense and an excellent spirit—as the Doctor happily puts it, a desire that we should "hear and understand each other."—Surely this is the barrier to a solid, felt, peace—the difficulty of hearing and being heard. The impracticable man is the man who will not hear—who moves round and round in the perfect circle of his own thoughts, who believes nothing from without, reads nothing, wants nothing. Your world-bender, a man of small parts it may be, but of immense generalizing power; with little information, accurate or loose, but with an immense idea of his own historical position. With great original innate ideas he determines the precise bearing of everything, human and divine, providential and political, by the profound philosophy that "Westward the star of empire takes its way." Asia is antediluvian, the mission of Europe is fulfilled, "Let us now consider the magnificent domain God has given us." The words which fill the ear of such a man are, "mummeries," "corruptions," "decreptitude," "decay," "epochs," "destiny," "development," "progress," "high destiny," "manifest destiny," and "one sublime nationality."

"While down the happy Future runs his flood,
Of prophesying light."

Such cases are hopeless. Without the "hearing ear" they would be hopeless as sinners, and they are hopeless for all purposes of making peace. They read the New York Christian Advocate, the New York Independent—possibly the speeches of Senator Wilson and Mr. Sumner. Doomed to the night of their own prejudices, woe be to the people for whom they legislate or pray.

We are happy to believe that there are men at the North wise and good who do hear—who can distinguish amid the confusion of sounds the words of the Spirit of Peace. Long after the storm has ceased the subsiding waves lash the shore. It is only by the power of a present Saviour that winds "hush," and waves instantly "stop"—it then demands a double miracle.

It is but reasonable that at the close of a period of blood and fire, unexampled among civil wars, in which each party for four long years has conscientiously advocated by "life, fortune and honor," its own theory of the Constitution and republicanism, there should remain bitter memories, and that words of sorrow and indignation should be uttered, from the fulness of grief for noble spirits, and the cause, which together have gone down in the battle.

"Even from the tomb the voice of Nature cries."

And what true man can find in such utterances the evidence of "continued treason and secret secession." To our minds these outspoken words indicate peace, because they indicate truth and nature.

The South is looking to the North for evidences of returning reason full as earnestly as the North for the evidence of returning loyalty. And from no point do we hail these signs with greater satisfaction than from "200 Mulberry street." For we believe that no course could have been devised by the Adversary better calculated to fan and keep alive the fires of national discord than that of the Northern Bishops, in not only seizing by military force our pulpits, but by retaining them for long months after the war had closed; by setting up a claim to them as rightful property; and by only quitting them when compelled to do so by the President. Nor does this vexatious interference seem any less, because it is still kept up among the more ignorant of our people, the colored congregations of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

We quote from this article in part, and only regret that the narrowness of our space prevents the insertion of it entire:

If our North and South are ever to attain the blessing of peace and oneness, the harmony must begin, as many believe, where it was first broken, between the northern and southern churches; and especially between the northern and southern Methodism. At any rate they think it desirable that those two Methodisms should hear and understand each other.—And this can be done only through their proper organs, the press. As it is, however, the periodicals of each Church are read only within its own region. They revolve, like two different systems, each around its own centre, in circles adjacent but never cutting. Each Church thereby has its own set of ideas, its own hostilities and charges against the other, its own self-justifications and self-glorifications—but of all the correspondent ideas and notions within the other circle they are decidedly ignorant.

There are generous and noble Christians among us who judge the Methodist Church South by the acts of the southern military authorities, and of the governors and legislatures, instead of by their own organs of principle and sentiment; which is about as fair as to judge of New York City Methodism by our municipal government.—We hear others, who have never fairly listened to one clear, unquestionable utterance from the Methodists of the South, pronounce them incorrigibly disloyal, impenitent rebels, who only wait the means for another outbreak. Others hold them responsible for all the guilty reluctance of southern state governments to grant safety, security, the right of testimony, and the means of improvement, to the negro. Others assure us that they are fierce and defiant, one and all flouting at every proposition of conciliation. We do not say whether these statements are true or false; but we purpose, in a few brief pages, by extracts from its periodicals, to give Southern Methodism a chance of saying something for or against itself. Surely no fair man will say that this is anything more than fair play.

We will quote their utterances at present on three great points, namely, Loyalty and Peace, Negro treatment and Church conciliation.

In regard, first, to Loyalty and Peace. Immediately after the surrender of Lee, three of the Bishops, Andrew, Paine and Pierce, issued manifestoes advising loyalty, peace and good citizenship, "avoiding bitterness." The Bishops, in their pastoral address, said:

We cannot close our address without an urgent and explicit recommendation to you, to adjust yourselves as citizens of the United States promptly, cheerfully, and in good faith, to all your duties and responsibilities. Whatever may have been the opinions, positions or prejudices of any of you concerning the social and political changes that have occurred in the Government, we deem this course to be called for on your part, both by a sound judgment and an enlightened conscience.

Bishop Paine said:

Finally, having always disapproved of using the pulpit to discuss political questions, in which angry passions are sought to be aroused, he solemnly and deliberately advised his countrymen on the east side of the Mississippi river—and if his voice could be heard he would speak to those on the west side also—to resume in good faith their former positions as law-abiding and useful citizens. And in closing my remarks, I can with more propriety address my brethren in the ministry who are present and say to them to use their influence, both publicly and privately, for the promotion of peace and quietness among all classes, and especially among the ministers and members of the Methodist E. Church South.

Bishop Pierce said:

Accepting the issues of the war as the will of God, in reference to the unity of the nation and the Government, let us all lead a quiet and peaceful life, in all godliness and honesty. Do not leave your loyalty in doubt by unmanly repinings—by querulous complaint, or by refusing the terms of offered amnesty. Qualify yourselves for the duties of citizenship—for the speedy restoration of civil government. Let us seek to repair the desolations of the land by prompt and vigorous industry, and prevent the further demoralization of society by multiplied words of faith and love.

The "Episcopal Methodist," October 11, says:

LOYALTY OF SOUTHERN METHODISM.—There is a studied and persistent effort made by the northern religious journals to impress the public mind with the conviction that the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in the maintenance of its independent ecclesiastical organization, is disloyal to the Government. It is asserted that she is nursing treason, fostering secret secession and laying schemes by which to fasten the chain of slavery again upon the freedman. The Southern Methodist Church to-day is more thoroughly loyal to the Government, more to be trusted, than the Northern Methodist Church. We are tired of strife and excitement. We intend to seek peace and pursue it; and "as much as in us lies," we intend to live in peace with all men. We "pray for those in authority, that we may lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty." These avowals and pledges have been given to the Government, and we shall sacredly observe them; and in due time we shall prove our fidelity and trustworthiness.

Again, (October 25) the same paper says:

To the great discredit of the cause of God, a furious strife has been raging between the two sections of the American Church for several years, and, sad to recite, since the clash of arms has subsided. Where the world had a right to expect the overtures of peace, it has been forced to witness the last demonstrations of hostility. Ecclesiastical combatants brought up the rear with a charge of their heaviest artillery, and their batteries are yet muttering the hoarse thunder of defiance along lines long since abandoned by contending armies. Is this the Spirit of the Gospel? Are Christians the last to leave the field?

These utterances of the Southern Christian Advocate seem to us not unworthy of a Christian spirit, and two Churches animated by that spirit, need not quarrel over the negro they are both seeking to elevate.

Again, November 16, the same paper says:

Were it not that a powerful and unexpected temptation to the fostering of prejudices against our late slaves has partially beclouded the sober Christian judgment of many of our people, there would be no occasion to argue either the importance or the obligation of the Churches doing all in their power to maintain whatever of morality and religion may be found among the negroes, and to increase them a thousand fold. For a little while there was much irritation against the blacks, for their ungrateful behavior toward those who had always been their best friends—but this temper is giving way to one more rational and more Christian. The consequence is, that questions of Christian duty come before us and press upon us imperatively; for they are not to be dismissed by our passions, antipathies or prejudices.

The Church is to give the Gospel to the people; to those around her altars; to the poor.—The duty is no less ours now than it was before the slaves were emancipated. It is as much our duty to look after their spiritual interests as it is to send missionaries to the Indians or to China.

And what is our duty is our interest—in this case the interest of the entire community. It is the province of the Church to inculcate all morality, to counteract all vice and crime. The negro more than ever needs the teachings and restraints of Christianity. The control over his habits and manner of living once exercised by a kind and judicious master is no longer felt.—Nothing can so well take its place as religious principle.

The Richmond Christian Advocate of October 26, says:

If northern Christians do half as much for the negro as they declare they intend to do, we will rejoice; but we cannot rejoice in advance of facts. We shall not hinder them by word or act. They are committed, by ten thousand high-sounding expressions of zeal in this matter, to do great things.

But while we boast of no great wealth, and a very humble share of piety is all we claim; yet, when the genuineness of our regard for the colored race is brought fairly to the test, the logic of facts will vindicate us. Now is the time for us to show, by ecclesiastical action and personal labors, how ready we are to answer to the demands of the hour.

In regard to Church Conciliation, the Southern Christian Advocate of September 21, says:

To say in advance that we will entertain no propositions for fraternal relations, is both unwise and unchristian. We will, the whole southern Church will, entertain any proposition coming from the North for fraternal relations, when that proposition comes from a proper source, and with reasonable and Christian conditions and suggestions. No, sir, we will reject no one, nor any body of Christians, who come to us in the spirit of our Master, and with bread, Bible, equitable, generous Methodistic propositions.—We are willing to meet any body of Christians on the platform of the New Testament.

But no proposition has yet been offered—no official communication has yet been made to us as a Church, and perhaps none ever will be.—There are brethren at the North who respect us, who love us, who are willing and anxious to fraternize with us; aye, who are anxious to be one with us; meeting us on the common platform of Methodism, giving us the right hand of fellowship, and recognizing us as equals, extending to us and receiving from us all the rights, privileges and immunities of the Church of God—of two great branches of the same family. Such men we honor, such ministers we love. But alas! we fear they are in the minority.

Dr. Roeser, late editor of the Richmond Advocate, says in the Episcopal Methodist, Nov. 15:

The South is ready for reunion. The following is one of the resolutions adopted by the Southern Convention, held in Louisville in 1845:

"Resolved, That we cannot abandon or compromise the principles of action upon which we proceed to a separate organization in the South; nevertheless, cherishing a sincere desire to maintain Christian union and fraternal intercourse with the Church North, we shall always be ready kindly and respectfully to entertain, and duly and carefully to consider, any proposition or plan having for its object the union of the two great bodies in the North and South, whether such proposed union be jurisdictional or connectional.

If there be no hope of reunion, there is hope (though it be against hope) that fraternal relations may yet be formed between the two great Churches. And on this subject also the South is ready.

First: The South, in 1848, through its Delegate, Dr. L. Pierce, proposed to the North, "the establishment of fraternal relations and intercourse." The proposition was rejected on the ground of "serious questions and difficulties existing between the two bodies." Dr. Pierce replied:

"The Methodist Episcopal Church South can never renew the offer of fraternal relations between the two great bodies of Wesleyan Methodists in the United States. But the proposition can be renewed at any time, either now or hereafter, by the Methodist Episcopal Church North."

Similar and still stronger utterances occur in a letter to the Southern Christian Advocate (which we have mislaid) by the Rev. Dr. Sommers, late editor of their Quarterly Review. Indeed, we understand the unanimous and settled ground of the Church South to be this: "We, the Church South, made the last formal proposition for recognition or reunion, and that was formally rejected; we now stand permanently ready, not to make further official offers, but to hear and consider in a Christian spirit whatever propositions the Methodist Episcopal Church sees fit to make."

From these extracts, uncontradicted as we find them, we first infer, that the Methodist Episcopal Church South, whatever its past acimns, professes to renounce every thought inconsistent with future loyalty to our Government and peace with our States and people. We secondly infer, that toward the negro, whatever the irreligious and the politicians may do, Southern Methodists profess their purpose to be humane, Christian, parental. They mean (so they profess) to meet in the Spirit of Christ the Northern missionary who comes in that spirit. They mean, so far as their means permit, not to be outrivalled in deeds of Christian goodness to the lowly. We thirdly infer, that the Church South affirms that, historically, she made the last offer of fraternity to our Church, even under the expectation of a humiliating rejection; that she has ever since been the repelled party; and yet, that at this present time, if reunion does not come, it is not because she is not Christianly ready for its coming. So they profess; and these professions were not addressed to outside ears, but were intended for home consumption. Let our readers judge of their validity.

THE SAVIOUR AND THE "SINNER."

LUKE VII.

Jesus reclined at the table in the house of Simon, the Pharisee—not Simon the Leper. In the midst of the feast, a woman of the city—"which was a sinner"—came in and stood at the feet of the Saviour. She had heard his word of power, had cried unto God out of the depths of her conscious guilt, had found mercy, and now brought the first-fruits of her love and laid them at the feet of her Lord. To appear in that company, at that time, unbidden, seemed out of place, for any other purpose; but love makes its own occasion. It is a privileged question—whether it be in the assembly of the saints, or in the social circle of His friends—as when the angels hear of the repentance of a sinner, no matter how grand their employments, there is always time for an anthem. There was no intrusive display—no word, no interruption. She only stood by her Lord, satisfied to be near him.

There is a sense of unworthiness that comes over the soul even after its forgiveness, which, by reviewing, heightens its own expression and consciousness; which looks at itself, and at its Lord, with growing wonder; which sees the enormity of its past guilt, with an ever increasing gratitude for escape—unexpected escape. There, at her Lord's feet, this woman stood, in all the unutterable fulness of thanks to Him who had delivered her from so great a death: her love gushing from its fountain, the consciousness of sins forgiven. Wiping away the tears which fell upon His sacred feet, she imprinted on them a kiss of adoration—upon those feet which presently were nailed to the cross.

The instance of the ten lepers indicates, that of the many who were healed by the Saviour of physical infirmities and diseases, but few gave evidences of gratitude. This was not, could not be the case with those healed spiritually. But Simon, with all his respect for Christ, had not felt His forgiving grace. Though believing and reverencing the Scriptures, he could not have conceived of that personal love which subsists between the Saviour and the saved. The earnest approach of the woman touched his heart. But how often does our own self-righteousness throw suspicion upon the best actions of others. He knew that her character was more than questionable. He knew of the holiness and purity of his illustrious guest. Himself probably a man of good morals, he shrank from the very presence of a courtezan, and only wondered that Christ suffered her contaminating touch. Surely, though a prophet, he knew not the real character of this woman, or he would not suffer her presence a moment. In this miserable world men and women too hold their erring fellows to most rigid reckoning.—There is a talk of mercy, when men speak of themselves; but when of others, it is all of retributive justice—the doors of mercy they close. That a sinner should be saved by travelling back—retracing all the steps of life—undoing the wrong of it—paying the uttermost farthing. As if we could drive back the shadow on the dial, or gather up the water which has been spilt upon the sand. O, thou offended God, must we undo all that we have wickedly done, before we can enter heaven? Then is eternal life impossible to us. How can we call back the souls that we wronged—the life that we have wasted—the oaths that we have uttered?

How impossible is it to the natural man to conceive of the happiness that fills the heart and soul of one who, "without works," has been forgiven—of that flow of peace which immediately sets in, before character has been established, or health restored; which, preceding a life of godliness, reaps a rich harvest of joy; which derives from Christ righteousness and love—a draught sweeter than life itself.

There was but one solution of the problem presenting itself to Simon: "This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him, for she is a sinner." That Christ did not know the history of every life and the heart of every person that approached him—as he had once supposed. How little did he suppose that Heaven knew it all, and knowing, had accepted this poor sinner. Henceforth, not as an exceptional case, but as the law of its mercy.—Strange that this new revelation of love should first kindle upon the form of a Forsaken Woman, or a Prodigal Son! Thus is it that Heaven shows its wealth of love. The Saviour accepts the comment of Simon in all its force, and announces the great law of forgiving grace. "There was a certain creditor which had two debtors: the one owed five hundred pence and the other fifty. And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both." Doubtless there are differences in the sum of men's sins—sins as scarlet and sins as crimson. There are deepening shades of guilt. But what relief does this bring when life is forfeited? How does it alleviate the dread of a dying man to know that others are dying in greater dread? Their debts are comparative, but their poverty is absolute. In this the debtors were equal: they had nothing to pay.

Nor does the consciousness of the just demands of the law discharge the debt. Then, verily, righteousness would have been by the law. But, "by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified." A thought of the law and its death are justly the cause of the sinner's alarm; that is the debt—his life. O wretched man, who can deliver thee from this death!

It is only the debtor who honestly desires to discharge his obligations, but manifestly cannot, to whom the creditor affords a gracious release. It was not until an effort was made to pay—an honest admission of obligation to pay—an actual declaration and confession of inability was made to the creditor, that forgiveness full and free was granted.

When they thus stood confessing sinners, He forgave—"freely forgave them both." O blessed doctrine of Christ! O, Thou Anointed Saviour, we accept this wondrous mercy! Truly "thy garments smell of myrrh and aloes and cassia out of the ivory palaces." My sinful soul goes forth to thy welcome, to thy forgiving grace.

My conscience shall not fear to tell all my sins. All that I have written against myself, all that the Enemy has accused me of, I may confess, sum up—yes, "every idle word"—for "He forgave them both." The conditions which are adequate to forgive the one debtor will do for the other—"my grace is sufficient for thee." We are "justified freely, by His grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." It is all forgiveness, for they had "nothing"—not good resolves, nor weeping, nor prayers, even—for they are all, in point of merit, nothing. What can a poor sinner find in the wreck of his being—what is there of his own to bring, that is not involved in the common ruin?"

"I nothing have, I nothing am."

But is there no mistake in this—are not those gates of mercy thus too widely opened? "Simon, seest thou this woman?" There stands the case in point. Hear the word and see the drama of salvation. Here is the evidence of pardoning love—a Sinner standing by the Saviour's feet. There can be no greater distance than that lawful one between the Holy God and a sinner; a shudder runs through his soul at the thought of going into the outer courts of God. Yet this woman stands by the Son of God, knowing that she is known. She cannot be a sinner now, for she has confidence toward him. The attraction of God, the Son of God, felt by a human being, is the evident correction of an expulsion from Eden.

See, she stands and loves!—Here is no formal respect, O sinner; here is all the impassioned warmth of a child of God. You gave a hospitable reception; but "she hath not ceased to kiss my feet." Those finer offices of love and friendship to which the Saviour was not insensible, which were to be looked for elsewhere, she fulfils—"she hath anointed my feet with ointment." How in a moment has this love for the Saviour refined her whole being.—In a moment it has turned the tide of her soul—she brings the precious ointment, in all the luxurious extravagance which belongs to a dissipated habit, and pours it out, once the evidence of her sin, but now the feeble expression of her boundless love and gratitude to the precious Redeemer of her life.

She unbound her hair—that ornament of woman. Upon it she had spent many hours of pleasant care—interweaving the pride of her heart with its braids. Unaffected by excesses which had faded other charms, it retained its lustre and beauty. With these proud locks she now wiped the feet of her Saviour. The odor of his presence was now before those tresses—the rich fragrance of his love.

"Wherefore I say unto thee, her sins, which are many, are forgiven." Her love was in evidence that she was forgiven. No man ever loves Christ who is not forgiven of him. Love is the test. Not joy, but love. To love God, one must first be conscious of being loved of Him. That consciousness is life—that apprehension of His love is faith. Doubtless it was important to the woman, as well as to us, (for whom it was written) for the Saviour to clearly announce to her that the overflowing love which she felt for him was pardon—was faith. As oftentimes, those who have been long seeking pardon, find it; and wonder at the first if this be the pearl of great price.

O reader, Christ's system of salvation is intended to save very bad men—the worst of sinners.

And a very great sinner can become by the power of the Spirit and the grace of Christ a very holy, happy saint.

Without love there is no real life. There must be in thee, if thou wouldst see Heaven, a love for the Saviour, personal, ardent—a passion the purest and noblest of which the human soul is capable—one stronger than any other passion.—This is life eternal. "Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it."

SENATOR WILSON VS. THE PSALMIST.

Senator Wilson of Massachusetts utters the following high period, in his speech in the Senate on December 20th. Nebuchadnezzar was scarcely better satisfied than the Senator is with himself and those whom he represents:

I want every rebel and every rebel sympathizer, every repentant and unrepentant rebel in the country to understand, that the loyal men of this nation, who voted their treasure and offered up their blood—who gave their sons to the preservation of the menaced Union and the imperilled cause of liberty, have sworn it, they have written it on the lids of their Bibles, they have engraved it on their door-posts, that these enfranchised men shall be free indeed—not serfs—not slaves—and that no black laws nor unfriendly legislation shall linger on the statute book of any Commonwealth in America. They are sure to triumph, and all around may as well understand it at once. The men in this country who committed themselves to the cause of liberty, justice, humanity and Christian civilization, are baffled sometimes—but defeated never. They have put men up and put men down. They have grappled with ideas and, with organizations, and have come off victors. With the attributes of Almighty God, everything and holy on earth and in heaven in to action, they are sure to triumph in future as in the past. If anybody doubts this, let him look back over the twenty-five years of conflict in our and see on every rod of our march the litical graves of great and able men went down under the stern condemnation of a Christian and liberty-loving people.

The Psalmist takes a more moderate view of human power. Speaking as the mouth-piece of God, the 75th Psalm, he affirms:

"The earth and all the inhabitants of are dissolved: I bear up the pillars of it. Selah.

"I said unto the fools, deal not foolishly and to the wicked, lift not up the horn.

"Lift not up your horn on high: not with a stiff neck.

"For promotion cometh neither from east, nor the west, nor from the south.

"But God is the Judge: he down one, and setteth up another.

"For in the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture; and he poureth out of the same: the dregs thereof all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them."

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE FROM MISSISSIPPI.

BROOKHAVEN, MISS.

From this place we have received six subscribers, for which we are indebted to Rev. G. F. Thomas. He was appointed to the station, was subsequently elected President of Whitworth College, at Brookhaven. He writes—"We opened the first Monday in September. Our commencement was by no means discouraging. Our school increased constantly through the first term. We began the second term (the first February) with 70 students and are still increasing."

THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

Connected with the station is a Sabbath School, under the Superintendency of Dr. J. W. Martin. The teachers and scholars, in token of their high regard, presented the Doctor with a fine Bible." All this is most delightful news.

WOODVILLE, MISS.

The Rev. W. T. J. Sullivan is President of the Female College of this place. It proposes to give young ladies a thorough training and graduate them in the English, French and Latin course, and afford all facility for acquiring a knowledge of the ornamental branches of education.

When sending a child to school one should look at its surroundings—what kind of people live about it. Because children are formed as much by what is outside of a college as by the inside. The importance of estimating the influence on character of some wise, sterling old farmer it may be, who occasionally looks in and sees how the boys and girls are getting on; who is attached and loved for his Christian worth and weight of social influence; who shapes his own neighborhood, and through the school children, without knowing it, affecting a good many future neighborhoods.

We can heartily commend the surroundings of this College. The reader will please look at its advertisement.

LEXINGTON, MISS.

Rev. W. P. Barton, in a letter sending subscribers, kindly informs us that he will receive and forward any moneys which the Preacher and people in that region may wish to send to the Advocate—without the least risk of loss—by draft on his brother's house in this city.

UNCONSCIOUS INFLUENCE.—The nursery handling of the nursery is significant, and the petulance, the delusion, the gentleness, the tranquility indicated by it, are all reproduced in the child. His soul is a perfect receptive nature, and that, for a considerable period, without choice or selection. A little further on he begins voluntarily to copy everything he sees. Voice, manner, everything which the eye sees, the mimic instinct delights to act out. And thus we have a whole generation of future men receiving from us their beginnings, and the direction impulse of their life and immortality. They watch us every moment in the family, before the hearth, at the table; and when we are signing them no good or harm when we are conscious of exerting no influence over them, they are drawing from us impressions which moulds of habit, which, if there be no heavenly discipline can never remove; or, if right, no kind of associations utterly dissipate. Of all it may be doubted, I think, whether in all the active influences of our lives we do as much to shape the destiny of our fellow men, as we do in this single article of example, an unconscious influence over children.

THE SOUTH.

(From the Public Ledger, Memphis, Wednesday morning, Jan. 31st.)

That portion of the country known as "the South" embraces eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles, and is as large as Great Britain, France, Austria, Prussia and Spain, with a most productive soil and genial climate; with staple productions which none of these great countries can grow; with three thousand miles of coast line, indented with bays and crowded with islands, and its vast centre watered by the Mississippi, into whose bosom are poured thirty-six thousand miles of tributary streams.

The total agricultural productions of the United States for 1850 amounted to $1,164,000,000; of this sum the North produced, in round numbers, $6,400,000, and the South $5,600,000. The population of the North in 1860 was 18,527,220; the population of the South, 8,664,656. The North had a deficiency in 1850 of agricultural productions to the value of $6,105,594; the South a surplus of $124,855,712, or each person at the North consumed thirty-eight cents more than he produced; at the South each person produced twelve dollars and ninety cents more than he consumed.

These facts are referred to for the purpose of showing how idle it is to despond of the future of a region which possesses such enormous elements of natural wealth, and whose exports at the period above mentioned were three times as great as those of the whole United States ten years after the revolutionary war. The recuperative powers of such a region must be perfectly incalculable. With the introduction of capital and immigration from the North and from Europe, all traces of the late war will be obliterated in five years. Every year that succeeds will witness such a march of prosperity and population as even the Western States have never equaled. With the removal of slavery the energies and enterprise of the whole world will seek a field of action within our borders. If we will only give up the barren pursuits of politics, and turn in to hard work, the end of the present century will see the South the most prosperous and densely populated portion of the American Republic.

CONFEDERATE CELEBRITIES AT LEXINGTON, VIRGINIA.

A correspondent of the Metropolitan Record, writing from Lexington, Va., says:

This beautiful little town is assuming something of its old appearance, save that the ruins of the Virginia Military Institute still mark Hunter's vandalism. There is here quite an array of Confederate talent. In the dignified President of Washington College a stranger would at once recognize (even if not told) Robert E. Lee, the peerless chieftain. In one of the professors of the Institute may be seen Major Gen. Custis Lee, who, prior to the fall of the Confederacy, was proving himself indeed "a chip of the old block." In the "best student" of Judge Brockenbourgh's law class may be seen Lieut. Gen. Rosser, the famous cavalry leader, and beside him sits Gen. Colston and other officers of distinction. In the pulpit of the Episcopal Church may be seen General Pendleton, "chief of artillery, Army of Northern Virginia," and all through the town and neighborhood are the officers and men of the world-renowned "Stonewall Brigade," whose famous leader sleeps in our cemetery. And there may be seen daily on the street the jovial face of ex-Governor Letcher ("Honest John—the watchdog of the Treasury," he was called in the brighter days of the Republic), quietly smoking his pipe and talking with his neighbors, as if oblivious to the fact that he is now under the ban of "the best Government the world ever saw," for the crime ("so-called") of sharing the fortunes of his native State after having exhausted all the efforts of his great genius to preserve the Union of our fathers. We must I forget to mention Judge Brockenbourgh, the able jurist and polished gentleman who has lost his seat on the bench of the United States District for following the destiny of his loved South."

SOUTH CAROLINA.

(From the Charleston News, Jan. 27.)

We are pleased to be able to state, upon reliable authority, that the Assistant Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, for this State, has been authorized to make monthly estimates for the amount of rations required in his district, and to issue rations in special cases to the resident freedmen on plantations, through the owners thereof, with a lien on the growing crop for reimbursement.

And we are also informed that the War Department authorizes a liberal interpretation of the term "refugee," so as to allow it to include such destitute whites as actually require the assistance of the Government for their support.

It were scarcely necessary to say that we regard this order as calculated to be of very great benefit to the country. It were not possible to disguise the fact that we are liable, in consistence with present circumstances, to very great suffering in this State. Many of the freedmen must necessarily be destitute; many meritorious white people must also suffer; and the utmost enterprise of planters, in consistence with their present circumstances, will be insufficient to produce provisions for all the colored people who may need them. Many plantations are now charged with a large number of infants and infirm, whom the planters can not remove without they shall have able-bodied relatives elsewhere to receive them, and for whom the planters, reduced as they are, will find it impossible to make provision and incur the other expenses necessary to the operations of their places. Many even will not be able to provide for the efficient colored persons whom, if they were able to do so, they could employ profitably. This provision is admirably apt to the present condition of our affairs. It not only provides support for those colored persons who will necessarily suffer much without it; but it is the condition of a much more extended cultivation of the country, than, without such provision, would be possible. The extension of this charity, also, to the white people of the country who may be in condition actually to require it, is eminently humane and just. The number, we hope, is not large; but there are some who, without any fault, but from the accident of their recent and very painful experience, are without the means of subsistence; and this provision, whether actually required or not, will induce a feeling of security that must be very grateful.

GEN. JACKSON'S MOTHER.

The Rev. Dr. Hawks delivered a lecture before the Historical Society of New York some years ago, in which he related an interesting story, illustrative of female heroism. Among those who formed part of the settlement in the Revolutionary struggle, was a poor widow, who havin burledg her husband, was left in poverty, with the task [illegible] her hands of raising three sons. Of these the two eldest ere long fell in the cause of their country, and she struggled on with the youngest as she best could. After the fall of Charleston, and the disastrous defeat of Colonel Buford, of Virginia, by Tarleton, permission was given some four or five females to carry necessaries and provisions, and administer some relief to the prisoners confined on board the prison-ship and in the jails of Charleston. This widow was one of the volunteers upon this errand of mercy. She was admitted within the city, and, braving the horrors of pestilence, employed herself to the extent of her humble means in alleviating the deplorable sufferings of her countrymen. She knew what she had to encounter; but notwithstanding, went bravely on. Her missive of humanity having been fulfilled, she left Charleston on her return; but alas! her exposure to the pestilential atmosphere she had been obliged to breathe, had planted in her system the seeds of fatal disease; and ere she reached her home she sank under an attack of prison fever, a brave martyr to the cause of humanity and patriotism. The dying mother, who now rests in an unknown grave, thus left her only son the sole survivor of his family, to the world's charity, but little did she dream, as death closed her eyes the future of that orphan boy. That son became President of this free Republic, for that widow was the mother of Andrew Jackson.—New York News.

SONG OF THE FREEDMAN.

A freedman sat on a pile of bricks,
As the rain was pattering down;
His shoes were worn and his coat was torn,
And his hat was without a crown.
He viewed the clouds and he viewed himself,
And shook the wet from his head,
And a tear dimmed his eye as he saw go by
A boy with a lo-af of bread.

As he raised his voice in a doleful tone,
That sounded like a gong,
While the rain came down on his nappy crown,
And sang to himself this song:

De wind blows cold, but I's done wid toil,
And lait the cotton patch;
I guess ole massa tink he count
De chickens 'fore they hatch.
I totes no more de heavy load,
Nor drives old massa round;
I wondar who dey's gwine to get
To work de patch o' ground!
Den fling away de rake and hoe,
Dis am de jubilee!
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But bress de Lord I's free!

But I tink last night as I tried to sleep
Upon de muddy ground,
While de rain was drippin' on my head
And de wind was whizzin' round,
I'd like to hab my light'ood fire,
And my cabin back again;
For de weddar's getin' berry cold
Out here in all dis rain.
But den I's done wid de rake and hoe,
Dis am de jubilee!
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But bress de Lord I's free!

I'se got all ragged 'bout de knees;
My shoes is worn out too;
My coat so old dat from each sleeve
De elbow's comin' froo.
And dars a de children dat once played
In shirt tail 'bout de yard,
I cannot buy a shirt for dem,
De time's so berry hard.
But fling away de rake and hoe,
Dis am de jubilee!
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But bress de Lord I's free!

Do udder day when Pinky died,
I tink it berry good,
Dat do dear Lord should take her 'way
Before dis cold wind blowed;
But den 'twas hard to see her die—
I wished she'd not been born—
I's 'fraid she perished, for she asked
About de rice and corn.
But den I's done wid de rake and de hoe,
Dis am de jubilee:
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But bress de Lord I's free!

And Dinah sits here on the ground
And looks so thin and poor;
She cannot sing de songs she sung
About the de cabin door.
Her poor old limbs are almost bare,
Her cheek bones commin' froo;
I almost wish de Lord would come
And take her up there too.
But den she's done wid de rake and hoe,
Dis am de jubilee:
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But bress de Lord she's free:

I dreamt las' night de massa come
And took us home wid he,
To live in cabin dat we let
When first dey set us free;
And dere I built de light'ood fire,
And Dinah cooked the yam.
Dey say dat dreams are sometimes true,
I wonder if this one am.
But den I's flung away de hoe,
To hab a jubilee;
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But bress de Lord I's free.

AN OLD LETTER OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

A friend in the vicinity of this city, Hon. Mrs. W. J. Brown, has furnished us with the following letter from Mr. Davis, to her late husband, which has never been published. As will be seen, it was a private letter, but time and circumstances now require its publication, as a part of the materials of the history of its author:

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
May 7, 1853.

My Dear Sir—I received the Sentinel containing your defence of me against the false accusations of disunionism, and before I had returned to you the thanks to which you are entitled, I received, this day, the St. Joseph Valley Register, marked by you, to call my attention to an article in answer to your defence; just in all things save its too complimentary terms.

I wish I had the letter quoted from, that you might publish the whole of that which is garbled to answer a purpose. In a part of the letter not published, I put such a damper on the attempt to fix on me the desire to break up our Union, and presented other points in a form so little acceptable to the unfriendly inquirers, that the publication of the letter had to be drawn out of them.

At the risk of being wearisome, but encouraged by your marked friendship, I will give you a statement of the case. The meeting of October, 1849, was a convention of delegates equally representing the Whig and Democratic parties of Mississippi. The resolutions were decisive as to the equality of right of the South with the North to the territories acquired from Mexico, and proposed a convention of the Southern States. I was not a member, but, on invitation, addressed the convention. The succeeding Legislature instructed me, as a Senator, to assert this equality, and, under the existing circumstances, to resist, by all constitutional means, the admission of California as a State. At a called session of the Legislature in 1850, a self-constituted committee called on me, by letter, for my views. They were men who had enacted or approved the resolutions of the convention of 1849, and instructed me, as members of the Legislature in the regular session, in the early part of the year 1850. To them I replied that I adhered to the policy they had indicated, and instructed me, in their official capacity, to pursue.

I pointed out the mode in which their own policy could, in my opinion, be excuted without bloodshed, or disastrous convulsion, but in terms of bitter scorn, alluded to such as would insult me with a desire to destroy the Union, for which my whole life proved me to be a devotee.

Pardon the egotism, in consideration of the occasion, when I say to you that my father and my uncles fought through the revolution of 1776, giving their youth, their blood and their little patrimony, to the constitutional freedom which I claim as my inheritance. Three of my brothers fought in the war of 1812; two of them were comrades of the Hero of the Hermitage, and received his commendation for gallantry at New Orleans. At sixteen years of age I was given to the service of my country; for twelve years of my life I have borne its arms, and served it zealously, if not well. As I feel the infirmities which suffering more than age has brought upon me, it would be a bitter reflection, indeed, if I was forced to conclude that my countrymen would hold all this light, when weighed against the empty panegyric which a time serving politician can bestow upon the Union, for which he never made a sacrifice.

In the Senate I announced that if any respectable man would call me a disunionist, I would answer him in monosyllables. On many occasions, in public speeches made in Mississippi, I have said, if any man would come forward and charge me with a desire to destroy the Union, I would cram the lie down his throat. But I have often asserted the right, for which the battles of the Revolution were fought—the right of a people to change their government whenever it was found to be oppressive, and subversive of the objects for which governments are instituted—and have contended for the independence and sovereignty of the States, a part of the creed of which Jefferson was the apostle, Madison the expounder, and Jackson the consistent defender.

I have written freely, and more than I designed. Accept my thanks for your friendly advocacy. Present me in terms of kind remembrance to your family, and believe me very sincerely yours,

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

NOTE.—No party in Mississippi ever advocated disunion. They differed as to the mode of securing their rights in the Union, and on the power of a State to secede—neither advocating the exercise of the power. J. D.

IS THE CATTLE PLAGUE THE SMALL-POX?

(From the London News, Jan. 5

A question of the deepest interest to the Nation in regard to the nature of the cattle plague is at the present moment under careful consideration. During the epizootic disease which ravaged this country in the middle of the last century, the occurrence of pustules and scabs in the affected animals was noted by several observers. The idea then arose, from these and the general symptoms of the ailment, that the disease might probably be identical with the small-pox. In 1837, Dr. Layard, a Fellow of the Royal Society, published a paper which commenced with these words: "The several stages, the progress and effects of this distemper are exactly the same with those of small-pox." He went on to describe that, in the course of the malady, eruptions showed themselves all along the limbs and about the udders, while at the crisis there were "boils which, breaking, discharged putrid, stinking matter." During the present outbreak the same phenomena have been observed. No very great attention, however, seems to have been paid to this symptom until quite recently. Within the last few days, the subject has been brought prominently forward in a paper published in the Lancet, by Dr. Murchison, of the London Fever Hospital. It seems, besides, that Mr. Ceely, of Aylesbury, one of our highest authorities on the subject of vaccination, and one of the Cattle Plague Commissioners, has for some time past entertained a strong opinion of the close resemblance, if not complete identity, of rinderpest with small-pox.

The public will await, with attentive interest, the results of the experiments now making with a view to determine this important question. If they should confirm the opinion that the cattle plague is virulent small-pox, it may be said that all apprehensions for the future will be at an end. By simply vaccinating every healthy cow, we can count upon procuring as great an immunity for our cattle as is enjoyed by the human race. It is as interesting as it would have formerly appeared paradoxical that our earnest hopes are now centered upon proving that the cattle plague is no other than that disease which, in times gone by, was one of the most formidable enemies of the human race.

EXPLOSION OF THE STEAMER MISSOURI ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

A TERRIBLE AFFAIR.

We condense this statement from the New Albany Ledger of the evening of the 31st, relating to the explosion of the steamer Missouri.

The officers of the Missouri state that she was not racing with the Dictator, and the second engineer says that when he went off watch, some two hours before, that the boilers were in excellent condition, and Mr. Jas. Cox, who was the striker, and had just tried the water in two of the boilers found it flush over the second cocks.

APPALLING INCIDENTS.—Mr. James Cox, the striker, was blown back under the cylinder timbers and dreadfully scalded. He states that, feeling no pain, and, expecting the upper works of the boat would fall in and crush him, he went overboard and swam around to the splash door, upon which he climbed, and thence passed up to the hurricane roof. How he endured so much in his dreadfully burnt condition is wonderful. He is now at his mother's residence on Lower Second street, and strong hopes are entertained for his recovery.

A gentleman informs us that Mr. Phillips and one of the watchmen or deck sweepers of the boat was walking the deck, to and fro, immediately aft of the boilers, engaged in conversation, when the explosion took place. He thinks Mr. Phillips was cut in two; but, on account of the excitement and bewilderment he felt, he could not certainly remember. He says he saw a part of the boiler strike Mr. P. and the man by his side. Mr. Phillips's body was not recovered.

Captain Jesse Y. Hurd, his wife and little son, nine years old, were asleep in the captain's room, in the texas. Capt. Hurd and his son were carried by the force of the explosion through the texas and fell upon its top; Mrs. Hurd was carried overboard, and was not seen afterwards. The calamity is a terrible one to Captain Hurd, whose agony is indescribable. We sincerely sympathize with him. Both Captain H. and his little son were severely injured. Mrs. Hurd was a most estimable lady, and was beloved by all who knew her.

Henry Hurd, son of Capt. Hurd, and one of the pilots, had his leg broken and was otherwise seriously hurt.

Arthur Hurd, another son of the captain, and one of the clerks of the Missouri, had one of his arms broken, and was badly bruised about the body.

Andy Fleming, one of the pilots, was blown from the pilot-house to the stern of the boat, sustaining severe injuries, among others the breaking of one or two ribs.

James Watkin, the mate, at the moment of the explosion, was standing on the steps of the pilot-house, talking with Pilot Fleming in regard to a landing the boat had to make. He was blown overboard and severely bruised, but was saved.

John Guthrie, a greaser, from Portland, Ky., was instantly killed. He was at one of the engines at the time of the explosion.

James Rogers, carpenter of the boat, a resident of Pittsburg, was mangled in a terrible manner, and instantly killed.

William Matson, a striker, believed to be from Louisville or Cincinnati, was instantly killed.

An old gentleman from Ouachita, who got upon the boat at Helena, was among those lost. He has a daughter going to school at Shelbyville, Ky., and was on his way to pay her a visit.

A man who resided at Vevay, Indiana, who took passage on the boat at New Orleans, was lost. Our informant did not learn his name.

Four men got on the boat at Uniontown, and four more at Mount Vernon, Ind. All were lost but three. We did not learn their names.

Eight men took passage at Evansville, and all were lost. We have not their names. It is supposed that one of the passengers who got aboard at Mount Vernon resided at Leavenworth, Ind.

Mr. Lawrence Shroeder, of this city, was the second engineer. He was asleep in his room in the texas at the time of the explosion. The falling of the texas, and its jam between the timbers of the cabin, completely imprisoned Mr. Shroeder in his berth. The roof of the texas was pressed down to within half an inch of the face of Mr. S., and his left foot, which was badly scalded by the bursting of the escape-pipe, was fastened in between the timbers. Thus imprisoned, Mr. Shroeder felt the water as the sinking vessel rapidly settled, gradually crawling up his body, until he was submerged to the chin, and the water not half an inch from his mouth and nose. He says that in this condition he lived his whole life over in a few moments of time. He was still able to make a noise, and his cries attracted the attention of the mate of the Dictator, who, with some other men, cut away the roof and timbers and rescued him from his terrible suspense and imminent danger.

Capt. Wash. Stewart, of New Albany, displayed the most consummate bravery and coolness. He deliberately packed up his baggage, and carried it with him to the hurricane roof. Here he found all the survivors assembled, and in the most terrible state of excitement. Just at that moment, too, the stove in the cabin, full of fire, fell over upon the floor, setting the cabin on fire. With the buckets on the hurricane roof, Capt. Stewart descended into the cabin and extinguished the fire.

Again ascending to the roof, just as he reached it the texas careened, increasing the alarm among the passengers. They immediately made a rush for the aft end of the boat, Capt. Stewart meanwhile exhorting them to be cool. Finally, by "swearing" pretty loudly and sharply at them, he stopped the stampede just in time to save some twenty more of the passengers and crew from jumping overboard. His conduct throughout the trying ordeal is described as noble and heroic. He escaped without a scratch, but lost his baggage.

CAUSE OF THE EXPLOSION.—The Missouri was a magnificent boat, valued at $150,000. No boat on the Western rivers ever had more competent, more careful, or better officers. No one who knows them will believe that the disaster was caused through any carelessness on their part. There seems to be but one conclusion arrived at among well-posted engineers and steamboat officers in forming a theory for the explosion—and all agree that it was the result of the general insecurity of tubular boilers. The use of these boilers upon steamboats should be forbidden by law, and travellers and shippers should make it a point never to take passage or ship upon a boat that uses them. They are acknowledged by all to be highly dangerous; and there is but little advantage derived by steamboatmen from their use. Indeed, they seem to be Death's own invention, to suddenly rush people by hundreds into eternity, and to bring mourning to hundreds of households. If people will refuse to patronize boats that use them, they will soon be discarded.

LOSS OF SIXTY PERSONS.—Capt. Stewart informs us that the total number lost, as near as can be ascertained, is sixty, of whom about twenty were passengers, the balance belonging to the crew of the boat.

The Missouri's deck crew numbered about seventy men. A large number of those were lying asleep under the boilers at the time of the explosion. Of those under the boilers not one escaped. But the heart sickens at the recital of these dreadful, soul-harrowing scenes, and we must cease to give further details of the horrible catastrophe.

WOUNDED.—The following are the names of the wounded officers and crew:

Capt. J. Y. Hurd, badly; Henry Hurd, pilot, left leg broke; A. Hurd, second clerk, right arm broke; Louis Hurd, badly; Henry Fleming two ribs broken and badly; Jas. Cox, blacksmith and second engineer, badly scalded; Lance Schroeder, second engineer, from New Albany, not injured; James Watkins, first pilot, badly; Benjamin F. Burch, second pilot, badly; William Campbell, second bar-keeper, slightly; C. M. Wylick, watchman, badly; J. D. Mullin, first clerk, broken back-bone and leg.

LOST.—The following are the names of the lost as far as at present known:

Mrs. Capt. Hurd and child; J. W. Phillips, engineer, on watch; John Guthrie, second engineer; W. Watson, second engineer; Jesse M. Rogers; Frank Goldwaithe, day watchman; Wm. Brooks (colored); Saml. Evans (colored); M. R. Peters, Owensboro; four ladies, names not known.

FEARFUL SCENES IN A GERMAN VILLAGE.

EFFECTS OF EATING UNCOOKED SWINE'S FLESH.

Dr. Pouchet, who has charge of the scientific department of the Avenir National, a Paris journal, gives a frightful account of the new plague which is committing such havoc in Gorammy. The particulars given by M. Pouchet are taken from a private letter from Dr. Karl Stein, of Frankfort, dated the 9th ult., as follows:

"Ederslehen is a little town, in the environs of Magdeburg—one of those little German towns that seem the abode of peace and rustic felicity, where no noise is heard save the merry clink of the glasses at the bier-brauorel, and the jolly tones of the drinkers calling for another glass all around. Well, this little town, so smiling and happy, is now filled with mourning and desolation. For a whole month past death has reigned there. A fearful death after unexampled sufferings, and those that are acquainted with the nature of their disease, know that they are being eaten up alive by a legion of worms, hardly so thick as a human hair, that have worked their way into the tissue of their flesh, their muscles and their nerves. Is not such a fate horrible to dwell upon? On the 9th of last month Dr. Karl Stein, of Frankfort, wrote to one of our friends that upwards of one hundred children—for they appear to enjoy an immunity—had been deprived of their parents. There was hardly a house in the village that did not number a victim. At that date upwards of three hundred patients were awaiting death, which they knew to be inevitable—a prey to fearful sufferings. From seventy to eighty of the inhabitants, who at the outset of the epidemic had felt unwell, had taken to flight, to escape from what they considered to be the cholera; but they had fallen down on the roads, and died without relief; their corpses alone were picked up.

The epidemic, Dr. Pouchet proceeds to say, was caused by the ravages of the worm called trichine, whence the epidemic has received the name of trichinosis. The trichine is one of the entozoa of the pig, and it is capable of being transplanted into and thriving in the human body. In Germany, pork flesh, imperfectly cured and smoked, in the shape of ham and German sausage, is a staple article of food, and from the human stomach, where they penetrate with the ham and saucisson, dear to Germanic palates, the larvæ of these entozoa pass into the blood, their size being so microscopic as to enable them to penetrate even into the minutest veins; they lodge in the nerves, in the muscular and cellular tissues, and feed upon those parts of the human organization, causing fearful agony and great constitutional disturbance, which ends in death. No cure has been as yet discovered, but the preventive process is obvious. To abstain from such preparations of pork as are eaten in a semi-crude state, is a sure means of avoiding trichinosis; but to eat half-smoked saucisson and raw ham, cut in thin slices, is as general a custom in Germany as smoking or beer-drinking. Hence the rapid propagation of the disease, as a simple slice of ham or German sausage may contain larvæ of millions of these parasites.

In Germany the morbid pathology of the ravages caused by this formidable destroyer has been carefully investigated within the last few years. Dr. Wirchow, of Berlin, (known as the opponent of Herr Von Bismarck, but whose scientific reputation far exceeds his political fame,) has made conclusive experiments on the subject, from which it appears that in addition to man and the pig, rabbits and mice are liable to be trichinised; but that the dog, sheep, ox and pigeon are not.

A very short time ago, the Berlin Pork Butchers' Association summoned a meeting of the faculty and the professors of the University to decide on the proper measures to adopt in order to prevent the spread of "trichinosis." The meeting was marked by a curious incident, which has been misreported by some of your cotemporaries. What really took place was this: Professor Wirchow had just spoken and set forth the best means to prevent the spread of trichines, when a veterinary surgeon, Dr. Urban, who was present, loudly professed his disbelief in all that the professor had stated, and by way of clenching his argument, he offered to eat any amount of so-called "trichinised" pork flesh. A rather noisy discussion followed, but Professor Wirchow put an end to it very soon: He pulled a saucisson out of his pocket—he told the meeting he had examined it through the microscope—it was full of trichines; and then cutting a slice of it tendered it to the unbelieving veterinary. Dr. Urban was rather taken aback; he declined to make the experiment, but the jeers of the meeting having touched him, he took a little nibble of the proffered slice, and hurriedly left the room. He proceeded to a neighboring chemist, and administered to himself so violent an emetic that (says Voss's Zeitung) the learned doctor's friends need labor under no apprehension as to his safety.

LETTER FROM MR. STEPHENS.

MILLEDGEVILLE, GA., Jan. 22, 1866.

Messrs. J. F. Johnson, Charles H. Smith and others.

Gentlemen—Your note of invitation to me to address the General Assembly on the state of the country, and assuring me that it is the almost universal desire of the members that I should do so, if consistent with my feelings, &c., was received two days ago. I have considered it maturely; and be assured if I saw any good that could be accomplished by my complying with your request, I would cheerfully yield my personal reluctance to so general a wish of the members of the General Assembly, thus manifested. But as it is; seeing no prospect of effecting any good by such an address, you and your association will, I trust, excuse me in declining. My reasons need not be stated; they will readily suggest themselves to your own minds upon reflection. In reference to the subject of the election of United States Senators, which is now before you, allow me to avail myself of this occasion to say to you, and through you, to all the members of the General Assembly, that I cannot give my consent to the use of my name in that connection. This inhibition of such use of it is explicit and emphatic. I wish it so understood by all. As willingly as I would yield my own contrary inclinations to what I am assured is the general and unanimous wish of the Legislature in this respect, if I saw any prospect of my being able, by thus yielding, to render any essential service to the people of Georgia; and, as earnestly desirous as I am for a speedy restoration of civil law, perfect peace, harmony and prosperity throughout the whole country, yet, under existing circumstances, I do not see such prospect of the availability of my services to these ends in any public position. Moreover, so far as I am personally concerned, I do not think it proper or politic that the election should be postponed with any view to a probable change of present circumstances or a probable change of my position on the subject; and I do trust that no member will give even a complimentary vote to me in the election.

Yours truly,
ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.

GEOMETRICAL PROGRESSION.—A London paper lately, innocently published an advertisement of a situation wanted by "A Superior Governess," who modestly stated that her terms would be "at the rate of a farthing the first month, one penny the second, and so on for the year;" but was obliged in its next issue to caution its readers against answering such an extraordinary proposal, since the lady's stipend would amount to £5825 8s. 5½d. (or $30,000) for the first year.

AN ELOQUENT APPEAL FOR CHARITY.

THE LABOR OF THE CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS.

Gen. Henry A. Wise in Behalf of the Female Orphans of Richmond.

EXTRACT FROM AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BY GEN. HENRY A. WISE, AT THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH IN RICHMOND, JANUARY 23, 1866.

The noblest minds of men who ever fought or who ever fell in the annals of war, whose glorious deeds history ever took pen to record, were, I exultingly claim, the private soldiers in the great Confederate cause. Whether right or wrong in the cause which they espoused, they were earnest and honest patriots in their convictions, who thought that they were right to defend their own, their native land, its soil, its altars, and its honor. They felt that they were no rebels and no traitors in obeying their native State sovereignties, and they thought that it was lawful to take up arms under their mandates, authorized expressly by the Federal Constitution, to repel invasion or to suppress insurrection, when there was such "imminent danger as not to admit of delay." The only reason for the delay which could have been demanded of them, was to have appealed to the invaders themselves for defence against their own invasion; and whether there was imminent danger or not, events have proved. They have been invaded until every blade of grass has been trodden down; until every sanctuary of temple, and fane, and altar, and home, has been profaned. The most of these men had no stately mansions for their homes; no slaves to plant and plow any broad fields of theirs; no stocks or investments in interest-bearing funds. They were poor, but proudly patriotic and indomitably brave. Their country was their only heritage. The mothers and wives and daughters buckled on the belts, and sent husbands and sons and brothers forth, and women toiled for the bread and spun the raiment of little ones of "slanty" homes in the country, or of shops in town, while their champions of defence were in their country's camps, or marches, or trenches, or battles! They faithfully followed leaders whom they trusted and honored. Nor Cabinets, nor Congress, nor Commissariat, nor Quartermaster's Department, nor speculators, nor spies, nor renegades, nor enemy's emissaries, nor poverty, nor privation, nor heat, nor cold, nor sufferings, nor toil, nor danger, nor wounds, nor death, could impair their constancy! They fought with a devout confidence and courage which was unconquerable save by starvation, blockade, overwhelming numbers, foreign dupes and mercenaries, Yankeedom, Negrodom and death. Prodigies of valor, miracles of victories undoubted and undoubting devotion and endurance to the last entitled them to honors of surrender, which gilded the arms of their victors and extorted from them even cheers on the battle-field where at last they yielded for peace. Alas! how many thousands had fallen before their few surviving comrades laid down their arms. Of these men of the ranks, their beloved leader, Gen. R. E. Lee, said to me, during the last winter on the lines: "Sir, the men of this war who will deserve the most honor and gratitude, are not the men of rank, but the men of ranks—the privates." I cordially concurred in the justice and truth of the compliment, for I had seen them tried on the rocks of Coal river, of Gauley and the Pocotallico. I had tested their endurance in the marches and countermarches, and scouting and skirmishing, of the Kanawha Valley; I had seen them in a first fight and victory against all odds at Scary, and their last stand against greater odds on the Sewall Mountains; I had seen their constancy and courage proved at Hawk's Nest, at Honey Creek, at Big Creek, at Carnifax Ferry, and at Camp Defiance in North-west Virginia. I had seen them leap with alacrity to the defence of Roanoke Island, knowing that when they went that they could not return but as captives or corpses. I have seen them in the "slaughter pen" there slay twice their own numbers before they stacked the arms for which they had no ammunition. I have seen them employ their leisure and amuse their ennui at Chaffin's Farm by mechanic arts for the army of a blockaded country. I have seen their efficiency on the peninsula of the James and York, and of the Chickahominy and Pamunkey. I have seen their successful strategy at Williamsburg and Whitaker's Mill, and their steadiness in the din of metal at Malvern Hill. I have seen their temper and spirit tried in the lagoons and gulls of the Edisto and Stono, and their pluck on John's Island, in South Carolina. I have heard the shouts of the Virginia men when ordered back from South Carolina and Florida to rally again around the altars of home, and heard them raise the slogan of "Old Virginia Never Tire," when they pressed forward to open the defile at Nottoway Bridge, and rushed to Petersburg in time twice to save the Cockade City against odds of more than ten to one. I have seen them drive through the barricade and cut at Walthall Junction and storm the lines at Howlett's, not for five days only, but for twice five days' successive fighting. I have seen them on the picket lines and in the trenches, throughout all seasons of the year, in heat and cold, day and night, in storm and sunshine, often without food fit to feed brutes, with not enough of that, without half enough of fuel or clothing or blankets, under the almost incessant fire of shot and shell, without forage for transportation and without transportation for forage, scarce of ordnance stores, not supplied with medicines for the hospitals, all the time rolling a Sysyphian stone of parapet, and traverse and breastwork and bomb-proof, for the want of material for revetment, and for the want of tools to dig out and work up the indispensable lines of defences. I have seen their manhood worn by every variety of disease and wounds in the hospital wards. Starved, half naked, rest broken, I have seen them summoned to stand to or to storm the breach and do it, filling ditches and a crater full of the assailants' dead. I have seen their brigades blasted by the shock of mines, and rise from the debris and rubbish to repel and conquer the storming enemy. I have seen them bivouacked on the right of Hatcher's Run, and, on the ever-memorable days of the 29th and 31st of March last, advance, first one, then two, then less than three brigades, on the military and Boydton plank roads, against two corps, and fight them for hours, so stagger them that they dared not follow the retreat. I have seen them on the quick night-march to Church Crossings, and thence hurried to the Namozine, to Flat Creek, to Big Creek, to Sailor's Creek, to the High Bridge, and to Farmville, marching and charging, and charging and marching, and starving, but not sleeping or stopping on the way but to work or to fight. And I have seen them fire their last volleys at Appotomax, and often times in marches on picket, in the trenches, in camps and in charges I have seen them sad and almost sink; but I never saw their tears until their beloved commander-in-chief ordered them to surrender their arms. Then they wept, and many of them broke their trusty weapons! The blessed and ever glorious dead were not there to surrender, and they are not here to defend their memories from the taint of the reproach of rebellion and treason. Alas! I am alive and here, and am bound, at every hazard, to declare that those men were no rebels and no traitors. Let whoever will swear that they were rebels and traitors, I will contradict the oath, and appeal to God on the Holy of Holies as high as Heaven's throne, and swear that they were pure patriots, loyal citizens, well tried and true soldiers, brave, honest, devoted men, who proved their faith in their principles by the deaths which canonized them immortal heroes and martyrs! No one shall inscribe the epitaphs of rebellion and treason upon the tombs of their dead without my burning protest being uttered against the foul and false profanation. And if any wounds of the living are labeled with rebellion and treason, I would tear away the infamy though the wounds should bleed unto death. If I suffer their names to be dishonored and their glory to be tarnished, and don't gainsay the reproach, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; and if I suffer their orphans to be outcasts for the want of sympathy, warmly outspoken and more warmly felt, may my right hand forget its cunning. Alas! in these times it has no cunning, for it has no coins! I too am a beggar. I can beg, then, and do beg like a Belisarius, for them. Please give them one obolus! Have you a crumb to spare? Divide it with them! Have you comfort, give them. I implore you give them some of your abundance! Their enemies who slew their fathers, honor them enough to feed their poor orphans! They won't hurt you for daring to do deeds of charity. Many of them are brave men, and the brave are always generous to the brave. The orphan, the orphan of the poor, the friendless orphan, the orphan fallen on evil times, the Confederate soldier's orphan girl-child cry to you! Will you not heed their cries and in some way help the helpless ones? If you will not, then may we apostrophize the manes of their martyred sires, in the language of the lays of the Scottish cavaliers:

Last of Freemen—
Last of all that dauntless race
Who would rather die, unsullied
Than sullive the land's disgrace—
Oh, thou lion hearted warrior!
Heck not of the after time:
Your name can be deemed dishonor,
Loyally he called a crime.
Sleep in peace with kindred ashes
Of the noble and the true,
Hands that never failed their country,
Hearts that never treason knew!

DISTRESS IN INDIANAPOLIS.—An examination of the Assessor's books will reveal an amount of poverty much greater than is usually believed to exist. Many men reputed to be in easy circumstances will be found to be on the verge of bankruptcy, having no property to speak of, while others, who manage to dress well and keep up a respectable appearance, will be found in imminent danger of actual starvation. A prominent citizen returned $25 as the sum total valuation of his property, but after an hour's haggling was persuaded to swell his estimate to $28. A saloon keeper in the eastern part of the city estimated his stock, fixtures and household furniture, at $16.—Indianapolis Herald, Jan. 25.

The Fenian leaders are said to have a list of thirty British spies who constantly watch their movements.

NEW YORK, Feb. 6.—The Fenian excitement in Canada has somewhat abated, since it appears Gen. Sweeney is not in Canada. Precautions have not been neglected. The public and military are on the alert. The alarm is still wide-spread along the St. Lawrence.

The Government has sent agents South who have forced cotton running, and called upon all engaged in this business to state under oath their associates and the amount of their business and profits. Most of the witnesses have fully testified. But one or two were sent to prison on account of their unwillingness to testify.

The Hon. G. A. Trenholm, ex-Confederate Secretary of the Treasury, was one of the largest stockholders in this enterprise. His testimony showed much frankness. It developed the fact that just before the evacuation of Richmond, the total amount of specie in Confederate vaults was $350,000 to $400,000, $300,000 of which were in the treasury at Richmond. The last named was carried off and distributed partly among Johnson's soldiers, and partly among the military escort of Mr. Davis. Mr. Trenholm stated that in his opinion Mr. Davis and other Confederate officers refused to receive any part of it.

LONDON, Jan. 22.—The Paris correspondent of the London News says it has transpired in court circles that Napoleon is greatly displeased with Maximilian, on many grounds, especially because of the had reception given the French Counsellor of State sent to Mexico to take the finance in hands, and it is surmised this is one reason for the with drawal of the French troops.

The Herald's Washington special says the fact is published that in response to one of Gen. Grant's cards of invitation to his recent reception, Gen. Butler addressed a very curt note stating he neither would hold personal intercourse with Lieut. Gen. Grant nor any of his family, and must decline the present or any future proffer in that direction. Gen. Grant good-naturedly destroyed the note as soon as received, determined, if it ever appeared in print, to know that Butler furnished it for publication.

The London Times' correspondent says Napoleon never does anything without good and substantial reason; but why, in the present instance, he sends Loullard as envoy to Mexico, with only verbal instructions, he himself only knows.

The London Times publishes an extract from a letter of Gen. Sherman to a friend in London, dated January 2d, saying: "You need not be under any apprehensions as to cotton, for I saw enough on a recent trip to satisfy me that nearly all the cotton land is clear and ready for the plough, and will be growing cotton this year."

COTTON CIRCULAR.

LIVERPOOL, January 11, 1866.

The state of the money market has exercised a prejudicial effect on cotton throughout the week, limiting business, which has been on a reduced scale, with prices generally in favor of buyers; to-day, however, there has been an increased disposition to purchase, and with larger sales, prices in many instances are steadier, but still show more or less decline from last week's rates.

The business in Sea Island has been limited, but without material change in prices.

American is in general and increased demand, but very freely offered. On Tuesday and Wednesday an irregular decline was submitted to of 1d. to 1½d. per lb.; this attracted the attention of buyers, and some recovery has taken place, but prices close ½d. to 1d. below last week.

The transactions to arrive have been moderate during the week; the latest quotations are to-day, for American bales, from New York, low middling, January or February shipment, 19½d. per lb.; middling, ship named, 20d—Pernam, ship named, on the basis of firsts, 20½d—Egyptian, fair new open, shipment January, or February and March, 23½d—Western Madras, fair, November sailing and ship named 16½d.; January sailing 16d. per pound.

The sales of the week amount to 50,200 bales, including 5740 on speculation, and 11,760 declared for export, leaving 32,700 bales to the trade.

FRIDAY MORNING, Jan. 12.—The sales today will probably amount to about 10,000 bales, at steady prices.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS.

The public papers, as well as private communications, bring the welcome intelligence that in Louisiana, at least, the reorganization of labor is progressing steadily, and, as we anticipated, the freedmen, when left to their own good instincts, are returning quietly to the familiar haunts of their youth.

However much interested demagogues may have tried to slander this paper and the Southern men in general, and darkly hint at their sinister intentions against their former slaves, the black man has no better friend than his former master; and although when goaded by fanatical agitators, his old nature may be awakened to deeds of violence, the black man is generally kind, submissive and affectionate.

In the first exultation of newly found liberty, he has, like a child released from school, given himself up to excesses, and this first ebullition passed, he seeks to settle down, and like the hunted deer, he makes for his cover.

As to his steadiness of work, it cannot be expected so long as he will know that the whites themselves are unsettled, but on the whole, there are many evidences of a returning sense of reason in a vast majority of them.

Neither can it be said that in our midst, in Mobile, they have shown any disposition to be arrogant or insulting, barring, of course, a few exceptions, which we venture to say are not much more numerous than in the days of slavery, but are only more extensively noticed and more keenly felt.

The reports from the interior of our own State are contradictory, but this alone shows that they should be considered rather favorable.

North Alabama seems to be earnestly at work, and if no more plantations are cultivated, it is only because the owners have not any capital to rebuild their farms and refence their fields.

Let, as we have often advised, the policy of gentle persuasion be tried, and it will finally be successful.

The poor race to which Providence had assigned a certain part of Noah's Inheritance, and which has forcibly been transplanted amongst us, could only live under the paternal, care of patriarchal tutelage. This is gone, and it will slowly disappear till future generations will hardly find its trace in their pedigrees.

Already has the sad work of depopulation commenced, and commenced as it has with the Indian; the females are dying in proportion of three to one male, and thus the sources of reproduction are being dried up under the mysterious decree pronounced against the father of the race.

But, whatever must be their fate, let not their blood fall on the South. The South is innocent of the blood of those victims of blind fanaticism.

☞ A fellow at a race course was staggering about the track with more liquor than he could carry.

"Hallo, what's the matter now?" said a chap whom the inebriated individual had just ran against.

"Why, why—hic—why, the fact is, a lot of my friends have been betting liquor on the race to-day, and they have got me to hold the stakes."

☞ Speaking of the "undeveloped wealth of the country," a loafer said that was exactly his position; he possessed vast resources—was very rich—but his wealth was undeveloped.

MILITARY VS. CIVIL POWER.

If the recent action of Major Gen. Terry, commanding the Department of Virginia, is to be sustained by the President, the Legislature of that State had better adjourn, and the members turn their attention to private business, leaving the whole matter of governing the State in the hands of the military authorities. The action referred to is Gen. Terry's annulment, by an order dated January 24, of the vagrant law passed by the General Assembly and duly promulgated by the Executive. It is nothing more than a solemn farce for a body of men, the chosen representatives of the people of a great State—a body of men, too, whose voice is deemed of sufficient importance to be heard in deciding upon an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—it is, we repeat, a mockery for them to sit in council and enact laws which may be set aside as so much worthless paper, in case the provisions do not please the fancy of the military commandant. Better have entire military rule at once, and spare the people the expense of sustaining so costly an institution as Legislatures usually prove themselves to be.

The Virginia vagrant law, which has thus been set aside, was considered one of the most satisfactory statutes that could have been adopted. As stated in its preamble, owing to the cessation of war, there had been a great increase of idle and disorderly persons in some parts of the Commonwealth, many of whom were rogues and vagabonds; and to restrain and prevent such vagrancy, the enactment of stringent laws was required, otherwise the public welfare must suffer. The Virginia Legislators appreciated fully the delicacy of their position, knowing that while no law would be considered too severe for white vagrants, the Radicals in Washington, who kept close surveillance of their actions, would show no mercy if they touched too harshly upon their hobby—the freedmen. In order, therefore, to escape the charge of legislating for the purpose of oppressing the blacks, a bill was drawn up, in which all direct reference to either race was avoided—the general denomination of "vagrants" being used throughout, and neither the words white, black, negro, nor freedmen inserted in any portion of the document.

This difficulty happily overcome, another arose, viz: to so define what constituted vagrancy as to again avoid stepping upon the toes of the irrepressible darkey, and his tender-footed allies. A most fortunate method, they thought, was at last hit upon for surmounting this obstacle. Pennsylvania was a near neighbor—only divided from Virginia by a narrow river; and Pennsylvania was undoubtedly a "loyal" State. Her vagrant law could not certainly be objectionable, and why not adopt it? The legislators now considered themselves safely "out of the woods," so with the simple introduction "the following described persons shall be liable to the penalties imposed by law upon vagrants," the five sections devoted to the description of this class were transcribed from the vagrant act of Pennsylvania without change of a syllable.

It is the second of these sections which has created the present trouble, and we quote it entire:

2. All persons who, not having wherewith to maintain themselves and their families, live idly and without employment, and refuse to work for the usual and common wages given other laborers in the like work in the place where they then are.

The objections raised by Gen. Terry to the italicized portion of the above extract are that, in some counties, employers have formed "unjust and wrongful combinations for the purpose of depressing the wages of freedmen far below the value of their labor," and that the "usual and common wages" are thus made inadequate for the support of themselves and families. It seems to us that where supply and demand, as in farm labor, regulate the value of the services rendered; and when such labor is in demand greater than the supply in every Southern State; and when, too, liberal wages are paid to freedmen in all parts of the South, except the section of Virginia denominated by Gen. Terry as "some counties," such combinations as he refers to can have very little strength or effect. And even if the great injustice which Gen. Terry anticipates would result from the law, should be done to the freedmen, there is another and better remedy than by forbidding the enforcement of a necessary statute, and thus protecting the idle, vicious and dissolute from wholesome punishment. Under the laws of Virginia, all such combinations as those the order asserts are in existence are forbidden, and may be punished under the statutes. Why did not Gen. Terry call the attention of the grand juries of the counties to these infringements of the law? If the courts then made discriminations against the negroes, by refusing to punish the offenders, there would have been reasonable grounds for military interference.

We think the Commander of the Department of Virginia has been hasty and inconsiderate in his action, and we hope that President Johnson will so decide. If he does not, "civil rights" are words without meaning for the people of Virginia.

SOUND SENTIMENTS.

The New York Evening Post advocates the admission of the claimants to seats in Congress from the Southern States, for the reason, which should be satisfactory to every republican and patriot in the land, that all persons in the revolted States, who are amnestied, have a right to represent and be represented in Congress. Such as are excepted from the benefits of the amnesty, having no political rights, are in a special category, for which provision can be made at the pleasure of the Government. These excepted individuals are harmless. "The Davises, and Toombses and Cobbs, and Hunters, and Hamptons, and other makers of mischief, need give us no alarm. We can dispose of them as justice and a wise policy shall hereafter suggest; but the men who have been true to us in Tennessee, and Arkansas, and Florida, and North Carolina, the masses who have been amnestied, the still larger number who desire final reconciliation and tranquility, must not be made to suffer wrongs on their account. As the nation opens its arms to the latter, Congress should welcome their fitting representatives. Then, when all the States are in action, when the restoration is accomplished, let us proceed to such constitutional amendments as the altered circumstances of the country, the progress of public opinion, and a matured judgment of our affairs will unquestionably demand.

☞ The Anglo Brazil Times, speaking of Southern emigration, says Gen. Woods goes by this packet to the United States, returning from his mission to this country—a mission which, we think, will be productive of good. Gen. Wood has received the most cordial reception from the people of Brazil and can guarantee a like friendly hand will be held out to those he represents, should they come to Brazil. The Government of Brazil is prepared to furnish them facilities and Gen. Wood's views as to the Government furnishing a vessel gratuitously for emigrants to every two furnished by the latter, has met with the sanction of the Minister of Agriculture.—Augusta Constitutional, 2d inst.

JUDGE CHASE AND JEFF. DAVIS.

[From the Springfield Republican.]

Chief Justice Chase's position with regard to the trial of Jefferson Davis continues singular, and would be incredible, if it were not stated by the President and his Cabinet Ministers. The opinion of the Government is that such trial should be by a civil court, and in Virginia, where the offence chiefly lay. But Mr. Chase declines to proceed with it, on the pretence—for we cannot regard it as any thing more than a pretence—that that State is under military authority, and not fully restored to civil law. There certainly is no hindrance to the proceedings of the United States Supreme Court in the presence of a few troops to keep order between the freedmen and their former masters. We may look elsewhere for the real cause of Judge Chase's conduct. Does it lie in his fear, that there, among Davis's old friends and associates in the cause for which he is arraigned, no impartial trial can be secured; no jury, who can judge impartially of law and fact, can be empannelled? There certainly is room for doubt and danger here: between the two parties of loyalists and rebels into whom our whole population has been sharply divided, it would be impossible to obtain anywhere, indeed a thoroughly independent and impartial jury for this great case.

But Judge Chase would hardly make a point on this; certainly, if he did, he should have some remedy to propose; at least no hesitation to avow it. His barren evasion seems to cover the reality of a different reason; and may we not find it in the fact of his being still a Presidential candidate, and the natural consequent dislike to meet such an issue as the trial and conviction of the head of the rebellion, all parties to which are to vote for the next Chief Magistracy? This is not a very flattering suggestion, but we do not hesitate to make it: it is no more discreditable than the fact that, being Chief Justice of the Republic, he is also dreaming and planning how to get into the Presidential chair.

No man has fallen more in public esteem, in public confidence, than has Judge Chase, through this now notorious circumstance of his ambition. That it would be so was Mr. Lincoln's chief objection to appointing him to Judge Taney's place. That it would not be so was the repeated and doubtless honest assurance of Mr. Chase's friends. But Mr. Lincoln proved wisest; and the fact is no more lamentable and disgraceful than it is true. And to it, and the caution and diplomacy inspired by it, is the country probably indebted for the circumstance that Mr. Davis remains an untried and unconvicted prisoner.

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

A lady named Cutler, residing in South Fifth street, Brooklyn, has lately been robbed of about $1000 worth of furniture, by, as she believed, spirits. It appears, however, that a graceless son was the thief, he confessing the robbery while confined in the penitentiary for another offence.

William Graham, of Nashua, Chicasaw county, Illinois, has suddenly found himself worth $45,000,000. It comes from his great grandfather's estate in Scotland, which was sold many years ago, the price brought having since accumulated in the Bank of England. He had previously quarreled with his wife and son, and has now made a will cutting them off without a shilling.

Several attempts have been made within the last eighteen months to throw passenger trains on the Boston and Lowell Railroad off the track, and the guilty person has just been caught. His name is Luke Richardson, of Winchester. He is sixteen years old, is the son of a respectable farmer, and had four brothers in the war. He began by placing pins and pennies on the track, and lately thought he would try stones and sleepers, and see what the effect would be. He does not seem to have had any intention of endangering the lives of passengers.

Louis Allepa, of Colchester, Vermont, claims to be 116 years old.

Several women froze to death in Martin county, Minnesota, during the recent cold weather.

It is estimated that thirty tons of white paper are used daily in the manufacture of paper collars.

The Ordnance Department, at Richmond, recently put a cart load or two of shells on a sand-bar in James river, to destroy their explosive power. The river falling, the shells were discovered by two men named Michael Martin and William Reese, who carried a lot of them to their house in the city, and set to work with sledges and chisels to unload them, designing to save the powder and sell the iron. On Tuesday each was at work with a 12-pounder between his legs, when one shell exploded, set fire to the other, and blew Martin actually into pieces. He died in a few minutes. Reese was terribly hurt, and is not expected to live.

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican says: In the winter of 1855 there were eight carrier-boys employed to distribute that paper in Springfield. Three of these boys are now cashiers of banks in or near Springfield.

The Internal revenue collections in St. Louis last year amounted to $6,049,000—an increase of $3,000,000 over 1864.

M'lle Augustine Brohan, the actress, got a prize of 50,000 francs at the last drawing of the municipal lottery at Paris.

It is reported in New York that the Government has employed Wm. M. Evarts, an eminent lawyer, to assist in the trial of Hon. Jefferson Davis. He has shut himself up in a closet, and is studying the case. He is to have $10,000 for it. The Government is distrustful of the ability of the Attorney-General to meet the eminent counsel of Mr. Davis, Charles O'Connor, of New York, and Hon. George E. Pugh, of Ohio. Evarts allows no one to see him, and is devoting his entire time to the business.

WASHINGTON NEWS.

The President, on the 2d, communicated the following to the Senate:

To the Senate of the United States:

The accompanying correspondence is transmitted to the Senate, in compliance with the resolution of the 16th, requesting the President, if it is not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate any correspondence which may have taken place between himself and any of the Judges of the Supreme Court, touching the holding of the Civil Courts of the United States in the insurrectionary States for the trial of crimes against the United States.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, Oct. 20, 1865.

Dear Sir—It may become necessary that the Government prosecute some high crimes and misdemeanors committed against the United States within the District of Virginia. Permit me to inquire whether the circuit of the United States, for that District, is so far organized and in condition to exercise its functions, that yourself or either of your Associate Judges of the Supreme Court will hold a term of Circuit Court there during the autumn or early winter, for the trial of cases. Very respectfully,

(Signed) ANDREW JOHNSON.

Hon. S. P. Chase, Chief Justice Supreme Court.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12, 1865.—Dear Sir: Your letter of the 2d, directed to Cleveland and forwarded to Sandusky, reached me there night before last. I left for Washington yesterday morning, and have just arrived. To your inquiry, whether a term of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Virginia will be held by myself or one of the Associate Judges of the Supreme Court, during autumn or early winter, I respectfully reply in the negative. Under ordinary circuits, the regular time authorized by Congress—the fourth Monday in November—would be the proper time for the holding of the said Court, which, this year, will be the 27th. Only a week will intervene between that day and the commencement of the annual term of the Supreme Court, when all the Judges are required to be in attendance at Washington. That time is too short for the transaction of any important business. Were this otherwise, I see much doubt of the propriety of holding Circuit Courts of the United States in States which have been declared by the Executive and legislative departments of the National Government to be in rebellion, and, therefore, subject to martial law, and before the complete restoration of their broken relations with the nation; and the supersedure of military by civil administration, that I am unwilling to hold such courts in such States within any circuits which embraces Virginia, until Congress shall have opportunity to consider and act on the whole subject. A civil court in a district under martial law can only act by law, under the sanction and provision of the military law, and I cannot think it becomes the Justice of the Supreme Court to exercise jurisdiction under such conditions. In this view it is proper to say that Justice Wayne, whose whole circuit is in the rebel States, concurs with me. I have had no opportunity of consulting with any other Justice, but the Supreme Court has before declined to consider the cases brought before it by appeal or writ of error from the Circuit or District Courts in the rebel portion of the country. No very reliable inference can be drawn from this action, for circumstances have changed since the court adjourned; but so far as it goes, it favors the conclusion of myself and Justice Wayne.

Respectfully, yours truly,

S. P. CHASE.

The President on the 2d sent to the Senate the report of General Sherman relative to the Department of Mississippi. It relates mainly to his trip to Arkansas, and he intimates that the interests of that State would be subserved in the completion and repairs of certain railroads which received great damage by material being taken during the war. To further this end he recommends employing certain negro regiments in cutting wood for ties in order to assist in completing the railroad from Memphis to Little Rock.

W. W. Corcoran, the distinguished and wealthy banker of Washington, has returned from Paris, whither he was driven by his Southern proclivities, and where he has resided for the last three years. He says that Mason and Slidell are well, but the former is very anxious to return home.

AN ECONOMICAL WONDER.—One of the economical wonders of the age is now an exhibition under the Southern Hotel, on Walnut street, between 11 A. M. and 3 P. M., of each day. The wonder is called a Petroleum stove, but is about as unlike the common stove as can be imagined. Oil is converted into gas, and then passing through a pinhole aperture is there ignited; and will do an immense amount of cooking in an incredibly short time. The thing is a miracle of science, and the exhibition hall is daily crowded with visitors and delighted gentlemen fascinated by the novel show.

A stupendous revolution in the stove, coal, wood, (for fuel,) and lamp markets, is believed to be impending in the interest of economy in fuel, in time, in labor, in cleanliness and convenience. The new apparatus bears about the same relation to the ordinary stove, that the lucifer match bears to the obsolete tinder-box. A company is already organized to manufacture the Petroleum burning fixtures for Missouri.—Missouri Democrat, 3d inst.

STILL ANOTHER APPALLING STEAMBOAT EXPLOSION.

THE W. R. CARTER BLOWN UP AND BURNT.

Great Loss of Life.

The Atlantic and Mississippi Steamship Company's U. S. mail steamer W. R. Carter, from Louisville for New Orleans, exploded her boilers at 2 o'clock this morning, while passing Island 98; about 40 miles above Vicksburg, after which she took fire and burned to the water's edge, the hulk sinking almost instantly in very deep water. The boat was descending, running smoothly, when the accident occurred. The Evening Star left here yesterday morning for St. Louis, and about 2 o'clock this morning the officers discovered a great light ahead, and upon turning the bend run right into the midst of floating human beings, shrieking for assistance. The Evening Star was stopped and the life-boats and yawls sent immediately to their rescue. All who could be found were picked up. Some of them were terribly scalded. The Emerald, ascending, picked up three persons.

Those of the crew that were saved were transferred to the Luna going up. Capt. Jesse Y. Hurd was commanding the Carter, and is supposed to be lost. The first clerk, Mr. Frank Smith, is saved, and is aboard the Luna. All the officers, except the first clerk, first and second engineers, and first mate, are reported lost.

The ladies cabin was full; the gentlemen's cabin was nearly full. The loss of life is estimated at over one hundred.

In the great excitement, confusion and suffering consequent upon such a disaster, it is impossible to arrive at much definite information respecting the lost. We saw and conversed with the first engineer, who is very dangerously scalded, also the second engineer, who is badly bruised. The first engineer says the boat was running at a very moderate speed, and all seemed to be working well, when without a moment's warning, everything was flying in the air and water, and death and destruction dealt on all sides by the hissing steam and the flames. The other engineer was asleep; says he knew nothing till his head emerged from the water. Gen. Gano, late of the famous Indian Brigade, is very dangerously scalded.

The names given are the same as already published in the True Delta.

Among the survivors who escaped was Genl R. Lee Gibson, of Louisiana, commander of the famous brigade which bore his name in the late Confederate army. He is at present in the city, at the residence of his relative, B. Hardaway, Esq. We regret to learn, however, that a younger brother, Mr. Hart Gibson, was scalded on the hands and arms, but not dangerously. He is also at Mr. Hardaway's.

Gen. S. W. Ferguson, who commanded a cavalry brigade in the late army of Mississippi, was also on the Carter, and escaped.

We are pained to learn that Dr. C. A. Rice, of Raymond, who had been out a few days married, lost his wife by the calamity. The Doctor was saved, and when we saw him, was devoting himself to the wounded, and none but his intimate friends knew the terrible loss he had experienced.

All the surgeons of the city responded promptly to this appeal to their humanity and skill, and no little credit is due them for alleviating the pains of the unfortunate sufferers. Several of the wounded are at private houses, but most of them are at the city hospital.

GALLOWS TWADDLE.

The woman named Grinder, who was hanged on Friday, at Pittsburgh, was the most vulgar of assassins; so ignorant that she could not write her own name; a murderer not to revenge a wrong, not to gain wealth, but for a mere fiendish lust for destroying life. Yet even this disgusting creature, about whose history and crimes there is no more romance than there is about a hyena gorged with the putrid carcasses of a battle-field, has not escaped an "ovation" at the hands of the Jenkinses of the press.

These persons attended her "last moments" with as much interest, and describe them as pathetically, as though she had been the victim instead of the murderer. They write about her "pleasant smile"—the pleasant smile of a prisoner; about the "remarkably graceful inclination of the head, coupled with (another) sweet smile;" her "mild and cheerful tone;" the "pleasant glare of her expressive blue eyes"—all this on the gallows—just as though this abominable and accursed wretch, who had but a day before confessed to the most hateful and unprovoked murders, had been an innocent martyr condemned by unjust laws.

Nor does Jenkins surrender his subject to the undertaker without a final struggle. The drop did not put a stop to his delightful labor; when the body was cut down Jenkins appears to have rushed up the gallows to finger it—to paw it rather—with disgusting pleasure; and, thus wrought to a fresh frenzy, he bursts out with redoubled fervor:

"The cap was removed, and, to the astonishment of every person who saw it, the face wore exactly the same placid, cheerful, smiling expression, which characterized it on the scaffold, during the trial, and all other occasions. The face looked as though she might be in a sweet sleep. There was no discoloration or disfigurement, save a mark around the left side of the neck; the eyes were closed, but when the lids were pulled back, they still looked bright and animated. Thus ended the career of a woman who was fully the peer, not the inferior in crime, of the world renowned Lucretia Borgia. Had she been a titled lady, like her predecessor, or even walked in superior society, her name would yet figure in plays and romances."

And then Jenkins meanders on through yet other paragraphs about the "meekness, gentleness and child-like cheerfulness" of this monstrous creature, who had what he would probably call "an unfortunate habit of administering arsenic to her friends," if she had only poisoned Jenkins!—N. Y. Post.

Financial and Commercial.

MONETARY.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE,
NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, FEB. 9, 1866.

The only transaction that has transpired in financial circles to-day was a still further decline in rates of foreign exchange.

Gold opened heavily at yesterday's closing figures and with a heavy supply and limited demand. Operations were of a restricted character throughout, without however, any noticeable change in prices. The only actual sales that have come to our notice were $6000 at 138¾; $2000, $3000 and $5000 at the same; and $500, $10,000, $10,000, $6000 and $15,000, at 138¾. In silver, the sales were confined to $300, American halves, at 134; $300 at 134½; and $1500, at 133. We still quote gold nominal, at 138¾@139½; and silver at 133@135, for American coin, and 127@133 for Mexican dollars.

Foreign exchange has gone still further down today. The market was amply supplied throughout, and for the most part there was a moderate inquiry noticeable. But the prices offered were still lower than heretofore, and the movement was of a restricted character throughout, at 114@119½ at bank; clear bills at 146¾@147½; bill of lading bills 145¾@149½; bank francs 5 75@5 76¼; and out door francs 5 80@5 85. We subjoin the whole of the sales that have been satisfactorily verified, viz: £2000 at 147¾; £2500 at 147¾ (2 147¾; £1500 at 147¾; £2000, £2000 and £3000 at 147½; £1500 at 147; £2000 at 146¾; and £2500 at 146½. In francs we have to report sales of 100,000, 100,000 and 200,000f at 5 85; and 25,000, 43,000 and 60,000, at 5 82½. The ruling figures at the close of business are as follows, viz: Sterling at 149¾@150 at bank; clear bills 147@147½; bill of lading bills 145¾@149½; bank francs 5 75@5 76¼; and out door francs 5 80@5 85.

Domestic exchange has undergone no material alteration of any kind since our last. Offerings were very light throughout, and the demand was of a merely moderate character from the opening to the close of business. All of the banks uniformly checked at par, and they bought upon the best terms they could obtain, as may be inferred from the actual movement, viz: $50,000 New York sight at ¼ cent. discount, $50 000 do. at 3-16, $56,000 do. at the same figure, $10,000 $19,000, and $25,000 do at ¼, and $10,000 do. at ⅜ cent. discount. There have been no sales of any importance transacted to-day in short sight or time drafts, and we still quote New York sight at par at bank, and ½@¾ cent. discount out of doors; five to ten days' sight, 5-16@7-16 cent. discount; fifteen to twenty days', ½@¾ cent. discount; thirty days, ¾@1 cent. discount; and sixty days, 1@1¼ cent. discount.

STOCKS AND BONDS.—There is no marked alteration of any kind noticeable in the movement of the general run of securities to-day, and transactions have been of a very restricted character throughout, without any variation in prices. Some few favorite securities appear to be still in good request; but the general offerings are very much neglected, and since our last have been confined to 45 shares of Crescent City Bank at 38, 100 do. at the same figure, and 25 do at 39; 60 shares Canal Bank at 58, and 21 do. City Railroad, and 115 do. Bank of Louisiana at prices that have been withheld.

Uncurrent bank notes are at a stand still. Offerings continue very light, and the demand is but little better than nominal for any class of the issues of the banks now in liquidation. The only sales that have transpired to-day were $1500 Bank of Louisiana at 50½c., and $2500 do. at 50¾c. We still quote: Bank of New Orleans, Crescent City Bank and Union Bank at 85@90c.; Louisiana State Bank and Mechanics' Bank at 73@76c., and Bank of Louisiana at 50@55c. ₱ dollar.

COMMERCIAL.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE,
NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, FEB. 9, 1866.

COTTON—The market has been at a stand still today. Offerings were very light at best, and there were no buyers, except at still lower figures, which most factors refused to accept. Transactions up to noon amounted to only 627 bales which were taken by five buyers in the following order, viz: 175, 119, 150, 142 and 30 bales. Prices were weak, but no lower than on yesterday, and the movement may be correctly reported at previous figures. The European advices, published in the evening papers and the particulars of which had come to hand by private dispatches at an early hour, caused a total suspension of operations, and no sales of any kind have been reported since the first announcement was made of a late arrival from Europe. Quotations, of course cannot be considered better than nominal in the present condition of the market, and we would therefore refer to yesterday's figures, which we now reproduce, as nearly approximating prices, viz: Ordinary, 38@40c.; good ordinary, 42@43c.; low middling, 45c.; and middling, 47c.

SUGAR AND MOLASSES.—The receipts since yesterday were confined to 48 hhds. sugar, 93 bbls. and 44 half bbls. molasses. A good demand prevailed this morning, and the arrivals of the past three days, which have been unsold on account of the unfavorable weather, were disposed of, amounting to some 300 hhds. sugar and 200 bbls. molasses, the former bringing 13¼c. for common seconds, 15½c. for fully fair, 15¾c. for fully fair to prime, 15½c. for clarified seconds, 16c. for prime, and 17c. ₱ lb for clarified; the latter 60c. for falerior, 75c. for common, 85c. for good, 90c. for prime, and 93c. ₱ gallon for choice.

WESTERN PRODUCE—A fair demand has prevailed throughout the day, and holders have been enabled to obtain full prices. The flour market is firm, the stock on hand being considerably diminished, and no fresh arrivals of any magnitude. But little grain remains on hand, owing to the standing orders for shipment, chiefly to domestic ports. We refer our readers to the annexed particulars regarding the condition of the wheat of last year, the quality of which we called attention to several weeks since. The transactions to-day embrace some 2500 bbls., of which 700, 700, 850 and 300 bbls. brought yesterday's prices, which we repeat for reference: Superfine, $8 75@8 87½; choice to extra, $9 00@9 75; extra, $10@10 25; and choice extra, $13 25@13 50 ₱ bbl.

CORN—We noticed a good demand, resulting in sales of some 4000 sacks, including 1300 mixed and yellow at $1 07½@1 10; 150 yellow at $1 07½; 800, 800 and 200 white at $1 10; and 400 and 200 do. at $1 12½ ₱ bushel.

OATS—The transactions include about 1700 sacks, of which 500 sold at 54c., together with 800 and 400 at 55c ₱ bushel.

BRAN—A lot of 300 sacks changed hands at $1 60 ₱ 100 lbs.

PROVISIONS—We notice only a jobbing trade for pork, with occasionally a round lot being disposed of. Prices exhibit no further change. All descriptions of bacon are scarce, while lard remains in fair supply, both commanding full prices.

PORK—There has been a little better demand for round lots and prices for this evening exhibit but little change. To-day, small parcels were selling at $32 50@$33 ₱ bbl. for even-weight mess. Prime mess is scarce, and at retail readily commands $30 ₱ bbl.

BACON—We have no alteration to notice in our quotations. Ribbed sides are scarce; shoulders and clear sides in fair supply, and commanding 15c. for the former and 20@22c. ₱ lb for the latter. Sugar-cured hams (uncanvassed) are selling at 28c. ₱ lb.

LARD—The market is dull, and prime is retailing at 18½c. in tierces and 20c. ₱ lb in kegs.

COFFEE—Dealers are supplying the demand at 22c for ordinary, 20@20½c. for fair, and 21c. ₱ lb, currency, for prime choice Rio.

WHISKY—There is but little demand, and dealers are supplying the trade at $2 25 ₱ gallon for rectified.

SUNDRIES—We quote Western butter at

LETTER FROM AN OLD FRIEND.

AN ANNIVERSARY DAY—REMINISCENCES OF THE ADVOCATE—ITS FIRST LAUNCH—EARLY TRIALS—SOME OF THE OLD CONTRIBUTORS—A TIMELY DREAM—FULFILMENT—THE CHURCH—ITS PRESENT AND FUTURE.

FEB. 8, 1866.

To-day I received the New Orleans Christian Advocate, Vol. 12, Nos. 1, 2 and 3, dated January 20. The mails bring other papers promptly. Surely your mailing clerk at 112 Camp street, overlooked my name, in the confusion and hurry of getting under way.

With what interest have I read to date—the three numbers of the Advocate; the last February 3. The Editorial GREETING says—"We hesitated, dreaded to repeat the hopes and fears with which, on the 8th February, 1851, we first launched this honest craft." Memory carries me back to that day and event, for I was at that launch.

I took up my pen to write—something, hardly-know what; and am surprised, when setting down the date, by an anniversary!

I feel like writing poetry, or rather quoting some. Certain passages flit dimly before my mind, almost expressive of my emotions; and almost does memory put the fragmentary lines into smooth verse; but books are not at hand, and the collection is not complete. This, however, I will gratefully say—

"Thus far the Lord hath led me on,
Thus far His power prolongs my days."

My dear Doctor, you have strong helpers and many by you; you have the house, press, engine, type, all—the character, too, with which to begin this second start. How was it then, when we toiled together to bring out Vol. 1, No. 1, of this honored sheet? No house—but you remember that upper room, with its cheerless four walls. Our contracting and calculating, our hopes and fears—all our difficulties, how vividly they come up before me this anniversary day! At the darkest hour I dreamed a dream, which I told you next morning, and we conferred in the interpretation: I remember it well. I was in a wagon drawn by two grey horses. They were to go to a stream of steep banks, over which was a bridge. Upon examination the bridge would not do for a crossing; it was shaky and had holes in it. There was a dead log, and the trip could not be made. Ah! May be now it can. The water is low water, and under the bridge there is discovered a way, difficult, but possible. The heads of the said greys were turned down the bank, and by particular hard pulling the trip was made.

My dear Doctor, that dream was from Daniel's vision for giving strength. The way under, the humble way, the plain and unpretending and hard-working way, was before us. The Patronizing Conference wanted the paper begun; but where was the money? Two hundred and forty names had been sent on credit; would pay as soon as the paper came to hand. How to turn the wheel; how to set the thing in motion—Hic labor, hic opus est. The financial difficulty was the high-banked stream. Paper and printwork, and every type that was used had to be paid for; and not a dollar in the treasury. You and I were on the spot and had to solve the problem. Others there were, whose hearts were in the matter, but necessity was laid on two to help it. Soon Alabama came up nobly and heartily to the rescue.—Louisiana, though not so strong as Alabama was always in and willing.—Mississippi, after taking a look or two to see that all was right, put a hand to the work that made success certain. You are correct, after enumerating the difficulties of its infancy in saying of the large list of subscribers which was soon gathered: "It was mainly owing to the fact that the best class of agents that could be secured or supported a religious paper." If they have not been carried out by the war or moved off, you will still live.

Work for nothing and find yourself—be editor and publisher; employ printers, buy paper, keep your books, help to mail and be mail boy sometimes; toy about the office; work nine hours in the day, sometimes ten, and occasionally throw in a night of full measure; keep up the correspondence, and use the scissors to read all the proofs. This was the way under the bridge. Flying ahead commercially, and shinning around to raise the funds to pay current expenses—and besides all this, meeting pastoral charges from Conference to Conference. This was the way under the bridge. Burdened local churches that the Advocate might be eased of its legitimate charges, until it could get on its feet—this was the way.

That dream, Doctor, has been a heap to me, and I dare say to you have made account of it. It proves that some things can be done well as others; and literally, that where there is a will there is a way.

Fifteen years ago last night I sat up, working with Livingston, till the small hours of morning—aye, till daylight—to get out the first number. My good wife could not refrain a gentle chiding next morning. "Why didn't you let me know where you were? Here I've been all night, scared, by myself, and you off enjoying yourself." Enjoying myself!

Poor Livingston, who set up our first types—he is gone long ago.—A royal printer he was, trained under Horace Greely. How many printers did we outlive there, within a few years! And let us remember gratefully, on this anniversary, John W. Crockett, of the Crescent, without whose generous aid and encouragement that "honest craft" might never have been launched. He, too, is long ago dead; and the eloquent Frost, his partner. The Crescent is yet afloat. Long live Col. Nixon, its proprietor, from whom we had many valuable aids and helps.

"Knowledge is power." Then I learned that the reverse of that proposition is equally true—"Ignorance is power." Many enterprises which we go through with eventually, never would be undertaken if we knew the difficulties they involved. But ignorant, blissfully ignorant of the rough and narrow and steep places, we start. Once committed, we don't like to give up.—Each trouble overcome, we hope it will be the last. By-and-by, when hope is about to loose its impulsive spring, sober calculation comes in, and we see that all that has been done is lost unless more is done, and it is a shorter route to push through to the goal than to retrace our steps. Even Luther said, after he had got a long way into the Reformation, that he sometimes wished he had never begun that business with the Pope.

The writers who were waked up or developed by the Advocate, and whose practiced and practising pens enlivened its pages, in its earlier years, pass in review before me.—J. H. R., our English correspondent, for each of whose letters, out of our scanty exchequer, we paid £1, is now one of the prominent members of the British Conference; and when I last saw it, one of the principal writers for the London Watchman. J. P. C., our French correspondent, and whose description of the coup d'etat of Louis Napoleon furnished the Advocate at the time, was the best I read anywhere, is a leader of Methodism in France. The initials of J. H. and H. H. M., and W. C. H., W. and W. W., and many others, are well remembered as vouchers for suggestive and thoughtful articles. Our Woodsman, Boaz, Knox, Presbyter, and other nom de plume that figure in those columns, have not, it is hoped, lost their pens or the use of them. We are always glad to see W. As for K., we know him; he cannot be hid. Is it not time M. W. W. and others of her sex, had re-appeared? We wait for them. If your part of the sky is not well lighted, it will not be for the lack of stars, but because the stars refuse to shine.

Your editorial estimate of the Situation of Southern Methodism is, I think, entirely right—that "in all the elements of strength we are as well off as we were before." Our people will be slow in recovering themselves to a hearty recognition of this fact, but already it is accepted. There are compensations in the moral world, they begin to come within view. Even in temporal matters, many people are not so poor as they think. They reckon their condition by what they have lost, rather than by what they have. "I have lost so much and so much;" the conclusion is, "therefore I am poor, or ought to be." Now think of what is left, and its relative value. If one door has been shut, another has been opened—may be a wider one.

As for our beloved Church, the hope that is in me is perhaps greater than the reason I could give; but my hope is great. The future is big with promise of growth, of spirituality and of power. If we be wise enough to understand the times, and what Israel ought to do; if, with holy, meek, self-distrusting boldness we follow the leadings of Providence, and adapt the mode and machinery of Methodism somewhat to the rightful demand of circumstances—then a new era of success opens with our second century; and the angels and all good men will share in the joy. The members elect of the General Conference will have to meet the responsibility in less than sixty days. Since 1808, when the Constitution and forms under which we have been working ever since, with very slight changes, were adopted, no body more important to our church has convened. Important, whether it does or fails to do anything. The crisis, the opportunity makes it important. How much do the members constituting that General Conference need the wisdom which is profitable to direct—the wisdom that cometh from above! Let this be a subject for prayer in all hearts and households and tabernacles.

We need meanwhile to be on our guard against that notion, which is like a besetment—that legislation can accomplish everything. Laws are not life, but only supply regulations for the vital principle to work advantageously. A verdant brother was asked for a contribution to support his pastor. "Why," said he, "I thought the Discipline supported the preachers." It does not, directly; though it may point out the way for doing that thing.—The Discipline don't convert souls, nor build them up directly; nevertheless it directs the agencies by which these high ends are instrumentally reached. It does not bear down straightly and proximately on conversion, like a camp-meeting; yet, for all that, a single clause in the Discipline may be pregnant with salvation or reprobation of souls.—A gracious Providence is over us. How many reasons now appear to reconcile us to having had no General Conference in 1862. Meantime, while we have cause to be thankful for some things that were not done, the mind of the Church has become ripe and harmonious on some other things that need to be done.

Referring again to the elements and material advantages that are ours, I illustrate by the case of the railroads. The depots were burned, the cars destroyed and the engines disabled and tracks torn up during the war. At a glance, it seemed like all was at an end; "gone up," as the boys have it. When peace comes and reconstruction, it is found that putting a train through is not like beginning de novo. The corporation and franchise is ready, the surveys have been made, and the deep excavations and tedious levellings; the road-bed is there, and the culverts; the officers are on hand and up to their duty—and soon you are startled by the whistle. The schedule is out, and connections are made. So of the Church, Doctor; and so, too, of the—Advocate. There is much left to go to work with. We have learned new ideas; have been thoroughly shaken up and abandoned a few old ones; and take it all in all, the future may be an improvement on the past.

Set me down then as hopeful, who am not by nature of a sanguine temper. Speak comfortably to the people. Say unto Zion, thy God reigneth.

Yours, as ever,

A FRIEND.

SOUTHERN METHODISM.

Aside from all mere sectarian preference, the present attitude of the Southern Methodist Church is one of commanding interest. Methodism at its outset was probably a revival of religion. As such, it provided for its own perpetuity by taking on an organized form. It became at a very early day an organized revival, looking to permanency. From the condition of an organized revival merely, it has grown to the dignity of an ecclesiastical constitution in several very large churches, which retain more or less of its spirit and form.—Isaac Taylor thinks it had already lost its power before Wesley died. In this judgment, however, the prejudice of the Churchman displaces the candor of the essayist. Still it must be allowed that the original Wesleyan intensity is scarcely to be found anywhere now. Yet the revival power is in the Methodist churches. But, unfortunately, in the largest one of them on this continent, it is sadly dilated by politics and fanaticism.

In the Methodist Episcopal Church South, more than anywhere else on this side of the Atlantic, is the unadulterated spirit of original Methodism to be found. In this Church it has adhered, with slight exceptions, with a single eye to its prime object—that of "spreading scriptnre holiness over the land." It has neither suffered from any fanatical mania nor become a mere ecclesiastico-political organization. It serves the Lord Christ, and acknowledges no other Master.

Even Isaac Taylor acknowledges that the fruits of the Methodist revival still remain, and are to be found outside of any Methodist organization. He instances especially the improved condition of the Church of England. Truly so. And in America, all the churches were provoked to good works, at least, if not to love also, by the introduction of Methodism into this country. It modified, also, and made more practical and efficient the popular forms of doctrinal instruction in all the other churches, of nearly all of them; so that they have enjoyed a larger prosperity ever since; to say nothing of the thousands they have gathered into their folds, as the fruits of Methodist revivals.—All Protestant Christianity has an interest in Methodism, and for this reason, in the Southern Methodist Church especially.

There are two facts which invest this Church with special interest just now. The first is, a growing conviction for some years past, that some important modifications of our ecclesiastical polity have become necessary; and the second is, the peculiar attitude in which our Church stands toward the Northern Church. Both these facts will demand the attention of the approaching General Conference. In reference to the latter, there is scarcely any diversity of opinion among us. The individual exercise of charity toward our brethren of the Northern Church (for which exercise there is large scope in this case) is the only duty we owe, and the only thing practicable in the nature of the case. Coalesce with them in church organization would impose upon us the merciless fanaticism that eats up piety and eviscerates the Church. Indeed, in view of the past, it scarcely becomes us to discuss the question of reunion in the absence of official overtures from them. If there were any such overtures, we could do no otherwise than reject them. There are not flesh-pots enough in Egypt to tempt us back. Better to wander and perish in the wilderness. But no such alternative is before us. Our organization is extensive and powerful, and, I trust, sufficiently vital to withstand all the attacks upon us that are being so zealously organized by the fanatics.

It is of the essence of fanaticism to work intensely, but by spurts.—Though the world will never probably be rid of the germs fanatic, all the various species are doomed to a violent and brief existence. The particular species now manifesting itself amongst the Northern Methodists is fast working itself to death. And when it is dead, it will be "twice dead—plucked up by the roots." Religion, on the contrary, has a more temperate, but tenacious life, that will survive reverses. The bonfire is extinguished by the storm, but the sun shines brighter than ever when the storm is past. This fanaticism may be a very brave thing for a while, but its end is near. In the meantime we have nothing to do but ignore it, as far as possible, and work on. The most I dread is, that we will quit our work to fight it. There, if I mistake not, lies our greatest, if not our only danger. It lives by fighting.

Hands off! Let this be our motto, while we go about our Master's business. Let us preach Christ, and do nothing else but preach Christ, while "the potsherd strives with the potsherds of the earth."—Let us save souls—dying souls. We have no time to wrangle with these people. We must let them alone. They will soon find a bone to quarrel over among themselves, and then they will devour each other. If we will do our work well, we need not fear that our people will forsake us for strangers. If we stop to quarrel, it will only make the matter worse for ourselves.

The other matter is one of more importance, and likely to involve a greater amount of difference and discussion. Is it really necessary for us to modify our ecclesiastical polity to any considerable extent? One thing at least we know—many of our best thinkers believe that it is. But just at this point I apprehend some danger.

May we not suffer ourselves to be drawn into a contest about forms that will damage the spirit of the Church? Are we not in danger of coming to trust too much to mere efficiency of organization, and so to underrate the true source of power and success? I would rather a thousand times that our Church polity should be defective, even gravely so, than that, as a people, we should lose the Wesleyan spirit, which is indeed the Spirit of Christ. Holiness of heart and life in the ministry and membership is the saving characteristic of a church. Without it there is death; and even though an organization be maintained and advance in growth, where is the use? If souls are not saved, there might as well be no church. The very function of a church is to aid men in obtaining salvation. If it fails in this, it is itself a failure. Mere outward prosperity is hollow and amounts to nothing.

But the Methodist Church is not likely to maintain even outward prosperity, except upon the basis of spirituality. Almost any other Church could do it better. For the Methodist Church has nothing in her character, no point in her constitution around which to rally a species of worldly pietism. Nor do I see how she can create any such train by legislation. And if she could, she would destroy her character as a permanent revival of religion, and become a semi-worldly institution.

Let me illustrate what I mean by reference to other Churches. I disclaim any invidious design in this; but it is necessary to bring out my thoughts fully.

In the Roman Catholic Church there is the prestige of antiquity and an imposing ceremonial. There is a species of semi-religious sentiment that is attracted by these things. This sentiment is often very intense in the most wicked men, and by this means this Church keeps up a high degree of religious enthusiasm, even in the absence of spirituality. For the religious element of man's nature is depraved, as well as the rest, and is sometimes, indeed often, largely developed in a corrupt form. Indeed the prevailing fact is, that religion exists in unspiritual manifestations.—Paganism, Mohammedanism and all the false forms of Christianity are in proof. Nor, indeed, is mere intenseness of religious feeling any evidence of its purity. A thousand facts show that the Buddhist, the Mohammedan, the anchorite, and ten thousand other species of false pietists are dominated by a religious sentiment as commanding as the impulses of the spirit which animate the genuine Christian. Now, if there is anything provided in the constitution, customs or history of a church which can furnish aliment to this depraved religious sentiment, that church may flourish without accomplishing the true object of Christian ecclesiasticism—which is the cultivation of genuine, saving piety.

In the Protestant Episcopal Church there is the fiction of apostolic succession, united with devotional forms adapted to a cultivated taste, and a very accommodating discipline. This Church is by no means dependent upon its spirituality alone for outward success. Antipodal to these churches is that very respectable one, the Baptist. These good people have made "immersion alone" their rallying word, and often with great effect. Even Presbyterianism succeeds with many on the plea of church government.

But the Methodists have nothing distinctive and peculiar to themselves that may be made subservient to the ends of ecclesiastical aggrandizement. If there is any exception, it is in the popularity of their doctrine, and the interest excited by the self-denying character of their pastorate—or, more properly, their evangelical system. But these do not now really form an exception. For the pulpit instructions of many other denominations have been cast so nearly in the Methodist mold, that we have lost our advantage of them here; and our evangelical system, from causes not difficult to trace, has lost its popular effect, in a great measure. We are absolutely without any factitious agencies to contribute to our success. This I do not regret. It throws us directly upon divine aid. Otherwise, I verily believe, we will come to nothing. Unless we maintain a high degree of spirituality, we will come to nothing.

Of course external exercises are not to be ignored, and a due degree of solicitude in the Church in reference to her piety is commendable—but while these things claim our attention, let us beware lest they engross it, and cause us to forget "where is the hiding of our power."

I cannot yet quit this topic. It is too vital to be passed over in a cursory manner. We stand or fall as a church upon one question of vital godliness. I mean particularly the Methodist Episcopal Church South. We have not even a fanatical galvanism to resort to, to replace the power of personal holiness. Nor have we in our religious theory the idiosyncracies of the Mystics or Quietists, so taking with certain classes of imaginative men and women. We must succeed by the mere force of plain scriptural holiness, or we must fall.

Let not the Church commit the fatal blunder of looking to the General Conference for the agencies of success. The responsibility of the Conference is unquestionably great. Momentous questions are to be decided by it. But they are, after all, questions merely in reference to means. The ultimate power must be sought elsewhere. It was perhaps well that we missed our session of the General Conference, that we might see ourselves surviving such a calamity, and even prospering. Perhaps it was well that some of our Annual Conferences were deprived of the Episcopal functions for several years. We must be made to feel that the Church flourishes, not in the light of grand ecclesiastical councils, but in the light of God; not by any magic of Episcopal visitations, but by the power of the Holy Ghost.

Let it not be supposed that I despise these agencies. God forbid! They are divinely appointed methods of spiritual labor. All I mean is, that our first care must be to maintain personal holiness in the ministry and membership of the church. Our great lever by which the world is to be moved, is faith. Faith in Christ, faith in His promises, faith in His denunciations, must be the controlling fact of both individual and ecclesiastical life.—Living faith, that unites the soul to Christ, must open to us the sources of infinite aid. He that dwelt between the cherubim must shine forth in our midst.

As to agencies in the Church, the chief of them all is a holy, laborious pastorate. But the pastor must be holy. The lustre of uncommon talents cannot substitute it. I even doubt if it is best that preachers generally should be very talented men. I do not doubt that every man is bound by the most sacred obligations to make the most he can of himself. But that the Gospel will have its greatest effect where it is recommended by brilliant parts and "wisdom of words," I do not believe. The primo qualifications of the pastor are holiness and diligence.

Next in importance to such a pastorate is an exemplary, working membership.

Where these can be united, almost any sort of church polity will do. To be sure the work may be hindered by an awkward, ill-adapted policy of ecclesiastical administration. But it would require a monstrously vicious system to prevent prosperity with such a ministry and membership. I would almost defy a General Conference to do its very worst.

Yet certainly it is a high duty to facilitate these agencies by the wisest possible legislation. That much is to be done for good or evil at New Orleans next April, I make no doubt. I have an abiding faith that it will be for good. In the meantime let the whole Church, in solemn prayer, commend the Conference to the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

LETTER FROM DR. SUMMERS.

Messrs. Editors—At the late session of the Mobile Conference, we were notified that the New Orleans Christian Advocate would resume its publication about the beginning of the year; the Conference accordingly expressed great satisfaction at the announcement, and formally adopted the Advocate as its organ. Presuming that the paper has recommenced its issue—though I have not seen a copy of it—I send you a paragraph or two for its columns.

I regret I have not a list of subscribers to send you; but though I made an appeal from the pulpit for subscriptions, I have not yet obtained any. There is an ominous lukewarmness on this subject in our connection. The people seem willing to do without ecclesiastical intelligence; they have got used to doing without it. Ministers must put forth powerful efforts to counterpoise this evil.

A Young Men's Christian Association has been recently organized in this place—Professor Lupton, of the Southern University, being the President. It bids fair to accomplish much good. In addition to lectures, debates, essays, and the like, the members are to engage in benevolent operations in the community, befriending strangers, attending the sick, &c. The opening lecture was delivered last night by the Rev. Dr. W. M. Wightman. It was a magnificent affair—on a magnificent subject—the Bible. The discourse was pervaded by a pure philosophy, and was a fine specimen of oratorical eloquence. I hope it will be published, and receive a wide circulation.

The Doctor, as you know, is Chancellor of the Southern University, located at Greensboro. This institution is resuscitated, and is now in successful operation. Dr. Wightman has associated with him Professors Wadsworth, Wills, Lupton and Casey, who constitute a very able and laborious faculty. The University is well supplied with apparatus and libraries, including those belonging to the Societies. The second term of the session begins in the middle of this month, so that this is a favorable time for students to matriculate. The expenses for tuition and board are remarkably low. There are excellent boarding-houses in the town so that students will not be embarrassed on that score. Several of the students are preparing for the ministry, under Dr. Wightman, who fills the chair of Biblical Literature. We have organized a (Methodist) Class among the students, from which we anticipate good results. One of the clerical students is the Leader.—Two of the young men have recently joined on probation, and several by certificate. Special attention will be paid to the spiritual interests of the students, and we shall labor to send them all home imbued with the spirit of piety, to fulfil the mission for which they were sent into the world. Parents and guardians will do well to send their sons and wards to the Southern University.

There is a Preparatory Department also in successful operation—not in the University buildings.—The Principal of this Department is Professor Alfred H. Hutchinson, an excellent scholar and "apt to teach." I am happy to say that Professor H. has to a good extent recovered the use of his arm, which was severely wounded in the war, and which the surgeon, I believe, wished to amputate. Also from the effects of his cruel treatment in a northern prison. His department is expected to prove an excellent feeder of the University.

I wish you would call the attention of ministers and others to the following resolutions, adopted at the late session of the Mobile Conference, requesting prompt attention to them, and asking editors of papers within our bounds to give them a place in their columns, it being so difficult to circulate ecclesiastical intelligence.

"Resolved, That the first Friday in March be observed as a day of fasting and prayer for the prosperity of the work of God in our Connection, and especially for the divine blessing on the approaching session of the General Assembly.

"Resolved, That collections be taken up in all our congregations in February and March, to defray the expenses of our Delegates to the next General Conference, and that the money thus collected be paid over to the nearest Delegate.

"Resolved, That if there should be an excess of contributions for this purpose, it shall be paid over to the Joint Board of Finance at the next session of the Conference."

Unless prompt measures be adopted in regard to these collections, there will be no excess, but deficit, as the expenses of traveling are now very considerable.

I presume you have received copies of the Minutes of the Mobile Conference. You have seen that the Conference was unanimous in the adoption of the Report on Changes of Economy. The Committee on that subject was appointed at the previous session, so that the Report was not extemporized, but elaborated with great care. From the tone and tenor of the published proceedings of our several Annual Conferences, I anticipate the engrafting of these changes in the Discipline at the approaching session of the General Conference. It would, perhaps, be well to publish that Report in the Advocate, so that if there be anything wrong in it, we may be advised of it before the session of the Conference. The clause which refers to the stationing of ministers will perhaps elicit discussion, which I should be glad to see. The proposed amendment finds favor in high quarters, but it does not exactly suit me, though I do not know what better to recommend.

A great many of us preachers preach nearly all we know in the course of a twelvemonth, so that, in such cases, it seems useless to talk about the extension of the pastorate. However, I am not afraid to increase the prerogatives of the Bishops in this matter, especially if you increase the number of those important functionaries. If we are to have nothing but Moderators of Conferences, the fewer the better; but give us a Bishop to every Conference, and make him supervise the entire work, I am mistaken if Methodism will not begin a new and glorious dispensation in this country.

The injuries and insults heaped upon us by the Northern Church, have had their natural results—to bind us more closely together, and to stimulate us to renewed zeal in the Master's work. Let us be careful that they do not excite us to return evil for evil, and railing for railing, but contrariwise, blessing. O for a more copious baptism of the spirit of love, and of power, and of a sound mind! We want more earnestness, devotion, self-sacrifice—in a word, a faithful observance of our baptismal and ordination vows.

I hope you have received and published the resolutions of the Trustees and Faculty of the Southern University on the death of that prince in Israel, Robert A. Baker.—If not, please copy from the Southern Christian Advocate of January 19.

CALCULATION TO THINK ON.—In New York city there are 15,000 dramshops and 300,000 drinkers, each drinking two gills of liquor per day—300,000 barrels a year. This quantity would make a reservoir 900 feet long, 50 feet wide and 63 feet deep, and could float four large ships in full sail.

At sixty dollars per barrel this liquor amounts to $18,000,000. Out of 700 cases tried before the Court of Sessions last year, not more than 94 were sober when arrested. Paupers in city cost $4,000,000 a year.

NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

A Branch of the Methodist Publishing House is located in this city, and the Rev. R. J. Harp has recently been appointed Agent of it. It has on hand a good supply of our Church Publications—a large one of Hymn Books.

The well known enterprise and industry of the Agent is the best assurance that can be given that all orders will be promptly and correctly filled. The Express Companies for a trifle will insure the safe delivery of any books which our friends in the country may order.—Address Rev. R. J. Harp, New Orleans, No. 112 Camp street.

INFORMATION.

We have evidence abundant, that in many parts of the South-west our people are disheartened, and take gloomy views of the present and future condition of the Church.—Persons come into our office every day, who are quite amazed to hear that every Advocate in the Church South is fairly at work again—to hear that there are extensive revivals of religion reported as now going on in North Alabama, Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia; that our members are compacted together by the common trouble, and by the persecution they are undergoing in many parts of the country—in Missouri, and in the Valley of Virginia, for instance, where the attempt is made to deprive them of their own pulpits, or to prevent the preaching of all who have been identified with the Southern cause in the late struggle.

A little information scattered among the people will greatly aid the preacher in his labors. Our people must become informed of the real status of Southern Methodism, before they can resume their wonted hopefulness. To accomplish this, we are doing all in our power to send out a paper, which shall present all the facts which can be gathered, and all the religions intelligence from the many fields of our Zion. Will the preachers in charge of Circuits and Stations aid us in getting these facts before the people?

HEAVY ORDNANCE.—We are happy in being able this week to present the readers of the Advocate with communications from some of the best thinkers and writers in our Church. They will readily recognize our Montgomery correspondent, and we have only to add, that the Rev. Dr. Marvin is stationed at Marshall, Texas.

SERVICES ON SABBATH.—Rev. Dr. W. H. Watkins will preach in Moreau street Church, at 11 o'clock, and the Rev. Chas. K. Marshall will preach in Carondelet street Church at the same hour.

The death of Liew-Seen-Sang, the first convert of our China Mission, is announced. He died in peace, leaving a good [illegible]

"WHITED SEPULCHRES."

In a long article of argument and explanation, Dr. Newman attempts to make good his former statement, that in November last "the white trustees holding colored churches, together with the Rev. Dr. Keener, were required to, and did sign a relinquishment to that effect, that if the members of said churches desired to connect themselves with another organization, they would agree to the change." This he endeavored to prove by a document written two days after the order of the Commanding General, which restored all the churches excepting the colored—but in quoting the document took care to leave out its date.—An order just published, dated the 7th February, which requires our trustees to transfer their vested rights to the colored trustees of some other church, presents additional evidence that no such relinquishment had been signed.

Dr. Newman, moreover, gives the report of the arbitrators, and inserts exactly one half of it, no more.—He speaks of a communication in regard to the colored churches as coming from "a white trustee;" whereas the brother is not a trustee at all of a colored church—though he is a white man and a trustee.—He publishes a paper purporting to be signed by a number of colored persons, which states that Soule Chapel was built by the colored people. Whereas it is notorious that the colored people never contributed a cent to its building. It was built by Rev. J. Bowles and others, members of Poydras street Church, for a white chapel. The Rev. Stephen J. Davies was stationed at it the first year, in 1847, over a white charge, and the debt remaining on it was collected by ourself in 1849; and the colored people were then first permitted to occupy it wholly. After all this twisting and turning, the Doctor winds up in the following unctuous style:

"And now let our neighbor suffer the word of exhortation. These are not the times for Church controversies, but for mighty, constant action for the salvation of a lost world."

After he has endeavored to seize and possess himself of all the Southern Methodist Churches in this city, and elsewhere, and has been defeated; and while still doing all that he can to "scatter, tear and slay," he asks us to "suffer the word of exhortation."

Having suffered a good deal at his hands, we beg to be spared this much. There is absolutely a refinement of cruelty, after all his other inflictions, in his reserving an exhortation for the last. Alas for us! We had hoped to escape this bitterness—the pious exhortation of a church-seizing agent. Here we have an individual, who is ready to lend himself to any agency, and furnish an exhortation: important enough in himself, but vastly more so as the representative of an immense body of men, who have the form of Godliness," and are seeking the power of Earth. Who, now that the war is over, and the good men of both North and South are trying to allay the irritation of the public mind, are found still invading the most sacred rights of the people, seizing both the gifts on the altar and their altars, fomenting discord, uneasiness, and strife among the churches. Engaged in the work of the Adversary, if not possessing his spirit, they cover their nefarious designs by assuring us, that "these are not times for church controversy."

It is natural to yield our respect for the religious element in whomever and wherever it discovers itself. When it is exhibited amid scenes and surroundings which are known to be unfavorable to a devotional state of mind, this respect increases to something like awe for the person who is so raised above the common weakness of man, and the people have always accorded more or less reverence for the display of piety, even when there was good ground for suspecting that a good deal of earth was mixed with the heavenly ingredients.—The coffee-sack hood and garment of the Franciscan beggar, in the streets of Padua, never fails to elicit a degree of consideration, along with some cold scraps. The Pharisees, in the time of the Saviour, challenged the admiration of the multitude by their fine, textured, flowing robes, edged and decked with solemn words and verses taken out of the Hebrew Bible. In all these cases the world stands off, doubting somewhat, but on the whole allowing such claims to sanctity; preferring to refer the whole thing to the judgment of Him before whom the act, whether pretended or real, transpires in full view.

It was, therefore, with amazement that the crowds from Jerusalem heard the Baptist declaiming against the most holy-looking persons in the world, as a "generation of vipers." And it is not improbable that one of the more immediate causes of the arrest and prosecution of Christ, is to be found in his exposure of these influential religionists: "Wo unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them."

When men get their consent to introduce religious words and appearances, while committing actions which manifestly violate the common laws of peace, honesty and truth, then wickedness receives its highest expression. The climactric quality of Herod's bad character consisted in his affected piety—when he heard John, "he did many things"—deeds of charity—"and heard him gladly." For a single moment the disciples must have felt themselves justly rebuked, when Judas refused his countenance to an extravagance, which, though in some sort it ministered to the Master, and to the pleasure of the company, yet manifestly robbed the poor. We can imagine how they "suffered that word of exhortation," characterized as it would seem, by such utter abnegation of self, and the purest charity.

We must not therefore permit ourselves to be either surprised or blinded by the sanctity and manner, or the godly speeches which, at the present day, may be found accompanying actions and sentiments that are only indicative of the worst passions and qualities of fallen nature. If a man carries about with him pious exclamations, and gives them out on occasion, as those two Chaplains of Gen. Banks' army distributed dried apples from their pockets to the children at the parsonage, we must not therefore suppose him to be overflowing with love for the human family nor; conclude that the statue-like calmness with which those same ghostly ministers afterwards regarded the burning of that same parsonage and the church, proceeded from the religious element.

It seems very uncharitable to trace a wicked deed to its source, when its author is perceived to be standing in the Holy places. But how shall we characterize that rapacity of Northern Bishops and ministers which seizes and holds everything, from a candlestick to a church, under the plea of defeating rebellion? Which attempts to gain and keep possession of churches long after the war has ceased; which in one State seeks to drive people into church-fellowship by occupying their places of worship; and in another, endeavors to possess whole districts of country by turning out of doors congregations and pastors from scores of houses which they had built, and where they have worshipped for fifty years?

It does appear to us that if such men think, by sanctimonious seeming to hide from the people of this country their real character and spirit, they have reckoned without their host. There must come a day of terrible investigation and retribution for all such religionists; and the time has already come, when all men who sincerely desire the peace of the country, and love the cause of our holy religion, "should withstand them to the face, and give no place to them—no, not for an hour."

CENTENARY COLLEGE.

This Institution, situated at Jackson, Louisiana, is in full operation. The buildings, which are probably the best college-buildings in the South, escaped the general destruction of the war.

It has at present over fifty students. Its endowment fund has not been repudiated, after the style of another famous Louisiana College, of which we wot—nor has such a thing been ever thought of, though possibly the losses and hardships of the war have pressed as sorely upon the funds of Centenary as upon others.

Professors Patton, Miller and Wiley are hard at work, with the energy and self-denial which have so largely characterized the educators of our Church.

This moment, taking all things into the account, we do not know of a better prospect for the establishment of a first-class Methodist College—complete in all the appointments of a Literary Institution.—Its friends are everywhere, throughout Mississippi and Louisiana. It has but little competition. It has been long established, and it is conveniently located for the whole South-west.

Our preachers and our people must rally to its support. It is one of the elements positively essential to the success of Southern Methodism, within the bounds of these two Conferences. Experience and the past have demonstrated the folly of diffusing our educational zeal over the surface of two or three Universities. If we sustain one, we shall do well. We hope the day has past when any man will be permitted to locate a church just to suit his own convenience, or any self-constituted committee be countenanced in an attempt to make the whole church responsible for ill-advised enterprises in any direction; more especially in the matter of schools and colleges. The Church ought not to suffer itself to be involved, implicated, or pledged, by good meaning, but inexperienced friends. A good intention may do as much damage as a bad one, if it be not guided by wise counsel.—The amount which any section of country can contribute to a great enterprise, like that of establishing a college, bears a very small proportion to the whole sum which must eventually be expended upon it. The Church represents all sections interested, and a period stretching far beyond the lifetime of those who begin the work, and an influence which has been gathered from the labors of many wise, earnest, godly ministers and laymen, gathered slowly, it may be, and with immense toil; this is her own possession and influence, and she has a right to protect herself and her friends in its use; and not permit this immense power for good to be dissipated, damaged by the experiments of enterprising individuals.

The power of a University gathers slowly—no faster than the moss upon its stone-buildings. Departed generations must be seen walking in its cloisters and chapels, in the memory of the past; and venerable men, who still live in its halls, must, in our imagination, mingle with those who have lived, before we can realize the true idea of all that a College is, can, and should be.

THE FIRST CENTENARY MEETING of the Northern Methodists was held on the evening of January 25, in St. Paul's Church, 4th Avenue, New York. Secretary Harlan, of Iowa, Secretary of the Interior, presided. Addresses by the Secretary, Bishops Jones and Simpson and the Rev. Dr. McClintock. We extract from his speech—

HEROISM OF THE OLD PREACHERS.

Mr. President—The history of our post is full of its heroes—full of its martyrs. We have them, and they are the early Methodist preachers of our history. Stevens will tell you of them in his book, "The Centenary of Methodism," which I hope you will all read. All the elements of romance are gathered there. What are those elements? Daring, personal courage, the spirit of adventure, boldness in facing peril, strange incidents, odd occasions and situations—all these you will find in the history of early Methodism, tracked all along it. I say you shall find the gravestones of our heroes. Oh, what wonderful preachers they were, those early Methodists! I am speaking of them now simply as preachers, not as theologians, but as orators. I am not an old man, though I am superannuated. I am young, and yet am old enough to remember the eloquence of some of the men who almost began Methodism in this country. Stevens calls them, in his book, "the thundering legion of the Church of God," and well he may. They were orators of God, whose sermons were thunders, which, when once let loose into the moral atmosphere of the world, have vibrated there ever since, and shall continue to vibrate there to the last syllable of recorded time—nay, sir, they shall go on, propagated into the eternal harmonies of the last triumphant song before the throne of God, when the voices of all the redeemed that have gone up from the earth shall join with the voices and the trumpets of heaven in the final Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! God grant that we may be all there to hear them! ("Amen" from all parts of the house.) We are commemorating the memory of those men, and we are trying to perpetuate this work. We want to have Methodist preachers, as the Bishop told us, thunderers, and yet polished and powerful. A Methodist layman said, (speaking not of our schools, colleges and theological seminaries) "I want my children educated in the Methodist Church, and I want them taught by a Methodist minister, and I want them to look up to that minister as I look up to mine." Your children cannot get inspiration from your preachers unless they are educated. That is the whole thing in a nutshell. I cannot add anything to it, or take away anything from it.

THE DISTINCTIVE FEATURE OF METHODISM.

I have made a little exposition of Methodism, but I see it will be too long to present it in full. I sum it all up in one or two sentences. As to its theology, it takes the old theology of the Christian Church, but it takes one element which no other Christian Church has dared to put forward as a prominent feature of theology. In ours, it is the very point from which we view all theology. Now listen; I want that to be understood. Knowing exactly what I say, and taking the full responsibility of it, I repeat, we are the only Church in history, from the Apostles' time until now, that has put forward as its very elemental thought—the great central, pervading idea of the whole Book of God, from the beginning to the end—the holiness of the human soul, heart, mind and will. Go through all the Confessions of all the Churches, and you will find this in no other. You will find even some of them that blame us in their books and writings.

It may be called fanaticism, but, dear friends, that is our mission.—If we keep to that, the next century is ours; if we keep to that, the triumphs of the next century shall throw those that are past far in the shade.

METHODISM AND THE APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.

Our Methodism, as it stands, is a perpetual protest against an idea which has been the curse of the Church of God for many generations—namely, that the Church of God is to be propagated, not by the succession of truth, nor by the succession of churches, and ministers in the Church, but by a succession—which is simply and purely a material and tactual one—of a certain class of officers in the Church. I say that our Church is a perpetual protest against that perversion of the apostolic idea. Now, when you read books which tell you that there can be no church without a Bishop, in the sense of a prelate—(we have Bishops, and thank God that we have them, but they will tell you, that so far as order and rank in the Church of God are concerned, they are like their brother presbyters)—whenever you read books—and many of them have a great array of learning, of acuteness, and of logic—trying to bring you over to that notion of the Apostolic succession, which some of the wisest and best men in the Church of England already discard—just fall back upon this thought: "If this thing be true, how is Methodism to be explained? How are such phenomena as this to be explained?" Here is a Church with a million of members—nearly two millions, if you take in the whole range of Methodism, north, south, east and west—and nobody, not even the most bigoted High Churchman or Catholic, can deny that here are multitudes of powerful, aggressive, energetic Christians. How are you to explain the existence of this Church on that theory? It was founded by no Bishop, nor by any missionary sent forth by any hierarchy; but it was founded by a poor wandering Irishman; as if God had determined to choose the weak things of this world to confound the mighty. Hold fast this; put your faith in the true apostolic succession of the Church of God, of godly preaching, and of the administration of the sacraments, and whenever a man attacks you about any other, as being necessary for the true Church, tell him to explain this vast phenomena; circling the world, as it does now, without an apostolic succession of that sort, but with the other, thank God, that can never be taken from us.

CONCLUSION.

And now I want to address St. Paul's for a moment. I cannot say how much your proportion is of the wealth of which Secretary Harlan has spoken. I am safe in saying that there is no church in the whole of our Methodism that has more of it concentrated, and that a great portion of the responsibility of the pecuniary success of our Centenary Celebration devolves upon you.—Think of it and work it into your consciences during the next few months. I think it right to say that one of your members has set you a noble example. I pray that Daniel Drew's life may be spared to see the erection of a theological seminary, to which he has consecrated a quarter of a million of dollars, and to which he will give as much more before it is finished.

CONDOVA AND MEXICO.—As several letters have been received by us, asking information in regard to sailing of vessels for Mexico, we state that a few weeks ago a vessel was to have sailed from this point with 70 passengers for a Mexican port, but was stopped by an order from Gen. Sheridan. Cause unknown. We advise friends to wait awhile.

In this connection we clip the following from a New York paper, dated Feb. 1:

Dispatches from Washington say it is rumored that the Government is about to temporarily revoke the proclamation issued some months ago, wherein emigrants were allowed to proceed to Mexico and carry arms for their individual protection. In so far as the Gulf Department is concerned, the revocation has already taken place, and will be made to apply to Northern and Pacific ports as well, should it be found necessary.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

"THE WORD WAS GOD—AND THE WORD WAS MADE FLESH."

Christ "was made of a woman." This was according to the first prediction, the first promise, the seed of the woman shall bruise thy (Satan's) head. St. Matthew and St. Luke prove from the public genealogical tables, that Christ Jesus the Lord, through David and Abraham, was descended from Adam and born of a virgin.

The Saviour's advent was, like his two-fold nature, glorious and humble. A star in the East appeared to point out and shine upon the place of his birth. Wise men came with gifts and offerings to pay their adorations at his feet; an angelic host thronged the midnight skies, eclipsing with "the glory that shone around," the splendor of the starry host, and to the awe-struck and wondering shepherds, who were sore afraid, sung the Saviour's natal song, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and good will to men." Imperial Cæsar issues his decree. Such was the unprecedented glory of his birth! Mary and Joseph repair to the obscure village of Bethlehem to be taxed; there is no room for them in the inn; they shelter in a stable, and sleep in a manger, and the Son of God, the son of Mary, was born among the horned cattle of the stall. Such the humiliation of his birth!

He was made of a woman, for he was "a young child," a babe; he grew in stature and in wisdom. At the age of twelve he is in the Temple, sitting in the midst of the Doctors, both hearing them and asking questions. Many years he lived in unrecorded privacy; became a carpenter. He hungered and ate, thirsted and drank, dressed and slept, toiled and was weary as other men. When he began to be about thirty years old he entered upon the career of his public ministry.

During these eventful and illustrious years he wept, he rejoiced, he suffered and died. In short, did a thousand things to attest, beyond a doubt, that he was "made of a woman, and took on not the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham."

Why was the Messiah a man as well as God? Why did he take on him our nature? To redeem us.—He was God, took our nature, was made flesh—statements indicating, as plain as words can, that he had an existence prior to his manifestation in the flesh. Those who deny his divinity, and insist that he was only some superangelic being, do not escape the difficulty and mystery of the Incarnation. It is as difficult—indeed it appears more difficult for any creature to assume our nature, than for God, All-wise and All-powerful, to do so.

It was only as man that the Messiah could suffer, could pour out his blood and die. Yet we read that "without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin;" therefore it was that "he died, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God;" and "by one offering hath perfected forever them that are sanctified." As the Eternal Spirit, God over all, Christ had no blood to shed. He could not come under the law, and be tempted in all points like as we are; but all this was necessary to the character of the Saviour of sinners.

The Saviour was a man to give a personal exemplification of the holy and sublime religion he taught.—Had he not exemplified the high standard of moral character which he enjoined, men would have declared its attainment and exhibition impossible, and with one consent would have begun to make excuse and say, "I pray thee have me excused."

Christ came as a man, not of wealth and state; this would have excited selfishness, pride and ambition, and the world would have realized no moral and spiritual benefit by his coming. Nor as a philosopher and scholar; this would have put him out of sympathy with the millions; the poor and unlettered would have felt that his was an example forever beyond their imitation. Christ so came to us as to teach humility and self-denial, and to place himself in broadest sympathy with men, who, taken as a whole, have never been learned, rich nor great.

Christ was a man, that he might be a High Priest, touched with the feeling of our infirmities. He was tempted in all points like as we are. He passed through sorrows such as we pass through. "He was made perfect through sufferings." He knows what sore temptations, sore afflictions mean; he has felt the same. The sad and the weary may come to Jesus, and find comfort and rest. He gently whispers in our ears, as we go bowed down and fainting under our burden, "Cast your care upon me, I will sustain you."

Christ came as a man, to triumph in our nature, over Satan, who had tempted and ruined our nature.—Christ was manifested to destroy the works of the Devil. In our nature he atoned for sin, rose from the dead, became the first-fruits of them that slept; a pledge that we, too, shall rise.

Christ came as a man, that he might honor human nature by uniting it to God; making man the son and the heir of God. Thus the nature so debased by sin is raised to newness of life, is glorified by eternal companionship with God, and placed in the paths of a career as glorious as it shall be endless. W.

COLUMBUS—BRO. BALDWIN.

An old and esteemed friend—a friend of our Zion and of our paper, writes us the following letter:

CARONDELET STREET, N. O.

Dear Brother W.—I have enjoyed the pleasure of reading several numbers of your Advocate, and was exceedingly charmed with the pure and independent tone which pervaded every sentence; and as its rich and beautiful sentiments reach and mingle in the social circle that gather around so many firesides, I hope you will permit a stranger in your metropolis to express real joy that its fruitful pages will come again—now that our skies are brightening—carry to thousands the precious seeds of salvation.

I came to your city with a deep burdened heart, caused by the bereavement; and I can truly say that I have many times been comforted by meeting in the class-room with those whose hearts were deeply imbued with piety, and were willing to drop the kindly tear of sympathy, and lend a smile of encouragement to the stranger sojourning an asylum of faith and love. I am sure over such scenes of charity the ministering angels from Heaven delight to linger, and bestow the benison of mercy.

Your voice in the sacred desk calls up many sad but sweet recollections of our sainted Bro. Leavell, of Jackson, Mississippi, who has for so many years been chanting the praises of God in Heaven, with many others who were equally dear.

Writing of Bro. L. only serves to recall the recent departure of Bro. Edwin Baldwin. His name is embalmed in my grateful soul as a precious memory. Another tree of righteousness, of fairest and loftiest growth, has been transplanted to a more genial clime. I often felt, while listening to his glorious preaching, when he seemed borne into the highest heaven of imagery and lofty sentiment, that he was soaring in the upper fields of sublimity, where God and angels dwell: his silver voice falling so softly upon the enraptured ear, and he, catching some pathetic inspiration from the eyes of his audience, would rise higher and still higher, bearing their hearts and imaginations with him into the very vestibule of Heaven. Your warmest sympathies would become enlisted when you gazed upon his fragile form; his pale, school-boy face lighted up so radiantly, with his beaming eyes. O! I do feel that a brilliant star has been suddenly snatched from the horizon of our ministry, but many souls will shine as jewels in his crown of rejoicing. He preached for us in Columbus two years, and never did I know him come short of interest or success.

His noble spirit battled and suffered deeply for our Church, and we will but wait patiently upon the revelations of the future, we may yet see that our Father is but purifying us, as we pass through the burning crucible for a glorious work—to become a peculiar people, zealous for the kingdom of our Saviour. Like the chamomile plant, the more it is trampled upon, the more it flourishes and sends out its fragrance.

Yes, truth and love shall triumph, and the song swell up on every tongue—"The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth—let the earth be glad."

Our class-meetings in Columbus give glad evidences of a revival spirit; likewise our Sabbath School. Our noble Superintendants, Judge Brown and Dr. Lipscomb, take the deepest interest in training the young, and our good Bro. Shaffer, though in declining health, is with us, to offer his earnest supplications in a faith I scarcely ever saw equalled. I used to feel that his invocations did much to protect us against the raids we often dreaded so fearfully, for several times we heard the boom of artillery, yet an unseen hand shielded our favored little city.

Our handsome church was, during the war, in its unfinished state, appropriated to ordnance purposes, and though the fortunes of the generous people have been so reduced, I trust very soon it will be completed, and made to reverberate with hosannas to God. But we love our old church very dearly, because it we have so often witnessed the most powerful revivals.

I send you five dollars, and will recommend your enterprising paper to all who profess to love pure literature and the spread of the Gospel of peace.

I hope you will dedicate a column soon to Perfect Love. We need eminent Christians; and unless our standard is raised high, we cannot expect elevated examples of piety and Christian excellence.

THE NEW AMENDMENT.

The object had in view by the advocates of the representation amendment, is evidently to curtail the power of the South. Under the Constitution, as the law now stands, the basis of representation is the whole number of free persons and three-fifths of all others. This gave the slave holding States a representation of all their free persons, and about 2,400,000 in addition thereto—assuming the slave population to number 4,000,000. Now that slaves have become free persons they are all counted, so that the South will have 1,600,000 persons added to their representative numbers, which, under the present ratio, would give them thirteen more members than they had before. The opinion has been expressed that one-fifth of the entire negro race have perished during the four years of the war. It is said that this is under, rather than over, the estimate of Gen. Grant, and the experience on the coast of South Carolina certainly bears it out. If this is so, they would lose six members from this cause, so that their clear gain in representation from the abolition of slavery would be but seven.

To prevent this political gain, Congress has passed the amendment proposing to make the voting population the basis of representation; and in order to effect that change in the Constitution, will resort to the revolutionary doctrine of State suicide, for the purpose of guarding against the certainty of the votes of the Southern States being thrown against, and thereby defeating this and other amendments.

The blow which is thus struck at the political power of the South, falls most heavily upon sections of the North, and hence we find among the speeches of Congress, not less than fifty from professed Republicans, against the amendment. The larger number of these opposed it, because the adoption of the amendment would be a virtual acknowledgement that a State could restrict sufrrage to a particular class. Hence we find Mr. Sumner, of the Senate, has declined not to waive this objection, as did the members of the House; but will propose a substitute for it, a series of resolutions based upon the declaration of Independence and the second section of the abolition amendment.

Members from Missouri opposed the motion because that State had disfranchised three-fourths of her population on account of Southern sympathy, and the amendment would cut down her representation to three or four members. If Brownlow could be heard, he would, doubtless, oppose it on the same grounds, for Tennessee. The members from New England were inclined to oppose it, because the voting population is much smaller in that section, compared with the whole number of inhabitants, than any other. Notwithstanding the opposition of these fifty-odd "Union" men, they were all successfully whipped into the ranks by Stevens; and voted "put" against the interests of their constituents. In this vote, in many others, they represented the negroes of the sea-islands, and not the people who sent them to Congress.

The upshot of the whole matter will be that the proposed amendment will probably not even receive the votes of three-fourths of the Northern States. If, however, the present Legislature of those States set upon regardless of the wishes of their constituents, such a course will inevitably strengthen the hands of the Democrats and Conservatives, and swell the ranks of that Constitutional Party, which, so certain as the years roll around, will wrest the power of Government from the hands of the nigger-worshippers.—Montgomery Mail, 10th.

WASHINGTON AND NEW YORK NEWS.

From our latest exchanges, we make the following extracts:

NEW YORK, Feb. 3.—The World's special says the House Military Committee are about equally divided under the question of making the grade of Generals a part of the regular army, and not a temporary matter; that the event of the death of Gen. Grant, or other meritorious officer may be appointed to the place. It probably will be acted in that form.

The Times' Washington special says the proposed by the Commissioner of Customs and the convention of frontier collectors and custom officers to prevent smuggling, is now in the hands of Secretary McCulloch for examination and approval. The Secretary will probably send the proposition to Congress on Monday next, and argue its immediate passage; in the meantime Commissioner Sargent is receiving information of the new evasions of the revenue laws and of fresh instances of smuggling from Canada.

Detective Baker was not sentenced yesterday as was expected on the indictment for false imprisonment of Mrs. Cobb. There are three other indictments against him for perjury, false imprisonment and extortion, which he will be tried within the next few weeks.

NEW YORK, Feb. 3.—The Tribune's Washington special says that Mr. Nicholas Smith is nominated Minister to Greece. At the breaking out of the war he was a Captain in the 19th regulars; and was sent to Louisville to recruit his company. He became engaged to be married, but the marriage was delayed because the lady would not marry one engaged in fighting her country. He resigned his Captaincy and was married; and, as a civilian, is now nominated as a Minister to Greece.

Nothing official has been received at the Navy Yard in relation to the United States steamer Narcissus, reported to have been lost on Edgmont Key, Florida.

The steamship Jessamine left Pensacola about the time it is reported that the Narcissus and it is probable that the Jessamine is the unfortunate vessel. Nothing definite is, however, known in reintion to the matter.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—The Senate bill, enlarging the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau was considered to-day. Mr. Marshall, of Illinois, spoke against the bill, urging that there was no power in the Constitution to establish the Bureau.

The professed object was to look after and take care of the race which has been recently released from bondage, and this involved expenditures of untold millions of dollars. It denied that the Federal Government can borrow the almoner of the people, and also denied that Congress could put their hands into the pockets of the people and indemnify laborers, and rob them of their hard earnings to disburse money among those who may need. He denied that the Federal Government was established for any such purpose, and further, that there was no military or warrant in the Constitution for such action on the part of Congress.

Mr. Spalding, of Ohio, introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, providing for the repair and improvement of the harbors of Cleveland and Port of Lake Erie, till reported by Mr. Stevens, from the Committee on Appropriations, making appropriations for legislative, executive and judicials, and departments of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, was made a special order for to-day.

The House passed a bill providing that persons in the naval service of the United States who have lost one foot and one hand since their entry of their duty, shall be allowed the same pension as is allowed by law to persons in the military service who have received similar losses; also that the provisions of section 5 of the pension law of July 4, 1864, shall apply to persons in the naval service.

The term "military" in the former law was construed not to mean persons in the naval service.

The design of this bill is to equalize the pension law.

The Washington correspondent of the Republican Banner, under the date of the 1st, writes as follows:

Mr. Raymond is believed to have spoken for the President; Importance is therefore attached to every word he uttered. In it the speech is creditable, expressing the best exposition yet made of Conservative Republicanism. His summing up is distinct and lucid—to accept the status of the South as it is; to admit the Southern Representatives by districts, deciding on each particular claim according to its own merit, and loyalty of the person asking admission; to provide for the equality of the negroes before the law; to exclude the prominent leaders of the rebellion from office; to pass such amendments to the Constitution as the future may point out. Raymond is a little, nervous man; rather good looking; very well read; quite the gentleman in a small way; aged about forty-four, of course, ambitious. As a writer, fluent and graceful, but not versatile; as a speaker, he is shrill, fastidious and dull. With the influence of his position, as one of a great New York daily, as a member of Congress, and as the friend and organ of the President, he is the observed of all observers, dividing the honors of the galleries with Thaddeus Stevens. He is not unlike Vallandingham in many respects; but he lacks Val.'s perseverance, cunning and grit. He aspires to introduce the English idea of a statesman, and models himself after Gladstone.

THE WICKET GATE.—The wicket gate, as you very appropriately style the door to Congress, still remains as fast and tight as it was the first day of the meeting of the two houses. I met Ed. Cooper a day or two ago, and found him less hopeful than when I saw him last. Our Tennessee delegation have some faint expectation of getting in as an exceptional case, and I think that somewhere towards the close of the session they will succeed. They of themselves cannot effect the Radical strength; to admit them would, it is thought, set the President right before the world and satisfy the country; and as they are for the most part persons of such undisputed loyalty, the objections to keeping them in the cold seem puerile and groundless. Still they will have to wait. The other Southern States may rest assured that nothing will be done for them. Thaddeus has sworn it, and his word is law. He limps into the house every morning, blows his nose on a red silk handkerchief, and all his followers cluster around him and receive their commands for the day. They embrace nearly two thirds of the Representatives.

AFRICA AND ITS PEOPLE.

A HIGHLY INTERESTING LECTURE.

Du Chaillu, the distinguished explorer, addressed the Royal Geographical Society recently in London, when he related some of his wonderful stories of Africa. He said his object in visiting that country again was to study aboriginal nature, man, he his customs, superstitions, language and legends. He had little doubt that the Equatorial tribes, from west to east, came from one parent stock, and he founded this opinion partly on some natives' words of the east tribes, which he found quoted in Capt. Burton's book on Grant's journey. There was a long, low belt of country extending from west to east, always cloudy, although equatorial, and of a temperature very high, 98 deg. at 1 P. M.; and the minimum in July being from 60 to 64 deg. A striking circumstance was the decrease of the population, not attributable to the fire-water of the white man, but quite independent of the influence of the latter.

M. du Chaillu left London for Africa on the 5th August, 1863, and reached Fernandez river on the 9th October following. Here he unfortunately lost his scientific instruments, and nearly was lost himself, when he found himself at the head waters of the Okanda river. Although he had only five men and five boys, he felt that among that friendly and to him well-known tribe he was quite safe. He was well received by the King of the Ashira, who made love to both himself and his goods; and he was also beset with offers of marriage from a great many ladies, whom he found, since his former journey, had taken to some small use of raiment as increasing their personal attractions. In one of his journeys from the neighborhood he encountered some ten gorillas, among which (or whom?) was an old male, who exceeding frightened the traveller, he being without a gun. His followers, however, came up, and by shouts set the gorillas to flight. He therefore had to retract his former opinion that the gorilla was not gregarious. He had also found that a gorilla might be captured alive, as his negroes had actually captured one, with its young. With these exceptions he had nothing to retract about the gorilla that he had stated in his former book.

In the watersheds a little above Samba, on the Fernandez river, he had never seen such a terrible rush of water; in fact, the natives imagined that a spirit abided in these waters and caused the turmoil. Meantime a fierce and deadly plague of small pox had ravaged the Ashira country, and filled the whole land with wailing and sorrow. M. du Chaillu sent away his guide and followers, with much of his property, to save them. Others of them succumbed: the King Olamba, his friend, also died, and he was accused of killing him. He was then there alone, and felt extremely miserable and in continued fear, having to perform all the most menial offices for himself and his boys, who were down. The people looked upon him as the cause of the plague, and he departed for the Otando country. On the journey the supplies of food failed, and on the third day they had only three monkeys for eleven men, and they found them very good. The King of Otando fell ill, but recovered. He was a good fellow, and had plenty of common sense. He sent him (M. du Chaillu) plenty of food, cooked by his own wives. He (the traveller) did not much like this, not for fear of poison, but from what he knew of the custom called "alombi." This was the custom:

They cut off a great man's head, put it in a box with a composition of chalk, and as the head decomposed it mingled with the chalk. This mixture they give to any guest from whom they desire to receive gifts of kindness, under the impression that if he eats of their relatives' bones he becomes as one of themselves. In the Napono country, which lies to the south-east of the Otando country, the people were brave, all the men wore swords, and all were drunk from morning till night—their drink being distilled from the sugar cane, honey, the plantain, and the plane tree. The people were divided into clans, like the Scotch—the children following the mother's clan, and the nephew's or sister's son succeeding, instead of the direct descendant.

M. du Chaillu, speaking of a neighboring people, Ishango, showed some specimens of their palm fibre fabrics, which they wore as clothes, much better in quality than the cotton cloths which Manchester sends to Africa. They were very gentle people, and living among them, or in neighboring tribes, were tribes quite nomad, like gipsies, who lived much like the gipsies. Passing almost due eastward, and traversing another range of mountains, where it was always cloudy and rainy, they reached Monaco Kombe. Willing to leave on account of the rainy weather, they were still detained by the King, who said he thought himself made little of by their intended departure. The King received them, and promised, as he was a man of a true heart, that the travelers would be allowed to go on the next day. But in firing guns to amuse the court with the noise they made, a man was accidentally killed, and a great commotion and excitement was caused, and no palaver could be obtained to explain the circumstance. Things looked threatening, and M. du Chaillu ordered his men to retreat, which they did in good order; but some of them were wounded, as was also the leader of the expedition himself, by the murderous arrows shot at them.

Ultimately, however, a panic seized his followers, who cast away the precious articles they had to carry; he himself had dropped his sextant, in order to save the ammunition he bore. They had to fight their way from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M., to pass through the villages, and to repulse the pursuers five times during the day. They had eaten nothing since the day before. That night they passed in the forest. At midnight they got up, and with great caution proceeded to pass through the village lying before them, which they did without interruption. The chief met them, said he had heard of the accident, and told them they might move on, as he wanted no war with the white man. So they retraversed the path they had originally followed toward the coast. M. du Chaillu reached the coast, saving all his guns save one rifle, but he had still more guns than people. Here he took ship for England, but was nearly wrecked at the entrance of Dartmouth harbor. He had been in rags on leaving Africa, and on the voyage had to wear clothes lent to him. He reached London in clothes borrowed from the Captain, and with money borrowed from some of the passengers. In conclusion, M. du Chaillu expanded into a very warm and emotionate expression of thanks to Sir R. Murchison for his manifold kindness formerly and since. His spoils he had left upon the battle-field, but that was inevitable. To all his friends, he expressed his warm thanks, and he sat down amid great applause.

Professor Owen then spoke in support of the veracity of M. du Chaillu, remarking that all the statements for which he had been most attacked had been borne out by subsequent evidence. He had, for instance, made the unwelcome announcement that he had met with a race of cannibals. That statement had been called in question; but it had been confirmed by Capt. Burton, who had followed him over the district he had traversed. Then with respect to the gorillas, he felt sure that if M. du Chaillu had given any false account of their habits he should have found some traces of that falsehood in the knowledge he had been able to obtain of the conformation of these animals. He had not, however, the slightest reason to suppose that what had been said by M. du Chaillu on the subject was in the slightest respect untrue.

Mr. Dunkin, one of the assistants of the Greenwich Observatory, then came forward and stated that he had been astonished at the multitude and the accuracy of the astronomical observations which M. Du Chaillu had made.

Mr. J. Crawford, the chairman, said he felt it to be his duty to declare that he found it impossible to believe in the existence of a race of dwarfs which M. Du Chaillu stated he had met in Africa. These people, if the statement was correct, were smaller, than any human beings that had yet been known, and he could not understand how it was possible that they could live in the midst of other races, who appeared to speak the same language.

M. Du Chaillu observed that those people ran away when he approached them, and he had been able to examine only one or two of their number; but with respect to them, he had only to repeat facts as they came under his observation.

LETTER FROM MEXICO.

The following letter from Mexico is taken from the Petersburg Index, 1st inst.:

My Dear Sir—I remember meeting you in the street in Richmond, and that you asked me to write to you after I had looked around in Mexico, and let you know candidly the result of my observations and my opinions upon affairs here, from a "poor Confederate" point of view. I gladly seize the opportunity to do so, the more particularly because I hope that my views, as here expressed, may through you be disseminated among many of my dear friends in old Virginia, and that they may be induced seriously to think over the idea of emigrating and coming here.

The great difficulty with many is how to raise the money to get here. That alone has been removed out of the path of every one by the Imperial decree of September 5th, for the Government will pay your passage. But you may say, "What am I to do when I get there?" I answer, "Anything you choose, almost." True, you will not make your fortune in a week, but you will make expenses until you can look around and settle yourself.

There are many Confederates here, and all of them have or can get occupation, if they want it. In the first place, there are some ten or fifteen million of acres offered to colonists by various land-holders here at various rates, the least advantageous of which are as much land as you will take—the colonist furnishes the labor—the holder everything else—will lend you provisions till you make your own, and will furnish seed, stock, farming implements and everything, and divide equally the profits. Will also furnish flocks and herds for stock breeding, on the same terms. And then the yield of a spot of ground, farmed on Virginia principles, would be perfectly fabulous—indeed, there would scarcely be an end to the harvest. You may form an idea of what it would be from this fact: That land cultivated on the Mexican system of farming, (probably the most slovenly in the world, for they never touch the field after the seed is planted, except to harvest the crops,) yields from one to three or four hundred fold, and that, too, two, three and four times annually. Think of it, a bushel of corn yields four hundred bushels four times a year!

The productiveness of the country is certainly one of the seven wonders of the world. You know that it must be so, because nobody works and everybody lives. I know of a lady here who lives off the natural products of her farm. She is considered rich, too—she has not a hand on the place except an agent who sells the natural, spontaneous products of the ground or the spot; the buyers come for it, take it away and pay their money.

But there are other occupations here which will give a more immediate, though by no means so rich a reward. Gen. Magruder is at the head of the Mexican land office—the lands of Mexico never have been surveyed—he needs assistants every day, and pays from $50 to $150 a month. This you may imagine is an endless job. I don't know whether you are a surveyor, but if you or any one else who is will come out here you can't starve, particularly if you bring your instruments with you.

I am delighted with the whole country. It is certainly the most favored in the world, and most certainly the place for you and me, and all like us. What can we do in Virginia? People abroad have no idea what ever of Mexico—all their knowledge is obtained from Northern newspapers.

The country is far better settled than the United States. There are many robbers, it is true; but these always abound where the people make no resistance, but hand over quietly all they have, without a word. It is a notorious fact that the robbers never attack where they have any idea of meeting resistance.

There is no opposition whatever to the Government. The Liberals are more dead than the Confeds., and the Empire is gaining strength, popularity and support every day. It is the greatest mistake in the world to think that the Empire is not stable, popular and secure. I say to you what I would say to all my friends: Do what I have done; come to Mexico. If you should come before my agent is appointed in Richmond, who would give you transportation, I have authority for stating that your passage expenses will be refunded you on your arrival here. In the meantime, if you want any information, or if any one else does, let them write to me—"Office Colonization, Mexico"—and I will most cheerfully and gladly tell them what I can.

Gen. Price is getting a splendid settlement under way near Cordova, (a place that, before the darkies were set free, was the garden of Mexico, but since it has been entirely neglected,) where lands are given the emigrant by the Government.

Gov. Harris, of Tennessee, and Judge Perkins, of Louisiana, are with him.

Gens. Hardeman and Terry are doing likewise in Talisco, and there are others being established all around. Of course there is no limit to the size of these settlements—the more the better. If I only had forty good negroes here from Virginia, I could make my fortune in two years. I would not want more money than I could make in that time.

THE NORTH AND SOUTH.

The Richmond Whig, in a late and powerful article, draws the following contrast:

The North is prosperous—more prosperous, it is said, than it ever was before. Petroleum, war contracts, the market afforded during the war for its manufactures, and the products of the soil, all conspired to increase its wealth. Its canals, railroads, and all other works of internal improvement, are in perfect order. The domestic establishments, the equipages, the dress and appointments of the people, are all on a scale of elegance hitherto unknown. The hotels, restaurants, saloons, theatres—as, indeed, all places of accommodation and amusement—are luxurious and attractive to an extent that is surprising. Many of both sexes are tempted from the plainer pleasures of home to the countless places of amusement—some innocent, some guilty—with which the Northern cities are filled.

* * * * * *

The South is badly off, worse off by far than it ever was, or we trust than it ever will be again. It lost all it owned but its lands and homes, and many persons lost these. Its currency and securities, in which all its people were interested, perished in an hour. Its horses, cattle and poultry even were destroyed. Its farms were in many localities as effectually desolated as if an army of locusts had destroyed them. Its negroes to the value of two thousand millions of dollars, were set free. Its railroads and other public works were broken up. The elegant equipages that were seen before the war are no longer seen. The few that remain belong to strangers who have come among us, or to fancy men to whom a fine turn out is a sort of sign or advertisement. There is no display of dress and no attempt to follow the fashions. Dwelling houses look old and dilapidated. The furniture is defaced and broken. The places of amusement are for the most part closed, and the hotels are plain, modest and unpretending.

☞ Take your place modestly at life's Banquet, says Knickel, and ask for nothing not in the bill of fare.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF CAPE HAYTIEN.

Capt. Wake, of the British man-of-war Bulldog, was court-martialed for losing his vessel at Cape Haytien, several weeks ago, and reprimanded. Commenting thereon, the London Times remarks:

Of course, the two questions for the court-martial were, whether Capt. Wake was to blame for the grounding of his ship, and whether he afterward employed all possible means of getting her off before sacrificing her. The last is obviously a question for seamen, and the court-martial have decided against him, but few landsmen will be inclined to impugn the Captain's defense. The Bulldog was imbedded two feet deep for two-thirds of her length, in a bank of sand and errai; she was short of ammunition, provisions and coal; her boats were much disabled with shot, and her crew were too much fatigued even to go through the labor, probably useless, of lightening her in the night. In the meantime, she was threatened with an attack from the shore, and was certain to be exposed to a renewed fire in the morning, which, for want of ammunition, she would soon have been unable to return.

Assuming that he evinced no indiscretion in getting into such a predicament, he seems to have got out of it like a brave and resolute man, but we must candidly own that Captain Wake's six reasons for "taking upon himself the responsibility of vindicating the honor of the British flag" do not appear to us as conclusive as could be desired. "Refusing to allow an officer of the Bulldog to land on duty, and repelling his landing by an armed force," was an act of gross discourtesy, no doubt, and so was the notice given by General Salnave that Captain Wake himself should not be permitted to come on shore, on peril of his life; not to speak of "hoisting the red flag, and pointing guns at Her Majesty's ship Bulldog." Still graver outrages were the invasion of the British Consulate on two occasions by an armed force, and the seizure of political refugees there.

On the other hand, it must be a very extreme aggression which can make it proper for a naval officer, without instructions, to commence war against a de facto government. The Haythan rebels are, indeed, entitled to so little respect that we can hardly bring ourselves to respect them as a civilized nation; but the same zeal for the honor of his flag which prompted Capt. Wake to chastise Gen. Salnave and his followers, might compromise us very seriously if it were displayed against a great European Power. If one of her Majesty's ships be deliberately fired upon, or if violence be offered to her accredited representative, and no redress can be obtained, it may be right and necessary to enforce satisfaction on the spot, but in most cases it is far better to wait for orders from home.

While, however, as we entertain much doubt as to the regularity of Captain Wake's proceedings, but one opinion can exist as to the spirit which actuated him throughout. His fault, if it be one, is so entirely on the right side, that few of his countrymen will join in the "severe reprimand" which the court-martial has felt it its duty to administer. The courage which he showed in encountering, with a sloop of six guns, so many ships and batteries, of which the collective force must have greatly overmatched his own armament, and the humanity which led him to save the crew of the Voldrogue in his own boats, when he was himself in a position of the utmost difficulty, are worthy of the best days of our navy. He erred, indeed, as a diplomatist, but he more than repaired his error in his proper capacity of a naval officer.

NEGRO SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Constitutional Union, of a late date, in commenting on the recent action of Congress extending the right of suffrage to the negroes in the District of Columbia, and the course which is being pursued by the Radicals in reference to the freedmen in the Southern States, says:

It needs no prophetic vision to discern the future of our country, if the course now being pursued is continued. We find in our legislative halls no desire to "bind up the wounds" of our country and to advance its greatness; no disposition to promote domestic tranquility, but only a zest for such measures as tend to produce hate among brethren, and weaken the bonds of fraternal feeling which should animate the whole Nation.

The people of the adjoining States of Maryland and Virginia need laborers to till the soil, that it may bring forth its accustomed products. But they cannot get black labor. Why? There are forty thousand negroes in the district, the large majority of whom may be seen walking about in idleness, or sunning themselves in some sequestered nook, or huddled around some smoking faggots, receiving mutual warmth from each other. Why then will they not labor? Because the Government, through the Freedmen's Bureau, feeds, clothes, furnishes physicians, and coffins when they die, and as if that was not sufficient, sends a minister to pray them out of this world into another. They are supported here in their idleness, while fields lay waste where honest labor would be rewarded. Was there ever greater injustice than this? Hear it ye honest sons of toil (unfortunately white) who labor daily to earn a support for yourselves and families; hear it ye laboring millions who pay enormous and grinding taxes for the support of idleness and fostering of vice. Will you longer endure these things? Will you support and countenance it by voting for the men who pass appropriation bills for this purpose? If not, look you to it that these men never disgrace nor pollute our legislative halls again by their presence. Send only men who further the interests of the country and defend the purity of our institutions.

A PUBLIC APPEAL.—Rev. C. C. Pinckney, of Charleston, S. C., makes the following public appeal for the restoration of the plate of his Church, that was stolen at the time of the sacking and burning of Columbia, February, 1865:

CHARLESTON, S. C., Feb. 4, 1866.

Among the calamities which have befallen many of the churches in the past year, is the entire, or partial, loss of our church plate. My own church (Grace Church) had a full and handsome communion service, which was sent to Columbia for safety. It was lost in the sacking of that city by Sherman's army, on the 18th of February last. The communion plate of St. Michael's Church, Charleston, the gift of Queen Anne, and that of Trinity Church, Columbia, was stolen or destroyed in the fire on that occasion.

It has occurred to me that you might do something to aid us in the recovery of some, at least, of these sacred vessels, endeared to us by use and by so many religious associations. They have probably been offered for sale in the larger cities of the North. They may have fallen into the hands of some who are willing to restore them, on just terms, to their rightful owners. Each piece of plate of my church was distinctly marked "Grace Church, Charleston." The others were, I presume, in a like manner engraved with the names of their churches.

The record book of St. Michael's Church, more than one hundred years old, was carried off. It was seen in the hands of parties going North from Charleston. It was a valuable book. The members of the Church will be under obligations to you if you assist them to recover it.

Yours respectfully,

C. C. PINCKNEY.

THE SUBLIMITY OF LUCK.—We have often heard of men floating on the surface of events, and trusting in the sublimity of luck, but we never before heard of such sublime luck as recently befell a man in Idaho. He used to be an "honest miner" in California. After living in the mountains for several years, he shouldered his knapsack one day and struck out for Idaho. He arrived there last spring, and took up a quarter claim. A few days ago he sold the claim for $800,000 in gold coin of the realm.

☞ The line of the Russo-American telegraph is well advanced on both the American and Asiatic sides of the Pacific Ocean, and soundings which have been made in the Straits show excellent bottom on which to lay the sub-marine cable. Russian officials are giving every possible assistance, and Backley, the engineer-in-chief of the enterprise, is sanguine of the early completion of telegraphic communication by this route, between New York and all important points between Europe and Asia.

A CARD TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The following card, which appears in the New York Day Book, will be read with interest by many:

During the late civil war in the United States, in the marching of armies and desolation of our country, our people have lost millions of money and a vast amount of every conceivable kind of property, embracing carriages, horses, gear, wagons, buggies, and every manner of machinery necessary for farming; colts, mules, cattle, saddles, bridles, blankets, and everything used in stables; sofas, pianos, chairs, stools, clocks, settees, tables, and everything used to furnish houses; cloaks, coats, vests, cravats, neckerchiefs, shoes, boots, stockings, socks; and every manner of garments worn by men, women and children; watches, lockets, rings, bracelets, keepsakes, muffs, furs, and everything used to adorn the persons of ladies; theological, legal, historical, classical, poetical, and every manner of books, ancient and modern, in all of the dead and the living languages; spoons, dishes, plate of every kind—all have been stolen from us, and may be found on the tables, on the persons, in the barns, in the stables, in the houses and libraries of the people, many of whom claim rank and respectability in the Northern States, among whom are the families of lawyers, ministers, captains, colonels, generals, professors in colleges, with thousands of privates in the army, and chaplains and Governors of States. Our people, although suffering from fire and the riot of armies unknown to any Christian country for the last three centuries, could, with comparative comfort, live and build up their churches, stolen and occupied by troops for hospitals, by invaders to preach strange doctrines. We can build new the grave-stones of the illustrious dead, whose honored ashes have been reposing in our midst, revered by mankind. We can build anew our houses, barns and other buildings devastated by barbarism. But in the name of common honesty and common decency, let us have back our stolen goods. If this is done, we will need neither charity nor alms from anywhere. Properly thus stolen may be returned to the place from whence stolen, or notice of the same left at the office of the New York Day Book; or any other papers of the country, which will act for us. We most respectfully request the publication of this notice in every paper in the country, and request the ministers of the pulpits of the United States to read this notice to their congregations, as it may lead to the return of millions of dollars' worth of property to the proper owners, and do justice to those in distress, who scorn to receive charity from those who have robbed them of their property.

On behalf of the Southern people:

MANY SOUTHERN LADIES.

P. S.—Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and Rev. Bishops Simpson, Ames and Mellvaine are requested to read this notice in their pulpits, and request their ministers to have it read, as it may secure to us much of our property.

THE HOME OF A ROTHSCHILD.

A correspondent of the London Telegraph thus describes Ferrieres, the home of Baron James de Rothschild:

"When the Compiegne festivities are over those of Ferrieres commence. Baron James de Rothschild selects the month of December as his special season for receiving his guests, because it is the season wherein he can best enjoy his favorite pastimes of hunting, shooting, etc. As at Compiegne, the Baron's guests are invited in four series; and if it were possible to exceed the magnificence of imperial Compeigne, the Baron would certainly outrival Napoleon III. The estate of La Ferriere was purchased thirty years ago by Rothschild from the heirs of Fouche, Duke of Otranto, for the sum of 2,600,000f. It has since been considerably increased, and it now consists of 37,000 English acres. Like the great Frederick, who vainly tried to purchase the mill at Sans Souci which came between the wind and his nobility, the Baron has vainly endeavored to buy a farm of fifteen acres which happens to be in the centre of his vast domain. The gold of the Rothschilds will not tempt the obdurate paysan to part with his beloved heritage. Curious to say, the adjoining estates belong to the mighty Pereires, the only name in France which in point of financial power can rival that of Rothschild.

"The Emperor's visit, in 1865, to La Ferriere, will be remembered. Every hour which his Majesty breathed in this superb mansion cost the host a million. Till that time, no artist had been allowed to sketch the chateau; and it being a hideous amalgamation of incorrect style, such as would give Mr. Ruskin a shiver even to contemplate in a photograph, I think the Baron evinced his good sense in not permitting his house to be seen in prints. Imagine a huge building, partly old English and partly Chinese in its decoration, surrounded by exquisite grounds, in the designs of which, Paxton had no inconsiderable part. Immense tanks, well stocked with fish, and an indescribable air of artificial ornament pervading the whole, which conveys to one the idea that one of the sumptuous princes in the Champs Elysees has been transported to the flat plains of La Brie.

"The interior arrangements, however, are faultless—a double staircase leads to the hall, which is 85 feet in height, and lit from the roof by a dome of glass, illuminated at night by 1150 gas-burners. The gallery separates this vast hall from the dwelling-rooms, each of which would supply in itself enough treasures for a very respectable exhibition. Byzantine arm-chairs, pictures by Velasquez, Joseph Vernet, Guido, Vandyke, and I know not how many more great masters, almost fatigue the spectator by their repeated claims for admiration. The most comfortable chair in the salon de famille was once the throne of a Chinese Emperor, presented by that Celestial to a Rothschild. A sofa in the said room is covered by Oriental embroidery bearing the imperial dragon. The Baron's private study is furnished with Gobelin tapestry worked from designs by Boucher. The walls of the smoking-room are entirely covered by Russia leather, exactly the tint of a cigar, and on this costly material Eugene Lawry has painted exquisite frescoes. The family dining-room is decorated by sporting subjects, executed by Philippe Rousseau. It opens on a small and very plain synagogue. It was in the large dining-room that the Emperor and his suite partook of the celebrated luncheon in 1862, served on Bernard de Palissy china and plate chisselled by Gouttieres."

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLE

A RAILROAD TO SELMA.

It is proposed to build an air-line railroad from New Orleans to Selma, Alabama—an enterprise which could not fail of proving highly beneficial to the wealth and business prosperity of our city, and which therefore should, meet with substantial and prompt encouragement from our capitalists. It is stated in a letter from Selma, published by a cotemporary, that efforts for obtaining the necessary charter from the Legislature have already been inaugurated in that State, and the writer promises that a similar document shall be speedily procured from Mississippi. He therefore urges immediate co-operation by the people of the Crescent City. It seems to us that their manifest interest would suggest the policy of complying with his suggestion.

By a glance at the map, the truth of the following remarks, taken from the letter referred to, can easily be verified: "This air line to Selma runs through the most desirable country. It is as well timbered as any portion of the South, and the plantations abound in large orchards and vineyards, enabling much excellent fruit and garden vegetables to reach your market almost as fresh as when gathered. These, of course, are minor considerations when compared with the grand results of having by far the nearest and most convenient route to all the places of great importance North; yet such advantages add much to the success of a road, and add not only to the receipts, but vastly to the convenience of citizens depending upon your market for supplies."

We think that the sooner this enterprise is carried out the better, for the road would, in our opinion, prove both a good individual pecuniary investment, and of great public benefit and convenience. "Selma" calls for a meeting of New Orleans capitalists to consider the subject; and we second his motion.

THE FENIANS.

From the London News, Jan. 16.]

A supplement to the Dublin Gazette, published on Saturday evening, contains notices proclaiming the county and city of Dublin, the county of Tipperary and the county and city of Waterford. The proclamations were posted throughout the city on Tuesday, but were not long up (says the Dublin Express) until they were torn and defaced by having pieces of green paper pasted over the word "Queen," making the last sentence read "God save the Green." Among those which were torn down was one which had been posted at the City Hall, which, we need hardly remind our readers, is in the immediate neighborhood of the Castle, and next door to the head police office. Notwithstanding the large force of police promenading the streets, we have not heard of an instance in which the persons who committed these outrages have been arrested. The effect of these proclamations is, that from to-day in Dublin, and the 17th in Tipperary and Waterford, it becomes a misdemeanor, punishable by two years' imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for any person to carry or have, except in his dwelling-house, arms or ammunition of any description in any of the proclaimed districts. Officers in the various branches of her Majesty's service, special constables, and the holders of game certificates, are specially excepted from the provisions of the act. Offenders are liable to be apprehended by any person and delivered into the custody of the police, and the magistrates or the police are empowered to search suspected persons.

The Freeman's Journal of yesterday says: "Soon after the proclamation had been published anxious groups were to be seen collected reading it on all the places it was posted, and the police received information that pikes, pistols, swords, ammunition, drill books, etc., were being made away with as quickly as possible by concealing them in most ingenious places, or by throwing them into the river and canals. Many who had not read the proclamation attentively, or who had been misinformed concerning it, thought that the search for arms, ammunition, etc., would commence on Sunday; and for that reason the greatest vigilance was exercised by those who were afraid of the police visiting their houses to make an 'overhaul' for pikes, revolvers' rifles, etc. On Sunday evening some constables of the E division proceeded to a field in the neighborhood of Harold's Cross, where in a haystack they found twenty pikes, ready for immediate service. In the same locality, on the road, a bundle was found, which, on being opened, was discovered to consist of a military cloak, composed of superfine green cloth, with red facings, and secured at the collar with a solid gold chain and clasps, also two green tunics with red facings, bearing the initials of 'The Irish Republic.' All this uniform was elegantly finished, and was evidently the property of some person who had recently returned from America, as the cloth and style of workmanship are foreign. In the Grand Canal uniform coats of a similar kind were found."

[From the London Shipping Gazette, Jan. 15.]

Recent events have convinced the government that the dangers of Fenianism are not confined to Ireland. London is no safer than Dublin, and it has been thought necessary to take extraordinary precautions in the public offices to guard against fire. The late great fire in St. Catherine's Dock was always believed to be the work of an incendiary, and common rumor now asserts the criminal's political creed was summed up in the word Fenian.

A repetition of this catastrophe in the Customhouse and the Government offices in Somerset House is dreaded by the authorities, and extra divisions of police are consequently sent to patrol the buildings by night. A police galley is also moored opposite the Customhouse, from which a watch is kept on the quay, and any attempt on the building from the river would be frustrated. There may possibly be no foundation for the rumor upon which these steps have been taken, but the fact of so much having been done proves that the indifference of the general public is not shared by the officers of the Government.

[From the London Times, Jan. 16.]

The leaders in Ireland captured with the utmost facility and consigned to a convict prison, the leaders in America apparently more ready to destroy each other than the British Government—these and similar instances might well impress, and doubtless have impressed, the European nations with the idea that the bubble is burst and the whole danger at an end. We should be very glad indeed could we conscientiously subscribe to these opinions. If the Fenian conspiracy had been like its predecessors—had it spread its ramifications through the different ranks of society, and depended upon some high directing intelligence, such would undoubtedly have been the case. In ordinary plots, as in the more highly organized animals, if you strike off the head the whole scheme collapses. But a lower organization has its advantages as well as its drawbacks, and creatures about which it is doubtful whether they deserve the name of animals at all are capable of sustaining injuries which would be fatal to any of a superior type. Fenianism, so far as we know of it, rests on no far-sighted and comprehensive scheme, but upon the most vulgar appeal to the most vulgar passions. The inducements it holds out are the gratification of covetousness and envy, the division of the property of the rich among the poor, and the slaughter of those whom rank and social distinction of any kind would naturally render formidable opponents to such an attempt. Something is said about freeing Ireland from the English yoke; but that is really only put forward because so long as Ireland is connected with England the plunder of her property and the slaughter of her upper classes would be impossible. It is not between Ireland and England, after all, so much as between the upper and lower classes of Irishmen that the struggle is to take place. Fenianism has no high and ennobling cause to fight for. There is little enthusiasm in it, but a great deal of selfishness and great desire to plunder. The bond that unites the brethren is not any particular affection or veneration for each other, but the desire to combine for the commission of [illegible] crime. To a body so circumstanced the loss of a few men a little, and of a very little, raised above themselves is a trifle. They are unable to estimate the power of the British Government; but they form a much juster opinion as to the value of each other. We, therefore, do not expect, as we have before said, that we have heard the last of Fenianism. The very circumstances that appear to render it contemptible give it vitality, and it has in it the power of uniting again and again, though it may have lost its most important members.

The trial of Cornelius O'Mahoney, who had been assistant book-keeper in the Irish People office, had ended in his being convicted (after being tried twice in consequence of the second jury not agreeing) and sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

The prisoner O'Keefe, the editor of the Irish People, when sentenced was passed upon him, complained, in a speech described as remarkably able, that so far from the paper appearing to be obnoxious to the government, it was actually encouraged by it. For six months that journal was allowed to be run on without the necessity for its registration being enforced. Then it was registered, and the sanction of the government appeared thereby to have been given to it.

Dublin Jan. 19 correspondence of London Times.

The fellowing prisoners, convicted of Fenianism at the Cork Special Commission, were yesterday morning conveyed from Mountjoy, under a strong escort of the 10th Hussars, to the Westland row railway station, for transmission, per Holyhead steamer, to Pentonville prison; Charles U. Lynch, Hayes, Kinnealy, O'Donovan and O'Regan.

RUSSIAN AGGRESSION IN ASIA.

New York, Feb. 6.—The fear of Russian encroachment on Central Asia, has latterly assumed a new phase. It is now conceded by the Anglo Indian Press, that the slow, but sure, advances made by the Russian Government, in Central Asia, are endangering the future safety of England's Indian Empire.

The Bombay Gazette admits that England is utterly helpless to prevent Russia from proceeding in her career of conquest, if it is her will to carry out her policy of annexation.

The same paper bears testimony to the wonderful civilizing influence which the European Colossus is exercising on her recent acquisitions, and adds that Russia is the only power that can successfully accomplish this work.

In Cashmere, the progress of Russian power has induced the Anglo-Indian Government to send out three native spies to obtain authentic information.

The Bhootan treaty, recently concluded by British authorities, has been the subject of much comment in England, and will probably be made the ground of attack upon Earl Russell's Cabinet, as soon as the Parliament assembles. The Calcutta Englishman informs us that by this treaty, the Bhooteans have conceded to England all their rights and interests in the eighteen Bengal and Assam Boors, including all the land.

A remarkable picture of the state of affairs in China, when Sir Richard Alcock, the British Ambassador, arrived at Pekin, is furnished by the overland China mail.

The Chinese, relieved from the fear of the Taepings, were busily engaged in casting munitions of war, and preparing to exclude all foreigners from the country.

English advices state that Sir R. Alcock arrived in time to change this policy.—Cor. Cin. Commercial.

WISDOM AND JUSTICE OF THE PRESIDENT.

There is even-handed justice in the propositions of Constitutional reform, to which President Johnson would assent. If the basis of representation must be changed, he would also change that of taxation. If the number of Congressmen from West Tennessee must be reduced, he would have the amount of revenue exacted apportioned to its wealth. If Massachusetts must have greater relative power in Congress than Mississippi, Massachusetts must pay for augmented political influence.

There is justice, if not unmixed wisdom, in a change of this character. If densely populated States gain potency in legislation, they lose money by the process. If the South must have fewer representatives, it will also have lighter taxes. As the South has been impoverished, the North has been enriched. By lessening our Congressional representation by three or four members, Northern taxation would be increased three or four fold. If negroes be not represented, under the President's plan, neither are unnaturalized foreigners that crowd Northern States and cities. The President observes the natural law of compensation, in adjusting the organic law of States.—Memphis Bulletin, 5th inst.

A Test of Affection.—The Limerick Southern Chronicle vouches for the following romantic incident as having occurred in a neighboring county: "A certain young lady, possessing more than ordinary accomplishments for her class of life, being the daughter of poor but respectable parents, on the death of a wealthy relative recently became entitled to £8000. When the glad tidings reached the ears of her neighbors, many warm admirers flocked around the hitherto neglected beauty, and there was no end to the overtures of love. Previous to the turn of fortune's wheel, a young man, of humble pretensions, had been the young lady's only suitor; but the knowledge of her wealth at once placed a formidable barrier in his way, and he contented himself with being a silent worshipper at a distance. Matters ultimately came to a crisis, and in order to test the affection of her devotees, the young lady caused a report to be circulated that the supposed fortune was in reality only a sham, this mistake having occurred through a similarity of name. This intelligence had the effect of causing the visits of the lovers to become less frequent, and finally ceased altogether. The humble youth rejoiced at the change, and at once took an opportunity to console the distress of his heart, who, to the surprise of all, rewarded his sincerity with her hand, and made him sole master of £8000."

South Carolina.—We learn from the Charleston Courier, of Saturday, that a gentleman who is travelling in an official capacity through the Southern States, for the purpose of making a report on the agricultural condition of the country, gave the editors of that journal interesting information concerning affairs in the interior of South Carolina. He stated that so far as he was able to discover, the plantations were being worked profitably, and the planters appeared cheerful and hopeful. It is thought that the yield of cotton this year will be fully one-half of that of ordinary times. Should it prove to be such, the producer will be satisfied, as the advance in price will offset the decrease in quantity. The freedmen, generally have entered into contracts and are behaving remarkably well. Pilfering and robbing have nearly ceased. The prompt measures taken by the military authorities to punish some new offenders has had a salutary effect upon the freedmen as a class. The Courier thinks that the country is gradually assuming an aspect of plenty and prosperity, and indications are numerous, that if Congress will cease throwing firebrands amongst the colored laborers, all things will turn to forward a satisfactory result.—Montgomery Mail, 10th inst.

Affairs in the South.—The following is an extract from a letter received to-day by Gen. Spinner from a gentleman now travelling through the South, whose facilities for obtaining correct information in regard to affairs in that section are unrivalled:

"The tone of the rebels in New Orleans is improving. They have discovered that the North means to be safe, and they do not seem to me near so offensive as they were three months ago in their disloyalty. In Mississippi the hatred to the Yankees seems universal. The same is true of part of West Tennessee, Alabama and Georgia. Up the Mississippi the Yankees are as good as anybody else. Just now the negro is king. He has set his foot down and won't work where he thinks they don't mean to give him a fair show. There is not a negro who will go up into Mississippi, for the reason that the laws passed at the late session of the Legislature are designed to re-enslave them. In Louisiana they are in the main, working well, and are as orderly as ever they were, but there is not labor enough in the South to do the requisite work, and so, as I said, the negro is king. Those who get into his good graces are going to do well, but bad luck to the poor planter who imagines that he can bully them as he used to do in days gone by. He will find it pretty hard to make a contract.—Wash. Cor. Cincinnati Gazette.

It is estimated that every emancipated negro in the South has cost every white man in the North five thousand dollars.

THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE WIDOW OF STONEWALL JACKSON.

Cottage Home, N. C., Jan. 25, 1866.

My Dear Sir: Your letter of the 3d inst., was forwarded to me from Lexington, Va. I have delayed answer for a few days, hoping to receive the paper to which you referred, but it has not yet reached me, and I have not yet had the pleasure of reading your editorial; but, judging from the remarks in your letter, I suppose it is a similar publication to what has recently appeared in many of the newspapers, representing the family of Gen. Jackson as suffering for the necessities of life, and appealing to the public for their relief.

It is a source of deep regret and mortification to, me and to my family and friends that such a misunderstanding should exist in regard to my circumstances. It is true that almost the whole of my little fortune has been swept away. My noble husband, actuated by patriotism, invested in Confederate bonds to assist the Government, and I followed his example; the consequence was the loss of nearly the whole of his estate; but God has still left to me one of the kindest of fathers, who has the means of providing all the comforts of life for me and my orphan child. The pecuniary sufferings of others in our afflicted land have been so much greater than my own that, in this respect, I have only need of a more thankful heart. And I, of all others, should have no fears for the future, for the covenant-keeping God of my husband has watched over us heretofore, and the love of this great people to me and my little child, on his account, fills my heart with grateful joy.

While it is one of the greatest comforts of my desolated life to see the many beautiful and eloquent tributes to the memory of my beloved husband, and I would gratefully accept my offerings that are voluntarily given as testimonials of love and gratitude to him, yet the contributions that are now called for are given under a false impression, and it is inconsistent with my ideas of honor and rectitude to receive them. I would, therefore, beg that all efforts that are made to raise a fund for my "relief," both in Charleston and elsewhere, be immediately stopped.

With thanks to the warm-hearted and generous citizens of Charleston for their kind feelings towards me and mine,

I remain, yours very truly,

Mary Ann Jackson.

AMERICAN EMIGRATION TO BRAZIL.

THE WHOLE HISTORY IN ONE CHAPTER.

[Rio Janeiro Correspondence.]

Rio Janeiro, Jan. 2, 1866.

The third, as yet arrived, of the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Line of steamers, the South America, sails for New York to-day. As the party whose adventures are chiefly my theme returns to the States in the prosecution of his mission by this steamer, and as I have been with him during the whole course of his travels, and "knew the points" which he proposes to publish in extenso in a series of letters and in his forth-coming book, I have concluded, without infringing upon his programme, to give you, in one chapter, a terse compendium of notes I have kept of American immigration to Brazil, its rise and progress.

The Anglo-Saxon race, like certain birds we wot of, are migratory in their character. They are restless, never contented, and never keep still. "Push ahead, keep moving," seems to be their motto, and they practically exemplify it.

Previous to the late civil war in the States large numbers of well to do Southern planters and efficient yet adventurous artisans in the Southern States premeditated a pioneer visit if not positive emigration to and settlement in Brazil. The collapse of the "so-called" confederacy intensified this feeling, elicted much correspondence, and the hundreds swelled to thousands, and associations of immigrants to Brazil were formed, with fixed rules for guidance, as if by magic, in each and every State of the South. And the ball was set rolling, and it has continued to roll and still rolls significantly and determinedly.

It was in June last (1865) that General Wm. Wallace W. Wood, of Mississippi, but long time resident of New Orleans, was appointed the chief agent of associations of immigrants of four counties in Mississippi. In New Orleans he became the agent of another association; of a third from the Carroline county district of Virginia; of a fourth in New York of Northern and Central Mississippians, and, by reason of an accident to and the return of the vessel (the Montana) on which he first started out in August last, of nineteen other associations, the agents of whom all, without exception, confided their business to his charge. Gen. Wood is a middle aged man, a lawyer and editor, a fluent writer, forcible speaker, popular in his manners and prompt in the dispatch of business. His arrival in Rio had been anticipated, and his reception was most enthusiastic. No passport was asked of him—he had none—and his baggage was permitted to be taken to his hotel without the surveillance of the customs. The morning after the arrival the metropolitan papers were flaming with kindest notices and full of cordial welcomes. That day was one of decided sensation. A victory had just been achieved over the Paraguayans, and a regular commissioner of a large American immigration, with a party of explorers had arrived. The church bells rang merrily all over the city, the streets were filled with processions, bands of music were playing everywhere, and sky-rockets were ascending and bursting every second in broad daylight during the entire day, and at night the city was illuminated. An hour before sunset Rua da Dereita, the main street in the city, on which the Exchange Hotel, where we had taken rooms, was located, began filling for the distance of three blocks or squares in front of the hotel with a dense mass of humanity and a band of music, while the windows, balconies and housetops of the buildings in the vicinity were thronged with women and children, waving handkerchiefs and miniature flags of Brazil and the States. In response to loud and repeated "vivas for Gen. Wood," that gentleman appeared in one of the balconies of the hotel, where, in his representative character, he was welcomed with deafening shouts, the band playing "Dixie." An address in Portuguese, signed by numerous merchants, bankers, etc., was then read by one of the citizens to immense applause, at the conclusion of which the band played the National hymn of Brazil, when every head was uncovered and profound silence caused during the performance. The chief agent then responded in English, his remarks, understood by some, being received by all with a species of wild delight. The next day all the papers contained the address, signatures and speech.

Within three days from this demonstration Gen. Wood and party had visited the various ministers of State, and been called on in return by them, the foreign ministers, etc., and had perfected all his arrangements for an extensive tour into the interior. He demanded that emigrants should be made citizens immediately on their arrival on simply taking the oath of allegiance, freedom of press and religious worship, with privilege to erect temples for the latter after the custom of our people in the States; recognition of the rules and regulations adopted by the emigrants for their internal government; privilege to create schools, academies and colleges under their own rules; charters, with all privileges, for their villages, towns and cities; free imports for all needed by the emigrants for five years, etc. All this was agreed to, though much requires legislative enactment, as not being in conformity with existing laws.

Rio Janeiro is a second Lisbon in appearance. There are no brick houses, no chimneys, no fire-places. The houses are built mostly of mud or adobe, or of small pieces of stone; are principally of a yellow ochre color, and all have red tile roofs. There are a few four-story houses, but the mass of the buildings are one or two stories high; the streets are notedly narrow, with the gutter or drain in the centre, and the side walks are on a level with the street, averaging three feet in width, and are as often used as the streets by vehicles in passing, to the great annoyance and detriment, not to say danger, of foot passengers. Slaves wear no shoes and very little clothing, bear all burdens on their heads, and move at a fox trot. Drays and carts are seldom used; hacks and tilburies are in abundance. The streets are paved with round stones. The churches are innumerable, and bells are ringing all the time. Beggars are countless, and Saturday is a licensed day with them; one or two cents is the usual mite given them. Rio is ever lively and seemingly full of business; located in a valley surrounded by mountains, the valley encircling some and winding in and around other mountains; the days are hot and the nights cool, with a pulmonary vapor bath ascending daily. Light flannels should always be worn here, and are preventives of colds, etc.; black cloth dress coats and pants, black vests, black or white cravats, black ties or stove-pipe hats and light-colored kid gloves, constitute the dress shirt, and dress is a feature of the city. The people are remarkably friendly and sociable, and have a warm affection for Americans, whom they regard as models of enterprise, science, skill and progressiveness.

With letters of introduction to the dignitaries and prominent men of the provinces of San Paulo, Parana, Rio Grande do Sud and San Catharine; furnished with an engineer, who was also guide and interpreter, and as the guests of the empire, the general's party, consisting of himself as chief, a surgeon, physician and chemist, a planter, an architect and builder and a machinist, left Rio on a Brazilian steamer on the 11th of October and landed next morning at Santos, the seaport of San Paulo. There are two methods of reaching the interior from this point, one by railroad the other by diligences. The former is an English enterprise, and passes over a serra or mountain on which there are four lifts (a stationed engine at each) of one mile and a quarter distance each, or five miles up the mountain, at a grade of one foot in nine feet. The foot of this mountain is fifteen miles from Santos, and the whole distance to the city of San Paulo, the present terminus of the railroad, is forty-two miles. The company, however, have a charter through the entire province and into Parana. It is a stupendous enterprise, but the Brazilian Government is liberal, and the company, after years of labor and the support of thousands, will pocket its clear millions. What are our Yankee friends doing? What are the Americans doing while John Bull is thus reaping harvests in this new world?

We took the railroad—guests of the company—and in due time reached San Paulo city, where there was another ovation, more addresses, speeches and distinguished visits, and after a delay of three days we were off again, with servants and muleteers, furnished us gratuitously by the provincial government, our cavalcade consisting of eleven men and seventeen mules. From this point our expenses were paid by the provincial government, and we found our arrival at each point heralded in advance, and processions and cavalcades of the most prominent citizens, including the officials, with bands of music, met us a league or so before reaching each village, town or city, and on our arrival the entire population turned out to see us. Everything was free, and tables groaning with edibles and potables, substantials and delicacies, met us at every turn and pause. In America friends shake hands; in Brazil they embrace, till heart beats against heart. Balls and parties and serenades were our nightly accompaniment, and whether in town or country, it was the one great, grand, unvarying scene of life, love and seductive friendship. Thus, with frequent relays of animals forced upon us by zealous and most hospitable Brazilians, we passed from San Paulo westward, inclining north, through Jundiahy, Campinas, Lanceiro, Ihicaba, Rio Claro, Arriraquara, Brotas, Jahu and Sape, to and beyond the Rio Tiete, between the Rios Jacquere Grande and Jacquere Pequena, over campos (rolling prairies), valleys, mountains and table lands, through a country teeming with oranges, pine apples and bananas, that seemed indigenous growths, unattended to, and that filled the air for miles around with their rich aroma, and whose delicious fruit melted in your mouth. The country is abundantly irrigated with mountain springs that, uniting, form creeks and small rivers, and permeate everywhere, their courses being as variable as their waters are cool and refreshing.

The fazendas, or plantations, are told off in leagues. A man goes on the top of a mountain, stretches his hand out, wheels around, and says this is my estate, or fazenda. He estimates it at so many leagues, and it is registered, never surveyed. The owner of this property is called fazendeiro. On many of these plantations we find coffee, sugar, cotton, tobacco, corn, rice, beans, manioca, and all growing together in one field. The coffee trees, from the number on one plantation of ten thousand to one million, are planted from twelve to sixteen feet apart, and between these may be seen cotton, a recent introduction and quite primitive, corn, beans and manioca, all growing luxuriantly, while near by is the sugar plantation, and in the bottoms the rice. No ploughs are used in planting. Our party saw but three ploughs in all the route through the province. With sharp pointed sticks or stakes, the size of a man's arm, holes are made in the ground, the seed thrown in, the holes filled up with the earth shoved in by the foot, germination ensues, and with a little hoeing when the grass interferes, and that but once a season, the harvest is reaped. Coffee yields a harvest three years after planting, and the same tree yield from eighteen to twenty-five years. The sugar cane, without replanting produces crops for three years, the cane simply being cut off. Cotton grows to an enormous height, and, like the cane, needs no replanting for several years. The best lands are of a dark red color, and are mountain or table lands. The valleys are second rate and are mostly black earth. The campos are chiefly sandy, but are fine grazing grounds, and with the aid of a plow would yield good cotton and the best of corn. But the campos are not cultivated by the Brazilians, though their cities are nearly all built in them, and the gardens in these, unmanured, produce vegetables and fruit with scarcely any cultivation that are not to be surpassed anywhere. The climate of San Paulo is the healthiest in the Empire, and its soil is capable of producing in great excellence all articles hereinbefore mentioned and—wheat!

It is the peculiarity of the Government or Empire that the front lots or yards of houses, dwellings, etc., are used for horse, mule and cow lots, the gardens, shrubbery, etc., being in the rear, and the entrances at the sides. Even the Emperor's palace, at San Cristovao, Rio Janeiro, with its three story pannelled front and its two story side, has its entrance on the side.

The horses of Brazil are small and scraggy the mules small, sleek and lively; the cattle elephantine, with huge, wide-spreading horns, and the vehicles six ages behind the times, copied from the era of the Bucolics of Virgil. Transportation from the interior, of produce, freight, etc., is on pack mules, in loads of two hundred pounds or less. The provinces below San Paulo are chiefly pastoral, for graziers and stock breeders. Those further north, on the seaboard, produce cotton, cora, tobacco and fruits. In the interior—four-fifths of which is unexplored—mining, stock raising, etc., seem to be the special employment of the people. "Paciencia" is par excellence the Brazilian motto, and much time is required to which to do a very little. The sides of their intent need pricking, and the Anglo-Saxon is destined to do it.

The scenery of Brazil is both beautiful and grand, being alternate mountains, valleys and rolling prairies, with water courses innumerable, a vast expanse of coffee fields, huge herds of cattle, eternal verdure, a warm but even climate, and fruit meeting the eye at every turn. But this is scenery, climate, country and all. So let it be.

On our return to Rio we found the Emperor, Dom Pedro II, who was absent when we landed in the empire, and had just returned from the wars. He is immensely popular, and deservedly so. We had an interview with him of nearly an hour's duration, and he plied General Wood with question after question, seemed loth to part with him, and invited us to be sure and call again. He shows age, though but forty, and is profoundly a statesman. The sights in the metropolis incident to the Emperor's return were confined principally to the churches and theatres, where crowds followed His Majesty.

The Brazilian Government has promised General Wood, in his representative character, Government lands in the localities he has selected at the minimum Government rate of twenty-two cents an acre, payable in five years; good dirt roads of twenty feet width to the points of location from the nearest ports or railroads; provisions and other assistance towards sustenance and progress of emigrants until they can be established; transportation to their settlements; citizenship on taking the oath of allegiance; one vessel for every two furnished them, and other privileges enumerated in the early part of this chapter.

The liberality and progressiveness of the Imperial Government are exemplified by the encouragement given to railroad projectors and to other enterprises and in the rapid strides being made in emulation of the United States. The Constitution of Brazil is its fundamental law sacredly observed, and republicanism in its details is its pervading element. There is more freedom, probably, in Brazil than in any other government in the world. It is essentially a monarchial government with republican institutions.

Slavery will probably last twenty years longer in Brazil. It is gradually and surely disappearing. No slaves, none of the African race, can be admitted in the empire, and every year hundreds are manumitted. Slaves do not wear shoes. The negroes of the Empire are a heterogeneous mass of all colors and classes. Married men are exempt from military duty; so are lawyers.

The morning of the Southern forts with colored troops is a most obnoxious measure to the Southerners; and then as the Congress at Washington will probably not admit any Congressmen from the Southern States, the South, like the colonies of old, will have "taxation without representation." In this the United States favors immigration from its shores.

Gen. Wood's forthcoming book will contain particulars, where, for want of time and space, I could only generalize.

The Emperor's Speech.—The French Legislature was opened on the 22d ult. In his opening speech the Emperor thus refers to the Mexican question:

You have shared with me the general indignation produced by the assassination of President Lincoln, and recently the death of the King of the Belgians has caused unanimous regret.

In Mexico, the Government founded upon the will of the people is being consolidated. The opposition, conquered and dispersed, have no leader—a chief. The National troops have displayed valor, and the country has found guaranties of order and security which have developed its resources, and its commerce with France is alone from twenty-one to seventy-seven millions.

As I expressed the hope last year that our expedition was approaching its termination, I am coming to an understanding with the Emperor Maximilian to fix the epoch for the recall of our troops, before their return is effected, without compromising the French interests which we have been defending in that remote country.

North America, issuing victoriously from a formidable struggle, has re-established the Union, and solemnly proclaimed the abolition of slavery. France, which forgets no noble page of her history, offers up sincere wishes for the prosperity of the great American Republic, and for the maintenance of the amicable relations which soon will have had a century's duration.

The emotion produced in the United States by the presence of our troops on the Mexican soil will be pacified by the frankness of our declarations, and the American people will comprehend that our expedition, to which we invited them, was not opposed to their interests. Two nations, equally jealous of their independence, ought to avoid every step which might affect their dignity and their honor.

President Johnson.—In speaking of President Johnson, the London Herald says:

To turn scoffing into reverence, curses into blessings, and to conquer the good opinion of the world, in despite almost of itself, is a work not given to many men. There are a few grand examples given in history, and but few. Therefore, when we find a ruler whose elevation seemed to presage a reign of terror, and whose antecedents pointed him out rather as an avenger than a healer of social disorder, wending his way in the world's esteem by clemency, the spectacle makes a deep impression on our minds, and calls for remark not more generous than just. President Johnson has agreeably disappointed at least one-half of the world by a wise and statesman-like policy that will give him a high place in the pantheon of American worthies. Quite in another way than that contemplated by the Republican fanatics, he is the man for the times; and, while Washington has the credit of establishing his country's independence and establishing its form of government, Andrew Johnson may yet go down to posterity as the statesman who, by a wise clemency, reconstructed the edifice when it had suffered a blow that shattered it to its foundation.

Reunion of the Episcopal Church of Georgia with that of the United States.—The following letter to Bishop Johns, of Virginia, makes an announcement of interest:

Savannah, Diocese of Georgia.

To the Right Reverend Johns, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Virginia:

Right Reverend and Dear Brother—In pursuance of the fifth resolution, passed at the second Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the late Confederate States, which convened in Augusta, Ga., November 8th, 1865, I hereby give you official notice under my hand and seal of the Episcopate, of my withdrawal from that Ecclesiastical Confederation, and of the reunion of the Diocese of Georgia with the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America.

Most sincerely do I trust that all the Dioceses may be very soon battling, side by side, for the cause of Christ in the world.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Episcopate, this 3d January, A. D. 1866.

Stephen Elliott,
Bishop of Georgia.

W. H. Harrison, Secretary Diocese of Georgia.

☞ The Cincinnati Commercial (Republican) suggests to the Radicals, as they seem anxious for satisfactory assurance that the loyalty of the South is genuine, the passage of a law providing that no reconstructing rebel shall be restored to civil rights and privileges, and taken from probation into full fellowship, till he can sing Yankee Doodle, not only with composure but cheerfulness of mind. If he has no voice, and never whistled, then compel him to listen while it is sung or whistled, and if he betrays any repugnance, makes a wry face, or acts colicky, then suspend him till, under applications of the test, these disagreeable symptoms disappear.

☞ President Johnson, at this juncture especially, is opposed to the constitutional reforms. The sentiment of the order, stability and permanence is more important than ever before. The fixed idea of allegiance which held sway until almost uprooted by the madness of partizanship, is not strengthed by changes in organic law. Let us have a season of rest, and the lesson of the past five years will not be in vain. The giant oak, wrenched by a tempest, again stands erect and is firmly rooted when the storm has passed, the sun shines and time has done its quiet work.

Truth Fitly Spoken.—"If," said Gov. Raymond in his recent speech in the Federal House of Representatives, "we cannot treat our Southern people as members of this Union without degrading terms or doing aught to humiliate and destroy their pride and self-respect, then we may make up our minds that we are fallen. We shall fail in restoring peace, harmony and prosperity to the Union, but the Nation will not perish. Others will take our places who better appreciate the nature of the work that devolves upon us, and who will accomplish the end we fail to reach, or even to comprehend."—Montgomery Advertiser, 11th inst.

A Good Sign.—The Washington Republican, known as, in some sort, the President's organ, came out, a few days ago, "in a long, strong and able editorial against Mr. Trumbull's bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau. It denounces the bill as eminently anti-Republican, and as founding a permanent and costly feudal system at the expense of the Government. It says, give this Bureau two years, and we can never eradicate it. The appearance of the article created a profound sensation."—Memphis Argus, 9th inst

Wholesale.—Another of the series of resolutions breathing death and annihilation to Jefferson Davis was introduced into the House, a few days ago, and singularly enough met with the opposition of Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, upon the ground that there was something too much of this. He remarked, "I hope we are not going mad on this subject." This remark plainly shows that even this tremendous old sinner has some idea of the insane figure he and his followers cut in the eyes of the country. Wonderful, though, that he should acknowledge it.—Memphis Argus, 9th inst.

MONETARY.

OFFICE OF THE DAILY TRUE DELTA,
Thursday Evening, Feb. 15, 1866.

The most prominent feature of the market to-day was a decline of fully 1 ₰ cent. in gold and a reduction of ½@¾ ₰ cent. in rates of foreign exchange. The gold market was, as heretofore, amply supplied throughout, and, during the early part of the day, asking prices were fully up to yesterday's closing figures; but the demand was at no time much better than nominal, and the advices from New York caused a very heavy decline. The movement for the day is included in the following statement of operations, viz: $2'00 and $600 at 138; $3000 at 137½; $3000, $700 and $10,000 at 137½; $5000, $7000, $25,000 and $30,000 at 137¾; $12,500 at 138; $1200 at 138½@137; $2000, $3000, $5000, $5000, $10,000 and $35,000 at 137; $5000 and $1000 at 136¾; and $2000 at 137½. Nothing whatever has transpired in silver to-day beyond dribbles, which, of course, we take no account of, and we now quote gold at 136¾@137¼ and silver at 132@133 for American coin, and 130@137 for Mexican dollars.

Foreign exchange has gone still lower to-day. The market was heavily supplied throughout, and the demand continued restricted to a few buyers, most of the principal operators having still kept out of the market. Rates declined from ½@¾ ₰ cent. during the day, and the movement was restricted to the following operations, viz: £3400 at 146½; £6500 at 146¾; £2500 at 146½; £30,000, bought by one bank, at 146, 146¼, 146⅜ and 146½; £2000 and £2500 at 146½; £15,000, bill of lading bills, on private terms; and £10,000, do., at rates that have been withheld; also £600, for gold, at 106½. Transactions in francs included 100,000 f. and 150,000f. at 5.37½; 200,000f. at 5.35½; and 150,000f. and 175,000f. at 5.35. The quotations at the close of business were: for bank sterling, 149; clear bills, 148 @148¼; bill of lading bills, 144½@145¼; bank francs, 5.37½@5.30; and out door francs, 5.35@5.30.

Domestic exchange has exhibited increased weakness to-day. The banks checked throughout at ½@¾ per cent. discount, although one or two of them held nominally at par. On the streets, the offerings showed but little, if any, increase, and the sales were confined to the subjoined trifling amounts, viz: $20, 000, $25,000 and $30,000 New York and Boston sight at ⅜ per cent. discount; $35,000 do. at 7-16 per cent. discount; and $40,000, $100,000 and $100,000 do. at ½ per cent. discount; $20,000 and $20,000 one day at ⅝ per cent. discount; $50,000 three days at ¼ per cent. discount; and $40,000 sixty days at 2 per cent. discount. The closing quotations are, for sight checks on the Northern cities ½@¾ per cent. discount at bank, and ⅝@¾ per cent. discount on counters, with corresponding figures for short sight and time drafts.

Stocks and Bonds have been in very limited request to-day. Offerings of most classes were light and the supply of favorite securities was at no time much better than nominal. The only sales that transpired were one hundred shares Union Bank at 42; 150 do. Commercial Water, at 60¼; a small lot of Opelousas Railroad stock at 4¾ and 70 do. Gas Light Co. at a price that has not transpired.

Uncurrent bank notes have been at a stand-still since our last. Offerings were light and the demand was of a very restricted character from the opening to the close of business. The heavy operations of yesterday, which we reported this morning, appear to have amply supplied purchasers for the present. We still quote Bank of Louisiana, Union Bank and Crescent City Bank at 85@90c.; Louisiana State Bank and Merchants' Bank at 75@77c., and Bank of Louisiana at 50@55c. ₰ dollar.

COMMERCIAL.

OFFICE OF THE DAILY TRUE DELTA,
Thursday Evening, Feb. 15, 1866.

COTTON—The market opened this morning with a very active and general demand at yesterday's closing figures, but with an evident upward tendency, which soon exhibited an advance of fully ¼ ₰ lb. in asking prices. Offerings were somewhat larger than heretofore, but they were still insufficient to meet a heavy inquiry, and the movement for the day was restricted to 2122 bales, divided among buyers in the following order, viz: 5 @ 6, 30, 200, 100, 100, 100 and 30 bales. As the day advanced prices receded, however. The offering rates for both foreign and domestic exchange having been still further reduced, and at the close of business the ruling figures were precisely the same as those which we had presented this morning, as the actual quotations for yesterday. The advices from Liverpool of the 31st ult., which were published in the evening papers, have had but little, if any, effect, as the movement for the day had been closed before they came to hand, and we now re-produce yesterday's quotations, as still reflecting the actual condition of the market, the principal movement for the day having been at these figures, viz: Ordinary, 36@39c.; good ordinary, 40@42c.; low middling, 43c.; and middling, 45c.

SOUTHERN METHODISM.

CLASS-MEETINGS.

Suppose a revival of great power should attend the labors of some one in the Methodist Church in New Orleans, and that under this influence ten or twelve members of the church should organize themselves into a society for the two-fold purpose of cultivating their own spiritual life, and promoting and perpetuating the revival; and that their members should increase until it would become necessary to organize other societies in the city, and elsewhere, until the movement spread over the whole country, the originator of the movement being recognized everywhere as the head of the organization. Every one at all acquainted with Methodist history knows that this is just what Methodism was at first in the Church of England, with Mr. Wesley for its originator and head.

It would be legitimate for such a society to establish arbitrary rules for its goverment, and arbitrary tests of membership. Constant attendance of the society meetings would be a most appropriate condition of membership, for the very objects of the Society would fail, in respect to the person who should absent himself habitually from the meetings.

Exclusion from the society for such a cause would do the individual no harm, for it would neither implicate his moral character, nor separate him from the communion of saints, nor deprive him of sacramental privileges. For membership in the church would be independent of any action of such a self-constituted society. It might with the utmost propriety provide for its own efficiency, by dropping off all its inert members. In fact the object of its organization would render it imperative that it should do so. It would be a revival organization, and inactive members would have no place in it.

Now this is just what was done in Mr. Wesley's societies. They were the outgrowth of a revival, and designed to perpetuate the revival. Mr. Wesley's idea of a revival was very different from that which is, I fear, too prevalent among us now. With us the word means a temporary convulsion, in which the Christian people get happy, and a greater or less number of sinners are converted. Two or three weeks is a long time for a revival to last, and if it should continue for a month or two, it is wonderful. Mr. Wesley understood it to be the animation of the church to a permanent condition of vigor and activity. For this purpose he organized it, and the subjects of it upon a ceaseless course of spiritual activity. This was the meaning of the Wesleyan societies. The rules of the societies all grew out of this idea. They were not ecclesiastical laws affecting the franchises of church members, but simply rules to direct the activity of revival organizations in the church. If any one failed of the fervor requisite for efficiency in the revival movement, the societies, by their rules, dropped him out, but he was still in the church.

Every one must feel that excommunication from the church is an act of much greater significance and magnitude than exclusion from such a society.

I said, in a former article, that these revival organizations had grown to the dignity of churches. The greatest churches on this continent have sprung from this source. Now nothing is more natural than that in the transition state from the condition of mere societies to the higher form of an actual church, much that was peculiar to the former condition should be retained; and such is the fact in our history. At first a few ministers were ordained, and the sacraments dispensed by them to the people. Thus were ecclesiastical functions assumed, and the transition accomplished.—Our evangelical system became a pastorate, and the people who waited upon our ministry were supplied from our own organization with all the immunities of God's house. Our members ceased to hold connection with other churches. We ceased to be societies in a church, and became a church. And there never was a more legitimate church. Mr. Wesley never thought of establishing a church until the "logic of events" forced it upon him. The great revival of the eighteenth century naturally grew into a church. No schismatic spirit had any hand in its construction. It was not contaminated by human ambition.—When its members found themselves constituting a great ecclesiastical power, they could only exclaim, adoring wonder, "behold! what God hath wrought."

But now that the societies had organized a church, their rules required also the force of ecclesiastical laws—a character for which they were not at first designed. And, in the very nature of the case, as I have already shown, they could not be appropriate for such an office.—But as church functions were assumed by the Methodist body almost without design, previous legislation adapting its regulations to its new condition could not have been expected, and as the rules of the societies were the work of time and the outgrowth of their own peculiar form of vitality, so the change to appropriate church regulations must require time, and be brought about as the emergencies of distinctive church functions may make their necessity apparent. It was to be expected that the people and preachers should be very tenacious of those peculiar usages which had been so astonishingly efficient in promoting the work of God in the societies. Nor could they see why these usages might not be legitimately enforced in a church, as they had been in the societies. Usages that had been so abundantly blessed of God, became very sacred in the eyes of the Methodist people. No one could blame them for that.—Yet it does not follow that these usages should be elevated into tests of membership in the Church of God. They may be wonderful revival agencies, and yet not appropriate to a place in any ecclesiastical code as conditions of communion.

Every association that has life enough to cause growth, will take, by a sort of spontaneous action, a form corresponding to its nature.—It will grow into this form in spite of opposing causes. Its own legislators may mistake its nature, and enact laws alien to its character.—But, in spite of all, it will take its own shape. Its growth is from within. It will cast off all effete customs and laws, and be a law unto itself. There is a limit to the power of the legislator, imposed by the very nature of the community for which the legislation is intended. Arising out of the very fact that the Methodist community is no longer a mere society, but a church, is the consequence that many of the laws made when it was a society, and adapted to it in that state, still remaining upon its statute book, have become utterly obsolete, and no one ever pretends to enforce them. In other cases, as for instance, the rules for Band Societies, a tardy legislation has conformed the Discipline to the long established facts governing the case.

It is preposterous to suppose that Mr. Wesley, if he had been legislating for a church, would have visited upon so slight an offence as non-attendance of class-meetings, the dreadful penalty of excommunication. It is in the very character of some persons, deeply experienced in the things of God, not to relish class-meetings. It is only to a chosen friend that they are willing to open the sanctuary of the interior life, and expose its sacred privacy. The class-room does not suit their temperament. They may not be very well adapted to revival operations, and might be worked out of a vigorous system of such agencies, and yet be very dear to God, and of great use in the church.—The church cannot restrict itself to a single function, as a society may very well do. It must embrace the conservative as well as the aggressive element. It must provide for the Christian life in every form of its manifestation; not only the bold and out-spoken, but the timid and retiring.

Christian fellowship, involving as it does so many varieties and shades of character, and providing, as it must, for all the delicate peculiarities of individual life, cannot be put into the straight-jacket of a rigid system. It must be allowed some spontaneity of expression.

Mark it; I have not said one word against class-meetings. No. To a very large class of the children of God they are a most precious means of grace. For many they are a most appropriate method of Christian fellowship. The whole of my meaning is, that attendance upon them ought not to be made a test of membership in the church. Nor is it. I have been a traveling preacher now for twenty-five years, and my observation is, that not one half of the members of the church ever attend class-meetings, and only a very small number attend habitually. In a large proportion of societies such meetings are never held, and, in consequence, many of the members have no opportunity of attending. Upon extensive inquiry I am convinced that this state of things is well nigh universal in the church. And no one ever thinks of expelling the delinquents. I have never known but one instance of a preacher proceeding to the extremity of expulsion for this offence, and then it was against two or three men obnoxious to him on other grounds. His successor, however, took them all back into the church, without any confession or promise of amendment. It is not too much to say that the rule is, and has been for at least a quarter of a century, totally in disuse. It is dead—stone dead. Yet one General Conference after another persists in keeping the carcass unburied upon the pages of the Discipline.

Now I submit, has not the Church kept this corpse in state sufficiently long?

Those persons who get their information in reference to us from the Discipline, form a false idea of us. They are misled. They cannot know that the common law of the Church contradicts the statute. Yet such is the fact. The common law of the Church has cast off the old society rules, but they remain in the statute law.

The fact is, among our preachers and many of the people, there has been all along a great dread of any departure from "Old Methodism." A very praiseworthy feeling. It is a very natural concomitant of the best style of religious sentiment.—The fact is, when I have seen the grey hairs of Dr. L. Pierce rising in the midst of the assembly of the church, and to have heard him pleading for the Methodism of the fathers—the old landmarks—class-meetings, particularly, I have been so carried away with veneration for the spirit that prompted it, as to be scarcely able to think clearly upon the subject. God bless those grey hairs! May they dignify many a Conference session in the years to come. I love to look upon them.—They are themselves a history.

But is it not high time that our legislation and administration should be conformed to each other? I feel sure no one thinks of expelling class-delinquents. One thing only remains—change the law.—Provide for voluntary classes. But let no General Conference hereafter menace us with that terrible statute. We know, to be sure, that when the members get back home, cease to be Methodist legislators, whose high duty it is to conserve old Methodism, and become again mere Christian pastors in our midst, the very instincts of the pastoral office will cause them to lay the formidable rule aside, and almost to forget how they voted, and what brave speeches they made in its behalf.

But we would somewhat prefer, from the very love we bear them, that their legislation should harmonize more closely with their administrative history.

I think every pastor who has had any experience feels, that it is impossible for us to get back to the enforcement of the rule. It would exclude, not the unworthy alone, but many of the most worthy members of the church. All the piety that is in the church cannot be brought together habitually in the class-room. And where is the pastor who can feel it to be consistent with the character of his office to pronounce sentence of excommunication upon a man of devout christian habits, whose only fault is that he does not relish this particular and arbitrary form of communion? I dare say the stoutest defender of the rule would revolt against the performance of such an act.

Is membership in the church a thing of so little value, as that upon any arbitrary ground a man may be deprived of it? I fear, indeed, that it is held too cheaply by many. To the well-informed Christian it must seem far otherwise. There is nothing earthly to be compared with it. Christian character depends greatly upon it. It includes the most precious Christian privileges. To the weak, it is a privilege of especial value. Their hope of salvation may almost be said to hinge upon it. They require the aids of the church to support them in the Christian warfare. For these reasons excommunication is to be resorted to for the gravest cause.—When the patient efforts of the church fail of their corrective effect, and the presence of the incorrigible offender in the church is seriously detrimental, then must the solemn alternative of expulsion be resorted to, to save the body of Christ from infection. But it must not be done simply to maintain some arbitrary rules, or to carry out some favorite method.

I appeal to the good sense of the Church. Are not these views correct? Then why hesitate? Why not put the Church in harmony with itself at once? Why make the young preachers enter in to solemn covenant to keep all the rules, in the face of the fact that one of them, at least, is never observed by any one, and will not be by them? M.

Marshall, Texas, Jan. 30, 1866.

INFLUENCE.—Remember the power of indirect influences—those which distil from a sudden, brilliant effort. The former never fail; the latter often. There is good done of which we can never predicate the when or where. It lies in that invisible influence on character which He alone can read who counted the seven thousand nameless ones in Israel."

"THE FATHERS."

From various indications it is clear that considerable and important modifications in our ecclesiastical system are desired and contemplated. The contemplated changes look to an increase of the number and duties of Bishops; the extension of the pastorate to four or more years, whenever deemed advisable by the Bishops; some modification of the rules touching class-meeting; the abolition of the probationary system, and a change in the mode of receiving members into our communion; and possibly considerable modifications in the Presiding Eldership. Such, at least, are some of the subjects, with others of minor importance, discussed in Methodist circles and journals.

The advocates of these proposed modifications and changes sincerely think them provident and important, and likely to result in the increased efficiency of our system.—While the opposers of these views think that no such changes are necessary or desirable; that the modifications suggested, if really made, could only work evil. One of the reasons given for this opinion is, that—"Our fathers were as wise, if not wiser, than we are, and doubtless quite as holy, and therefore it is not likely that we can change our system for the better—that the system has worked well, and that we had better let well enough alone."

We propose to consider this question of ecclesiastical ancestry, how we should regard it, and what influence it should have upon our legislation.

What we have in the form of church institutions we have inherited from our fathers, who were wise and good men, and worthy of our most profound veneration. No wise man will lightly estimate their wisdom or their works, or feel otherwise than grateful for their eminent services.

The peculiar doctrines which we as a Church maintain and preach, we have, in a certain sense, inherited from our fathers. It is true, they found them in the Scriptures, and in the preaching of the Apostles; but they had long been obscured by glosses and erroneous interpretations. These doctrines they cleared of the mists of error, and brought out into clear light, and left them thus purified from obscurity, as an inheritance to us of priceless value.

Their work in this field of labor was no easy task. They had their own prejudices to overcome, and the prejudices of their age. These prejudices were venerable and deeply rooted. If any dared to disturb them, "sacrilegious woodman, spare the tree," was deprecatingly, if not harshly sounded on every side. It is difficult for us to realize, who live in an age when our theological views are respected, and seldom assailed, to appreciate the labor and moral courage requisite to set them forth and successfully maintain them. In this work their zeal and wisdom are above all praise. There has never been any dissatisfaction among us as to the Theology of our fathers. That was built upon a rock, and no storms or flood shall ever sweep it down.

Our itinerant ministry, which has been, under God, an instrument of so much efficiency in spreading scriptural holiness over various parts of the globe, has been handed down to us by our fathers. They found nothing like it in the ecclesiastical systems of their time; but the necessities of the world suggested the plan, and though it was against the prejudices of their education, and was chargeable with novelty, and was met, like every new thing, with opposition, they braved all, persevered, and the world inherits the great result—an itinerant ministry, with well organized Conferences in the British Islands, in North America, France, Germany and Australia.

So much, then, for our exalted appreciation of our honored fathers. Our fathers did not claim infallibility; they knew themselves too well—they would have been the last to have claimed perfection in legislation and wisdom. They legislated for the needs of their age, and legislated wisely; but they were not endowed with the Spirit of Prophecy; they could not foresee what changes would pass upon society, or what exigencies would arise, and therefore could not legislate for the unknown and distant future. Some one of the framers of the Constitution of the United States said, "Give me a Constitution that will last fifty years." He asked enough; no reasonable man could ask for more. No man, unless inordinately vain, could suppose his wisdom perfect enough to devise institutions adapted (without any modifications) to the ever-unfolding and ever-varying phases of human society, through all its ages and all its mutations. A wise and prudent man seeks to solve the political, social and ecclesiastical problems of his own times—to adapt institutions to those times—but no more. Ancestry and posterity are alike out of his reach and beyond his control. The Past did what it wished, or could, and the Future will do the same.

I take it then that our business, as men seeking to do good, is not so much to consider what suited the times of our fathers, or what may suit some future age, but rather what the exigencies of our times demand. I hold that each generation, by the very nature of the case, is the best judge of its own wants, and has the clearest right to modify existing institutions, or to abolish them altogether, and establish others that may be better suited to its circumstances.

The New Testament is singularly reserved and reticent in relation to forms and institutions. Archbishop Whateley—a great authority—has said, that "The Holy Ghost has shown as much wisdom in what he withheld as in what he communicated." The silence of Revelation in relation to most all ecclesiastical institutions and forms, while it is so full and clear upon all theological questions, plainly evinces the importance, in God's estimation, of the one, and the comparative non-importance of the other, and therefore the liberty of Christian men to adopt such institutions and forms as in their godly judgment may best subserve the cause of Christ, and be most promotive of the happiness and salvation of men.

This would seem to be a reasonable and allowable course of procedure; but all history and all experience teach us, that all suggestions that look to any change in the existing order of things, are called novelties and innovations; and this would little matter if those who use these terms did not thereby intend to brand those suggestions looking to changes, as odious. Everything was a novelty once—earth and man were novelties. The Ten Commandments, the Sermon on the Mount, the Lord's Supper and Baptism were once new things and innovations.—When the first Pyramid was built, some of the three-score men said, What new-fangled thing is this? But objectors do not always confine themselves to supposed odious designations of new suggestions, but the suggestors themselves are charged with vainly thinking themselves wiser than our fathers, or else are charged with wishing to make themselves famous, or meanly seeking some selfish and personal end, under pretext of promoting the public good. I submit such treatment is not the offspring of enlightened reason or Christian charity, but rather it has the look and language of narrowness and bigotry. To one really seeking truth, and desiring to do good, such treatment is certainly not pleasant; but it will never deter any really earnest man from an open avowal or bold defence of his convictions.

Conservatism has its excellences; so sensible are men of this, (that as a rule) they bear with the evils of existing institutions for a long period, for fear of the greater evils which may possibly result from change. Conservatism must, however, have its limits, or else all progress must be barred, and society come to a dead lock. The Arabs are, perhaps, the most conservative people known to history. Three thousand years ago, in the days of the Pharoahs, they were wild men, living in tents, herding cattle, robbing the travelers, and through all the mutations of thirty centuries, have continued the same, and are the same in the year of grace 1866. The Roman Church claims infallibility, and puts forth her whole might to be conservative. She opposed the great Reformation with faggot and flame, dagger and dungeon. One of her Bishops said—"We must put down printing, or printing will put us down." These specimens of conservatism do not seem to teach that it is always an unmingled good.

Our fathers, whose illustrious names and deeds we justly venerate, were the last men to retain anything merely because it was old, and had once been useful, or to be deterred from the adoption of anything useful, lest it should be charged with being a novelty. The peculiarities of Methodism were once novelties, or else they would not have been peculiarities. But these new things (in their judgments) were useful, and demanded by the exigencies of their times, and without stopping to inquire what men might think, or say, they promptly and boldly adopted them. If they were with us to-day, and were animated by the same spirit that glowed in their hearts of old, they would be the first fearlessly to adopt whatever might seem to be demanded by the needs of our times.

We submit there is nothing immodest—no arrogant assumption of superiority over the venerable wisdom of the Past, in proposing any changes or modifications which the changed condition of society may seem to demand. The march of time and the mutation of human affairs has a hundred times mocked the pride of human reason. Ideas and institutions once deemed the brightest offspring of Wisdom, and essential to the existence of society, have become obsolete, unsuited to the needs of the world, thrown aside as worn out, and numbered with the countless things that were. So it will be with many of the things of the Present. They will "perish in the using." God alone can legislate for all time, all latitudes and all men, for his eye alone comprehends at one glance all the needs of all the ages.

Whoever wishes to change or modify existing institutions—to inaugurate any new methods of Christian enterprise, must make up his mind to meet the opposition of the immutable conservative, whose motto is—"Whatever is, is best," and therefore no change ought to be made or can be made for the better. Thus, the let-the-present-alone-men would never plant, lest the seed might never come up—would never leave port, lest a storm might arise. The great, original, enterprising minds, who have led in the van of human progress, have never stopped to consult these moral and intellectual petrifactions; but, animated by a noble desire to be useful to their race and their age, have passed by the fossilized worshippers of the Past, and pressed for the mark of the prize, running with patience the race set before them.—Let us go and do likewise. W.

THE LAW OF THE SABBATH.

The observance of the Sabbath is essential to the spread of Christianity, and to its transmission from one age to another. The Sabbath is the centre of the system—the keystone of the arch. Without it, the Gospel would have no opportunity of exerting its benign influences on the masses—of giving forth, in public assemblies, its loud and solemn utterances of warning and instruction. For how could mankind retain a knowledge of the great doctrines of the Cross, unless they were plainly and publicly taught them? And how could they be publicly taught them, unless there was a specific day on which, by common consent, they might assemble for the purpose?

The necessity and importance, therefore, of the Sabbath, as a day of religious instruction and meditation—the honor which it confers on God—the peace and quiet which it brings to man—the rest it imparts to the body—the solemn pause it secures to all the secularities of life—these, with other most weighty considerations, combine in enforcing the command of the Decalogue—"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy."

It has, however, been contended by some, that the Sabbath day is a Jewish institution, and being simply national and ceremonial in its character, is not of perpetual and universal obligation. But can it not be shown that the Sabbath was instituted long before the Jewish nation existed, and although incorporated into the civil and ecclesiastical polity of that people, it never exclusively belonged to them, but is binding in all its force upon the people of every country and every age.

Our first argument is drawn from its great antiquity. The Sabbath was instituted two thousand years before the Jewish nation existed—It is as old as the creation. It was given by God to the first man, Adam. It is then binding on us—because Adam was a public character, and acted in a public capacity. Adam was not merely our great progenitor; he was also our federal head and representative. Adam negotiated with the Court of Heaven, not only for himself, but for all his posterity. This is one of the plainest doctrines of the Bible. Consequently, according to the laws of imputation and representation, all Adam's acts become our acts; all Adam's institutions become our institutions. If, therefore, the institution of the Sabbath was observed by Adam, it must likewise be observed by us, for the same reason that we observe the institution of marriage.

Where, then, is the evidence that the Sabbath was known to our great progenitor? It is found in the Book of Genesis, 2d chapter, 2d and 3d verses: "On the second day God ended his work which he had made, and he rested on the sabbath day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the sabbath day and sanctified it, because that on it He had rested from all his work which God created and made."

Adam was created on the sixth day; the next day was the sacred day of rest. Hence, the first rising sun which Adam ever saw, ushered in the hallowed rest of the new-born Sabbath.

But we have other evidence that the Sabbath is as old as the creation. We find traces of its existence and partial observance in the history of every nation of antiquity, both Jewish and heathen.—Begin with the history of the Jews in the wilderness, as they were journeying from Egypt to Palestine and before they reached Mount Sinai. Observe how regularly they abstained from the gathering of manna, at the close of every sixth day, in order that they might rest on the seventh. Mark how familiarly Moses refers to the Sabbath, in the giving of the Ten Commandments. He there takes for granted that the Jews knew of the Sabbath before the giving of the law on Sinai. For he says, "Remember the Sabbath day"—implying it had been previously known.

Now go further back into the history of the Jews, and you will still find proofs of the existence of the Sabbath. Examine the history of Job, forty years previous to the giving of the law, and you will find familiar mention of the Sabbath.—Go two hundred and fifty years further back to the time of Jacob, and you will observe that he observed the Sabbath. Go one hundred and fifty years further back, to the time of Abraham, and you will find that he knew the Sabbath. Then go back one hundred and fifty years further, to the time of Noah, and you will perceive that he also observed the Sabbath. In this way the Sabbath can be traced back to Adam.

Now turn from the history of the Jews to the history of early heathen nations, and go back till all history is lost in fable, or is merged in the Mosaic narrative. The Sabbath is mentioned by Homer, the author of Greek poetry. He says—"The seventh day is the day on which all things were finished." It is referred to by Lineus, another early Grecian writer, who says—"The seventh day is an auspicious day, for it is the birthday of all things." It is mentioned by Philo, an early Egyptian writer. He asserts that "the Sabbath is a festival, not peculiar to any one country, but is common to all the world." Josephus, the Jewish historian, tells us, that in his day, "there was no city, either of Greeks or Barbarians, where the obligation of the Sabbath was not known." And the learned Grotius declares, "that the memory of the creation being performed in seven days, was preserved not only among the Greeks and Italians, but also among the Celts and Indians, all of whom divided their time into weeks." Thus we find traces of the Sabbath among all the nations of antiquity.

And now the important question presents itself—how did those early heathen nations acquire their knowledge of the Sabbath? Whence could have arisen this universal practice of dividing time into weeks, and of showing such marked deference to the seventh day? How happened it that people inhabiting different countries, speaking different languages, and adhering to different religions, all agree in this one practice? Would their notions respecting astronomy have led them to such a division of time? No—their astronomical views would have led them to divide their time into months, and days, and years, but would never have suggested to them a division of time into weeks. Weeks are unnatural divisions of time, suggested by no revolutions of the heavenly bodies. Nor did the ancient heathen derive their knowledge of weeks from the Jews. For many of these nations existed before the Jews were embodied into a nation. Some of them never heard of the Jews, and some entertained for Jewish customs a very strong abhorrence.

The only method then of account-ing for the early and universal practice of dividing time into weeks is, that it was communicated by God to Adam, in Paradise, as was the rite of marriage—handed down by tradition among the antediluvian Patriarchs—then scattered after the flood among all the nations of the earth.

COLORED CONFERENCE.—The Washington Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, colored, held its first session in the national capital, commencing on the 18th and closing on the 23d October. Bishop Simpson presided over the deliberations of this body. If one-half the Methodist says with regard to the order, ability, "correct and deliberate reading," short and pertinent speeches, etc., etc., be true, its deliberations may be taken as a model for imitation by many of the white Conferences of Northern Methodism. We note that the Rev. J. Lanahan, and the Rev. Drs. Riley, Brown and Morgan were in attendance during the greater part of the session.

A Branch of the Methodist Publishing House is located in this city, and the Rev. R. J. Harp has recently been appointed Agent of it. It has on hand a good supply of our Church Publications—a large one of Hymn Books.

The well known enterprise and industry of the Agent is the best assurance that can be given that all orders will be promptly and correctly filled. The Express Companies for a trifle will insure the safe delivery of any books which our friends in the country may order.—Address Rev. R. J. Harp, New Orleans, No. 112 Camp street.

SOUTHERN GERMAN CHURCH.

In this city our German preachers are hard at it. Bro. Pauley is doing a very fine work in Lafayette. A great revival is under way. One of the old style, brick-bat, Wesleyan revivals; where the people aronnd the door, outside the house, "make a noise"—like they used to in the 59th Psalm. We attended an old fashioned love-feast—all in Dutch—last Sabbath. The singing was delighful; and some, who had been great sinners, but who, by the love and power of the Spirit, had become great saints, spoke in all the beauty of fresh truth.

The Sabbath previous we attended one of the largest love-feasts we have ever held among the Germans, at Craps street Church.

We only wish that Satan found it necessary to throw stones at all our Churches, "not once or twice."

We cannot be mistaken in the signs of the times. The people are willing to respond to our earnest and persistent ministration of God's word. They are in the best possible condition for hearing, and faith comes by hearing. Whenever men are full of thought, especially in the direction of the providential dealing of God, they are ready to hear. Happy the preacher who has the courage, the zeal and the faith to strike while the Spirit moves upon the people. Many an occasion for saving men, and glorifying God, has been sacrificed to the fear of failure—in other words, to the reputation of the poor mortal who imagines that he is the observed of men and angels. Dear man, sacrifice yonrself, and save souls.

The Rev. C. C. Hoffman, a devoted missionary in Africa, has recently fallen in his distant field of labor.

An exchange paper records the death of Rev. Dr. Montgomery, the leader of the Unitarians in Ireland. He died in Belfast, in December last.

The wonderful revival in Sweden took its rise from a sailor, awakened, converted and baptized in a Baptist Bethel or church for sailors, in New York.

THE SAVIOUR AMONG HIS FRIENDS.

PART I.—MATT. XXVI.

The Saviour reclined at the table, the guest of Simon the Leper. Twas "there they made him a supper." It is not unlikely that the especial friends of the Saviour in Bethany contributed to the substance as well as to the good fellowship of the occasion. A more illustrious company never surrounded the table; no, not even that one which the Patriarch spread, when the angels partook of his hospitality. Here, the Saviour himself, at once Lord and Guest—Lazarus, the man who had just been raised from the dead—Simon, who had been cured of leprosy, a living death—the sisters, Mary, Martha—and the twelve Apostles. It was the first day of that eventful week which immediately preceded the crucifixion—that period of surprises, sorrows—of defeat and triumph—immeasurable, unutterable—the company all happy in their glorious Friend. He alone conscious of the impending storm.

The mention of such an incident as this supper, would, doubtless, be reckoned out of place by any other than an inspired historian, who might be reciting those events which introduce the Great Tragedy.

The love of the Saviour never flowed more sweetly than when at the table, among his friends. It was at supper that he uttered that divine Law of Hospitality—"When thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, and thou shalt be blessed." While at the table of another Simon, he declared the Law of Mercy—the "Two Debtors." And at a wedding, that he discoursed upon the Beauty of Humility—"Friend go up higher." These great truths, worthy of Sinai, or Olivet, were reserved to crown the place, the circle, and the enjoyment of his own friends; for they are to constitute forever the Law of Good Fellowship.

We never think of the attention which He received at the hands of the two sisters, of Simon, of the wife of Chuza, and others "who ministered to him of their substance," or those bolder offices of friendship afterward by Joseph and Nicodemus, which tenderly cared for that bruised form, without thanking them in our heart. He that had so often comforted others, was not himself insensible to these deeds of love.

And on the present occasion the crowning act of the feast is the costly and grateful offering which Mary presents to the Lord—to Him who had called out of the grave her beloved brother. It was an "alabaster box of ointment, of spikenard, very precious," which she brought and poured upon the head and feet of the Saviour. This perfume of kings, her treasure of love, which had been gathered a drop at a time, like the oil of precious flowers, she poured forth in rich profusion upon the person of her Lord.

Strangely enough, it is revealed to us by the Heart-Searcher, that this refined, generous attention was the occasion of and the initial moment when the treachery of Judas was conceived. There can be no greater contrast than that which this statement affords, between love and covetousness—Mary and Judas—the one so uncalculating; the other, so all-calculating; the one represented here as stirring up the other. From that hour to this, these two forces have struggled, and the Gospel message waits upon the issue. Judas betrayed his Lord, and the spirit of covetousness betrayed the Church. It requires the generosity of Mary to declare the story of her Lord; it was therefore a just reward that "wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her."

The love of money is the source of "all evil;" the love of the Saviour the source of all good. That the love of money should have flourished in the face of Christ, should be the particular wickedness which conceived his betrayal, clearly proves that it contains and expresses a large part of the viciousness of fallen nature. The advance of Christianity implies a victory over this universal vice and will displace it from the heart and from the Church. When it gains this ground, it will have gained the whole world, for covetousness holds the last citadel. These thoughts have been set down because the embodiment of this great evil was already sitting among the disciples, and marring the fellowship of the saints. The voice of Judas is often heard in the hour of generous sacrifice, "To what purpose is this waste!" While the Saviour is about to give his life for the world, and Mary is pouring out the costly stores of her love, Covetousness lifts its wailing notes—"This might have been sold for three hundred pence and given to the poor."

If values were only to be exchanged for values, and all our deeds to be estimated only by the amount of "value received," there was in this act an extravagance, a prodigality; she could not afford it. If our charities are to take a mercantile cast, and the good accomplished to be narrowly searched, looked after, weighed, then this ointment "might have been sold"—the unbroken cruse might have been offered to the Lord, when it could have been turned into money, and that money given to the poor. Two holy deeds out of one cruse. Now, the alabaster was broken, the precious nard shed, its perfume wafted through the house, the perceptible value gone—forever gone!

It is well—"She hath wrought a good work upon me." The Queen of Sheba came with spicery and gold, frankincense and myrrh, a present to Solomon, for she was a Queen; but this woman, "she hath done what she could"—her offering is the "odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God."

Yes, we may give to the Saviour—we may give to Him, "asking nothing again." Men may see values, dispute on the fat of lambs, in the smoke of the sacrifice, and in the odor of the burnt-offering.—What matter?—they give to the Lord. They tell their love by it; it is the tongue of their gratitude. The cattle on all the hills are his; but this lamb of your hand, though it be burned in the fire, is better than all—it tells the gratitude and love of one free spirit. The voice of the soul must be heard, and this gift is its utterance.

EVANGELISM.

We copy the following from the "Episcopal Methodist," (Southern) at Richmond, Virginia:

Methodism, whose honorable designation was so happily expressed by Dr. Chalmers as "Christianity in earnest," is losing the depth and intensity of that hallowed inspiration which crowned the first century of its existence, and is relapsing into that ecclesiastical quiescence by which it is surrendering its original distinction, and sinking into the very formalism against which its previous history was a perpetual protest.

Its vitality, it is true, partially survives, but is spasmodic and sporadic, so to speak, and not that grand, steady, resistless ministration of gospel power which it formerly was. It was, in all its exhibitions, a flame of holy fire; a beacon light in the earth. It has acquired a name, and occupies a distinguished place, but it has receded from its aggressive energy, and subsided into comparative stagnation. Its progressive force is greatly paralyzed, and its accelerated progress, as the leader of spiritual aggression, has measurably paused. It has lost, to a painful extent, its vitalizing force. Its lofty evangelization has declined, and given place to a rather monotonous repetition of its doctrines and its symbols. Where are now the overwhelming appeals of its earlier preachers? Where are the wonderful demonstrations of its power? Where are the holiness, the joy, the zeal of its adherents? Allowing for the modifying influences of various causes that ought to be taken into the account, we are constrained to concede that a melancholy change has passed over its character, as a reformatory institution, and that its onward career has been visibly retarded.

In this spiritual enervation is its chief peril as an organization. Mr. Wesley deprecated it more than any other calamity, and predicted that if it ever should become morally stagnant, and fail to fulfil its mission of spreading scriptural holiness, God would supplant it, by raising up another agency to take its honored place; and Isaac Taylor, who was filled with admiration at its unparalleled success, in its better days, has not hesitated to assert, from certain tendencies in the system, that, in the not distant future, it would change its form, and yield to a different and higher Methodism. Inasmuch as its characteristic peculiarity is its experimental efficiency, more than its doctrinal distinctions, great as these are, if it surrender the former there is reason to apprehend the truth of this prophetic foresight. Its Arminianism will not preserve it, if its pure evangelism expire. Neither its doctrinal landmarks nor its usages are sufficiently contradistinguished from other ecclesiastical formulas to insure its denominational integrity. It must stand upon the combined platform of scriptural theology and scriptural life.—This is its title deed to longevity. It will otherwise disintegrate and dissolve, and merge itself into some other religious movement with which its theoretical views possess affinity, either proximate or remote; either nascent or developed.

While, therefore, we are solicitous to reform its auxiliaries and to enlarge its boundaries; while we are anxious to improve its machinery; to adapt its apparatus to the course of events, our greatest concern should be to renew its altar-fires, revive its living energy, invoke its primitive baptism, return to its original experience, practice its self-denial, restore its discipline, reproduce its simplicity of manners, methodise our lives, and observe its prudential regulations as means of practical godliness. If to this resuscitation of its inner life we superadd such subordinate improvements in its exterior morality as mature wisdom may suggest, the Methodism of the future will be the Methodism of the past, amended only in its providential economy.

To retrieve its religious status is our first work, and it is not easy. We have to perform the humiliating paradox of progressing backwards. It behooves us at the outset to retrace our steps, until we reach the point of our divergence from the piety of our fathers. To use a military phrase, we must fall back to our entrenchments, re-organize our lines, and prepare for a concentrated advance movement under our great Captain. We say, that however necessary, this is not easy. It is personally difficult. How then shall we estimate the obstacles attending the moral reformation of a whole denomination?

It is obvious that this process must commence with the leaders themselves—that the ministers of all grades must set the example in a renewed consecration to their work. Several prerequisites are demanded of them.

First—A constant and profound communion with God; a "life hid with Christ in God;" the abiding unction of the Holy Ghost; the mighty power of prevailing prayer.

Secondly—A character for practical holiness, that shall illustrate before the world the Methodistic standard of religion—its complete freedom, its boldness and its beauty.

Thirdly—A deep and devout familiarity with the Scriptures, so remarkably distinctive of the old Methodist preachers.—Their repeated and prayerful perusal of the Bible kept alive their zeal, and supplied their theology. Mr. Wesley's motto was—homo unius libri—a man of one book.—No man read other useful books more than he, and yet no man studied and imbibed the Scriptures more. Our fault is, that we read other books to the neglect of the Bible. We should be wise in the one, but wiser in the other, above all that is written.

Fourthly—We must remodel the style of preaching, as Methodists. The Methodist pulpit of the day has degenerated into a sort of eclecticism that has let go the prominent features of the truth by which it was at first so potent in its influence.—It has adopted a diffuse, diluted generality of doctrinal inculcation, and a perverted and sensational style, that has lowered its dignity and emasculated its power. The taste of our hearers has consequently become so morbid, that they will not endure that directness and explicitness, without which preaching will never produce substantial results. We need robustness of matter and plainness of manner, as become the ministers of God. The desire of popularity must be sacrificed to the one controlling motive of saving souls. Then will the golden age return to bless our Zion. Then will the fears and predictions of miscarriage be contradicted by a vitalization that will ensure perennial life and perpetual progression, and Methodism be again another name for "Christianity in earnest."

BISHOP SOULE.—The Tennessee Conference, at its recent session, passed by a unanimous vote the following resolutions, as a tribute of respect to the venerable patriarch of Southern Methodism. His brief and characteristic reply is appended:

We hail; with devout gratitude to Almighty God, the presence of our venerable father, Bishop Soule, in our midst, and would thus bring the returns of grateful hearts to our Heavenly Father for that Providence which has safely brought him through the afflictions and sorrows of the past, and that we, as a Conference, have been permitted once more to shake his hand and receive his blessing.

The Bishop responded briefly:

"I am thankful for this expression of the Conference. I left my father's house January 6th, 1799, to enter the traveling connection. I have been a traveling preacher ever since. There is no other man living now that was an itinerant minister then. I stand a monument alone of the grace of God. I have seen the Providence of God in the United States and Europe—on the land and on the ocean. I have buried men—have seen disasters on the sea and on the land, but the Providence of God has kept me safe all the time unharmed. I am grateful to God." Being interrupted by a fit of coughing, he took his seat, remarking, "I can say no more."

BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.—An important admission is made in an article of the "Methodist," of Feb. 10, in the following words:

In March, 1861, a majority of the ministers of the Baltimore Conference declared themselves withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Nearly all of these ministers, during the war, were shut up within the lines of the enemy, in Virginia. Some of them became officers in the rebel army, and nearly all of them were thoroughly committed to the cause of the rebellion. It was hoped by many sanguine people, that with the downfall of the rebellion and slavery these brethren would seek to return to their old ecclesiastical relations, and that strife might cease with the cessation of its causes. This has turned out to be a shallow view. It placed undue reliance on the sword, and made insufficient account of human pride and long-fostered prejudices. The sabre has no power over the heart; it may coerce legislation in the state, but religion is eminently the sphere of sentiment and conviction. It is sincere or worse than nothing.

PROTESTANTISM ADVANCING IN BELGIUM.—The progress of the Missionary work in Belgium continues uninterrupted. There are about sixty Protestant laborers at work, of whom thirteen preachers receive salaries from the government, twenty-three from the Evangelical Society—ten being converts from Popery—and the remainder are colporteurs, Scripture readers and schoolteachers.

Nearly all the church members are converts from Romanism—in some churches there not being a born Protestant, and in several only one. The Evangelical Society has added a church a year for the last eight years to the number of its churches.

The Puseyites of Oxford, England, have recently published the Book of Common Prayer in Latin.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

Northern Church—Intentions of the Bishops—Religion in New York—Radicalism Unreasonable—The N. Y. Watchman—The Centenary Sensation, etc.

Some of us are looking to the destiny of Southern Methodism with profound interest. The present struggle of the Northern Church is to become master of the situation. If that Church cannot outgeneral you in the next eight or ten months, the prosperity of the Methodist Episcopal Church South is a fixed fact.

The effort to obtain a foothold in your territory, first by military authority, and when that failed, by missionaries, is expressive of the earnestness of fanaticism, and the persistence of an unscrupulous purpose to substitute your Church, if possible. The Bishops of the Northern Church do not conceal their intentions in respect to you. In public addresses, and still more boldly in private conversations, they declare the policy of Northern Methodism to be, to speedily overthrow, if it cannot absorb your Church.

Never before was there a more daring ecclesiastical ambition exhibited than that of Northern Methodism. If that Church was as anxious to save souls as to acquire the reputation of being the grand, governing denomination of the United States, we would behold her Bishops and clergy laboring in the highways of the North, among the crowded multitudes of sinners that are thronging the broad road to perdition. They would show their faith and zeal by "labors more abundant" in behalf of the poor, the outcasts, the criminal thousands around them. But no; they leave this vast field unreaped, that they may have the name of being a Church co-extensive with the country, and are therefore begging for funds to send men into the South.

Bishop Simpson employs his eloquence, and Bishop Ames his shrewdness, and the other Bishops their wits and influence in this undertaking.

They are taking advantage of the enthusiasm of the Centenary spirit to get the money from the people necessary for the Southern invasion. Bishop Simpson said in his address recently at the Missionary Anniversary, that the war had struck a great blow for the unity of the country, broken the bonds of four millions of people, opened a grand field for missionary operations that gladdened the hearts of philanthropists, (?) and, exclaimed he—"into this field the Methodist Episcopal Church means to enter with its men and means."

We have now an able paper here, to which Conservative Christians may look with some hope, as the first sign of a bold, direct struggle with Northern Methodism. I refer to the Watchman, which, I see, you have already noticed in the Advocate. Dr. Deems is, I believe, succeeding finely. Though I have not heard him say anything personally of his prospects, a friend of his informed me that the paper was regarded as a success.

The religious condition of New York is hard to describe. I believe, honestly, that in proportion to the population, there is less piety in this city than in any other city, unless you except Paris or Naples, within the bounds of Christendom. The best people lament it, and say they feel sure that some judgment of Providence will be visited upon the wickedness of the place. Money! money! money! this is the god they worship. This is the pearl of great price that they seek. Fashionable church people and worthy preachers tell you, however, that this is a day of progress, and that religion is not now what it used to be. It was not understood by the fathers. They, dear good old souls, were not up to the science of modern times.

It is sad to see Methodism gradually losing its character for piety, and degenerating into an ape of other denominations. Yet in some of the Methodist Churches here a great show of "old Methodism" is still kept up. They have class-meetings, and love-feasts, and talk lovingly of the liberated slave, and get quite happy over the homeless negroes that are now starving and dying down South, in perfect freedom.

It is vain for you Southern editors to attempt to make your position understood by the radical portion of the Northern people. They do not know you; do not wish to think they are mistaken in regard to you; persist in saying over and over that old falsehood that you denounced several times in the Advocate, viz: that the Southern people hate the freedmen.

In conversation they are far more bitter and intolerant than in published articles. Yet it is gratifying to be able to assure you that there are not a few who appreciate Southern character, Southern interests and Southern piety. They are sprinkled about in all the various denominations, and have not a single nucleus around which to concentrate their influence. For years to come radicalism will succeed in preventing the perfect union among the people of the two sections.—The radicals in church and state are violently opposed to union.—They are for the possession of the whole of your property, your rights, your churches, your country. They claim that you have no country and no rights. They are not willing to share even your own with you—they want the whole of it for themselves. They do not want you in the Union. They loved the war, because it gave them a chance, like thieves at a fire, of enriching themselves. They oppose fraternization with you.

The religious conservatives are without an organization, and without therefore the influence needful to redeem this Northern land from the follies of radicalism. The evil must work out its own destiny and eat the bitter fruit of its own doings before the thing can be corrected.

While Mr. Beecher is becoming mild and gentle towards the South, Northern Methodism continues to be fierce. I do not think, however, Beecher's change of tone is of much consequence. He is never the same thing long. His popularity demands variety. Anything for a sensation, appears to be Beecher's rule. Northern Methodism plays a far deeper game. It is deeply in earnest in prosecuting its power-seeking purposes, and it will take no back step.

As to the general news, I do not know that there is anything that would interest your readers. The secular life of New York is abundant in items, but business matters and amusements are not the sort, perhaps, to edify the readers of a religious journal. The Methodist religious world is just now chiefly occupied with the Centenary hobby. Centenary speeches, Centenary collections, Centenary sensations of every description. It is a rare opportunity for this sensation-loving population.

The people here have grand notions of anything that sounds big. They are worshippers of the big in everything. Big speeches, big book concerns, big missionary operations, big church-extension societies. They like to be thought a big people. They glory in this much more than they do in the Cross.

New York, Jan. 29, 1866.

SYNOD OF VIRGINIA.

This able and influential body closed a session of unusual interest, in Lynchburg, week before last.—We cull from its proceedings an item of general importance to the country, and of special value to ourselves, as a denomination. The coincidence in our respective relations to Northern churches, is remarkably striking, and their firm and decided stand against ecclesiastical connection with the General Assembly North, is so corroborative of our own, that we publish its action with peculiar pleasure.—Epis. Methodist.

The following resolutions were presented by Dr. Hoge, and after due consideration, were unanimously adopted:

In view of the peculiar circumstances in which the Presbyterian Church in these Southern States is placed, the Synod of Virginia deems it proper, for the protection of vital principles affecting the welfare and honor of religion, the peace and purity of the churches under its care, as well as for the information of the people composing them, to adopt the following resolutions:

1. Inasmuch as the Presbyterian Church in these Southern States has had for several years a separate and distinct organization, with all the ordinary agencies for the great work of home and foreign evangelization; and whereas, in the midst of extraordinary difficulties the work has been prosecuted with encouraging success, through the blessing of the Great Head of the Church, we feel it incumbent on us to maintain our ecclesiastical lines unbroken, and to go forward in the path to which God's providence has surrounded us, and with quickened zeal and more earnest effort to devote ourselves to the upbuilding of the kingdom of Christ, in the important field committed to our care.

2. That the allegation "that our General Assembly was organized to render its aid in the attempt to establish, by means of the rebellion, a separate national existence, and to conserve and perpetuate the system of slavery," is not only without foundation in truth, but is contradicted by the most explicit declarations of the General Assembly of 1861, at the very time of its organization.

3. That in preserving our present ecclesiastical status, so far from seeking to subserve any partisan, political or sectional interests, it is our purpose, by the help of God, to maintain an organization in which all of like faith with ourselves in every part of the land may unite; and leaving all civil and political questions to the control of those who are their right custodians, by divine appointment, to devote ourselves exclusively to those which lie within the pale of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, believing that the courts of the Church have no right to legislate in matters of state policy; and regarding it as a vital doctrine that Christ alone is Lawgiver, Judge and King in Zion, and that as Head of the Church, he has appointed therein a government distinct from that of the state, and purely of a spiritual character; that the two should remain wholly independent of each other, each confining itself to the sphere assigned to it by the ordinance of God.

4. That while we are constrained to preserve our present organization as a distinct and separate Church by the solemn conviction that the peace and purity of the Church of Christ will be best preserved thereby, at the same time we desire ever to embrace in true Christian communion all who love our Lord Jesus in sincerity, and especially to maintain the most fraternal relations with all the branches of the Presbyterian family, and thus keep the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace.

GOD'S PRESERVING PRESENCE.

Preservation is continual creation; yet with regard to this material world, we commonly think we wound it up and spun it off in space ages ago, every spring working, every weight in its place, every law determined upon, all its exquisite mechanism warm with the breath and his fingers, and so missed until what time it shall get cold and battered and in need of repairs.

What a false—a freezing idea! How it turns his glowing pulses which beat in the rising sap, and sound in the rushing wind, to rigid law! It is not his hand which lifts and rolls the wave, it is the attraction of the moon; not his smile which transfigures the snowy hills but the orderly action of certain gases. Blind and stupid as we are, we have yet law come between us and our God. We think that he made law and uses it; not that he lives it and is it. Geology has already shown us that he did not instantly make the world, and has an end of it; and yet we are so apt to reason further, and see that he is forever making, changing, vivifying it. The currents of life that flow through it are always his, and always straight from his heart. And so with our individual organizations—these separate portions of matter and spirit that we call ourselves. There was not just so much life meted out to us at the start; it streams into us every moment from the one single Source of the universe. We are ever new born babes—our hearts beat because they are still bound to the Creator's.

Do you think this way of talking leads to Pantheism? Not at all. Creation is indeed the outgrowth of God; but he works through and in it; he is not one and the same thing with it.

Once more think of God as living in an eternal Now, in his dealings with his spiritual creation—souls. We say he foresees our destiny and works accordingly, when we should only mean that all the public so dare and right under his eye that their eternal issues and conditions are ever present with him. He works with no reference to a time when he shall stop working with no anticipation of a pause when he shall succeed, or with any change in method. He yearns and broods over us forever. With infinite patience he watches the slow and subtle debatings, choosings, waverings, crises, through which we pass, guarding the delicate balance of our wills from every irregular influence.

To us, in our mental moods and struggles, there are times and seasons, beginnings and ends, triumphs and failures. With God there is nothing of this; no fluctuation, no change, no end. Before we were, we way back as far as we can spur our flagging conception—he loves us; and with the same calm, wise, unhaustless love he will go down before us the eternal years. It is for us to keep ourselves in this Sun, and not hide from it; shine on it will, and that forever.

The prospects of a union between the different Presbyterian churches in Scotland are more hopeful and cheering. The great difficulty in the way were two—the place of the civil magistrate in the Church, and the mode in which the ministry is supported. Both difficulties have been surmounted. The joint committees have agreed upon a report which will be published in a few days next. It secures a platform on which all the non-established Presbyterian bodies may harmoniously fuse into one. Should the union take place, as expected, its effect on the ecclesiastical condition of the land will be of great importance.

The largest Sunday School in the world is at Stockport, England. It numbers about 5,000 scholars. There are 300 teachers. Over 1,000 of the scholars are past 18 years of age; more of these are boys than girls, and there are more male than female teachers in attendance.

The Southern Methodists in Missouri are effectively debarred from preaching by the new constitutional oath. Their services, as a consequence, consist of praying and singing.

Three Presbyterian churches have been built and dedicated during the past year in the City of Washington.

CATE & CO.

We have long known these gentlemen as men of enterprise, and as reliable friends of the South. What they profess to do they actually doing—making and manufacturing a better style and of better stock than their goods, and at low prices. We heartily endorse their advertisement as a fair statement.

MINING IN MONTANA.

A residence for nearly four years in the mining districts of the Rocky Mountains ought to qualify me, to some extent, to judge correctly of the mineral resources of this country.

I do not propose to detail the thousand and one fabulous accounts that we hear every day about "rich diggings," "new discoveries," and "big strikes," all over the country. I will not speak now of the placer mines of the Territory, only thus far, that the developments of the last four months have demonstrated the general fact that, Montana, is the richest and most extensive gold field on the continent. The facts to support this conclusion, I propose to submit, with your permission, in another communication to the Republican.

I propose to make a brief statement of the quartz interest of the country in this letter. It is the deliberate judgment of very many intelligent miners, who have had every means of informing themselves in the premises, that this territory combines more of the elements of mineral wealth than California, Nevada or Colorado—in this, that Nevada is almost exclusively a silver mining locality, and California and Colorado exclusively gold mining, whereas Montana combines both silver and gold mines in large extent and of a very rich quality.

We have here, in great abundance, the regular silver-bearing quartz of Nevada, and any quantity of the argentiferous galena—all in well defined ledges, containing ores that assay beyond the credulity of everybody, but old miners. The gold ledges in this country have been very amply tested within the last few months, by mills that were brought here last summer.

I will give below well authenticated facts and figures, taken from the books of a mill now running in this vicinity:

It is a little concern of ten stamps only, and has been crushing the surface quartz, which, every one knows, is not so rich as it is at a greater depth in the ledge. The mill, for the last two weeks running under great disadvantages, such as new machinery, extremely cold weather, inexperienced hands, etc., has cleared in gold to the owners, for one week, eighteen hundred dollars, and the next week, in four and a half days, two thousand two hundred and twenty dollars. These figures are the nett proceeds of the mill. Now, such a mill at the foundry in St. Louis, did not cost over three thousand dollars.

The expenses of freight to the country, and putting it up, were probably about seven thousand more; so that a party who owns the quartz, with an investment of ten thousand dollars, realizes a weekly dividend of two thousand dollars.

Now, sir, this is no "cock and bull story," gotten up to sell quartz property. The figures and returns from the mill are as I state them; I know them to be true. The cost of such a mill may be a little more or less than I have stated. Parties in St. Louis can advise themselves fully on that point, by inquiring at the foundries.

This mill is running on the Sultana lode. There are hundreds of other leads in the country as rich as this one, and will yield as good results to a mill. Other mills in the Territory are doing as well as this one. And, indeed, it is claimed that the mills at the Hot Springs and Summit, not far from Virginia City, are doing even better than the Park mills referred to.

These data will show to moneyed men and speculators what an opening is here offered for the employment of their surplus capital. There is no business in the world more legitimate and honest than mining, and none more certain in its results, where the miner has a lode of undoubted richness.

Of course, I am understood as referring to quartz mining when I speak of the certainty of the business. Quartz mining, in some instances, both in California and Colorado, has not been successful, chiefly because the quartz was found to contain a variety of gross metals, from which the gold could not be separated without great difficulty, and in many cases, doubtless, the quartz was too poor to yield anything. But here, in the heart of the great mountains that divide the Columbia and Missouri rivers, Nature has deposited treasures of the precious metals that will ultimately pay off the National debt, and enrich the people to a degree heretofore unknown in our history.

The full development of the great wealth of the country will require time and the employment of large capital. Our remoteness from the sources of supply, and the great expense of labor and living here, have materially retarded the opening of the country. But it should be borne in mind that the first important discoveries of gold in the Territory were made in 1863, and hence there has been but little time to develop the country.—Corr. St. Louis Rep.

SINGULAR TRADITION.—Among the Seminole Indians, there is a singular tradition regarding the white man's origin and superiority. They say that when the Great Spirit made the earth, he also made three men, all of whom were fair complexioned; and that after making them, he led them to the margin of a small lake and bade them leap therein and be washed. One immediately obeyed, and came from the water purer and fairer then before; the second hesitated a moment, during which time the water, agitated by the first, had became slightly muddied, and when he had buthed he came up copper-colored; the third did not leap in till the water became black with mud, and he came out with its color. Then the Great Spirit laid before them three packages of bark and bade them choose, and out of pity for his misfortune in color, gave the black man his first choice. He took hold of each of the packages, and, having felt the weight, chose the heaviest; the copper-colored one chose the second heaviest, leaving the white man the lightest. When the packages were opened, the first was found to contain spades, hoes and all the implements of labor; the second enwrapped hunting, fishing and warlike apparatus; the third gave to the white man pens, ink and paper—the engine of the mind—the means of mutual improvement—the social link of humanity—the foundation of the white man's superiority.

A DARING OUTRAGE.—The Brooklyn Times, of Tuesday, has the following:

One of the most daring and high-handed proceedings ever recorded in the annals of any city where there are laws and police, was perpetrated about 9 o'clock on Saturday night, on one of the Roosevelt and South Seventh street ferryboats—we understand the Arizona. About the hour above mentioned, a number of thieves and rowdies, said to be the denizens of the sinks and slums which abound in the physically and politically fetid and abominable Fourth Ward of New York, came on board the ferryboat.

As soon as the boat was out at a distance in the river sufficiently far for their purpose, they contrived to extinguish the lights in the cabin. The thieves then, with the utmost rapidity, went among the passengers, rifling them of their pocket-books, money, and whatever valuables they could get. So dexterously did the thieves ply their vocation, that the passengers were not aware of what occurred until they had reached South Seventh street, and landed. The thieves, of course, were off and disappeared the moment the boat touched the slip.

☞ Mr. G. D. Prentice, of the Louisville Journal makes the subjoined interesting statement:

If, in the very incipiency of the rebellion, we were enlisted that seventy-five thousand dollars in gold—fifty thousand of it in one place, and twenty-five thousand in another, the latter sum was to be increased indefinitely—was awaiting our ordor, (avowedly not as a bribe, but to save us from possible loss,) provided we would go for a peaceable separation of the North and South upon the basis of free trade between the two, discriminating against the rest of the world; if we were very soon afterward offered a most enormous price for the sale of our paper to a disloyal committee of another State; and if, very much later in the rebellion, we were told by the high Confederate authorities that, on condition of our advocating peace, or using our exertions in Kentucky in our own way to promote it, we should have as much cotton guaranteed to run out of Wilmington as would place us among the rich men of the Nation, surely these things were no crimes of ours. Everybody knows that such offers, if made, did not influence us. Not for a day through all the rebellion did we cease to urge with all our power the vigorous prosecution of the war.

RESUSCITATION AND DEVELOPMENT.

We have but one desire, paramount to all others, and that is for Virginia to recover from the terrible disasters she has suffered—to retrieve her losses, and, if she cannot regain her political status, at least to take a stand in an agricultural and commercial point, far above the one she possessed previous to the war. This is the aim of every good citizen. It is ours most sincerely. We want capital and labor; and we earnestly urge our State Government to strain every nerve to bring them here. No false prejudice or pride, no delusive and antiquated ideas should restrain us, or embarrass the development of Virginia's vast wealth.

We have previously alluded to and urged the vast importance of obtaining us speedily and surely as possible a connection with the Ohio river; of securing, beyond the possibility of a doubt, the completion of the Covington and Ohio Railroad. If we get this road through to the Ohio Railroad, we need have no fear of competition, and can snap our fingers at the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad interest, and at Thad. Stevens's Obstruction Committee. We will then have through our territory, and to our ports, the shortest route from the Great West to the Atlantic; and, if we cannot divert passenger travel, which chooses its own route, we will infallibly gain the freight and commerce of the Ohio river. It is only necessary to glance at the map to see this. Freight is not going to take the circuitous route via Baltimore, when it can come a direct route to the Atlantic through Virginia, saving time and money.

There is not a day to be lost in this matter. Our own Legislature sits but three weeks longer, and the session of that of West Virginia is more than half over. And now, while three or four companies are asking to be allowed to complete this important link, we beg the Legislature to strike while the iron is hot, and secure the construction of this work at all events. We will have to act in concert with West Virginia, for over two hundred miles of the Covington and Ohio Railroad are within her precincts and under her control. Not more than twenty miles of the road lies in East Virginia to be disposed of by our Legislature. Let us make the best bargain possible; but, above all things, let the road be built, and that great trade be brought to our ports, and West Virginia's mineral and agricultural wealth be drawn to the cities and ports of the Old Mother Commonwealth, where it belongs.—Richmond Whig, 13th.

WESTERN INDEPENDENCE.

Lest some sharp-scented Radical should smell treason in this caption, it may be remarked at the outset that it alludes to industrial and financial, and not to political, independence. No country has lived under a more complete and thorough vassalage, in regard to all its industrial interests, than that of the West and South to the New England States. It would look, indeed, as if Mount Tom or Holyoke had become a great centre, and the whole American Republic was designed to revolve around it. By the arrangement of Senatorial representation, less than one-fifth of the population, and far less than one-fiftieth of the territory of the United States, manage and direct the governmental affairs of the whole Republic. The legislation is becoming purely sectional, and, as the leading Senate committees are headed and controlled by New England men, no measure is allowed to be even initiated that would, directly or indirectly, injure the peculiar interests of that section of the country. A tariff has been established, and there is every disposition to increase its rates, which is virtually prohibitory on many articles of general use. The long and short of the whole matter is, that the country is to be made directly tributary to the factories of New England and the iron-works of Pennsylvania.

The practical working of this sectional system of legislation is both peculiar and powerful, and it tends to enrich one portion and impoverish another of the same great nation. The farmer in Missouri sells his bushel of wheat for a dollar, which is worth at the same time two dollars in Boston. He buys at the same time a yard of cloth for two dollars, on which the Massachusetts manufacturer had made a large profit at one dollar, so that what should have cost him one dollar really costs him three or four. This principle is illustrated ten thousand times a day in St. Louis. Almost every time that an article is purchased we feel the practical bearings of the principle, and depleted purses tell us that one section of the country is paying an exorbitant and grinding tax to make nabobs and millionaires in another.

How is this great and manifest injustice to be remedied? Not by a violent revolution, but by a simple reform in our laws of trade and production. The time will soon come, in spite of the creeping ambition of Eastern manufacturers, when the West will have power in Congress to modify, if not abolish, the evil complained of. In the meantime, we have no present relief, except by "lighting the lamp of industry and economy." If we can make cotton and woollen goods, machinery, and various articles of hardware, as cheap as they can be made in Lowell or Pittsburg, we must set about it at once. We have the raw material right at our doors, with granaries and storehouses filled with meat and grain to supply the operatives. We need more capital in the department of manufactures, and that is coming, and our real estate owners should encourage it to come by millions. This will give us partial relief and present independence, and with the influx of population and the saving of double freightage on the raw material and manufactured articles, and a single freightage on food to supply the operatives, Western manufacturers will be better able to stand free trade or a low tariff than those in the New England States.—Missouri Republican.

THE SOUTH AND THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT.

The New York Times copies the annexed paragraph from the Washington Chronicle, accompanying it with some very just comments:

"'We are submitting to your rule,' said one of the pardoned Southerners, a few days ago, in conversation with an American Senator, 'but you must take care that you do not make a Poland or an Ireland out of the South.' Neither the point nor the threat was new, but the grumbler was taken aback when a bystander remarked with peculiar emphasis: 'You forgot, my dear sir, when you made the comparison, the vast difference between the countries you refer to and the fair and fertile land in which you live. Nobody emigrates to Ireland or to Poland, while millions are preparing to move in and to occupy the redeemed and regenerated Southern communities.'"

Annexed are the comments of the Times:

What makes the vast difference to which the Chronicle's bystander refers? Ireland and Poland are among the fairest and most fertile countries in the world. The South is not greatly their superior in this respect. If it is to be governed as Ireland and Poland are, it will soon be as unattractive. Why do not the millions who are "preparing" to move in and occupy it, do so at once? In spite of all the predictions that have been indulged in on the subject, as a matter of fact very few emigrants, either from abroad or from the North, have as yet gone to take possession of the fertile lands of the Southern States.

The reason is perfectly obvious. So long as it is uncertain what kind of a Government the South is to have, neither men nor capital will go thither, and if the Southern States are to be governed by Congress, like provinces or territories, we may depend upon it neither will go there at all. Men seek homes now, especially in this country, with special reference to the character of the institutions they will enjoy. It is because the principle of self-government gives shape and force to all our institutions, that foreigners in such numbers come here. If the Southern States are to be deprived of this right, whether in punishment for past offences, or by way of discipline for their future reformation, they will lose in population and prosperity instead of gaining.

There was much more of just and judicious warning than of "threat" in the remark of the "pardoned Southerner" than the Chronicle conceales, and it was worthy of a better reply than the "American Senator" gave it.

GOOD ADVICE.—An old author quaintly remarks: "Avoid argument with the ladies. In spinning yarns, silks and saths a man is sure to be worsted and twisted. And when a man is worsted and twisted he may consider himself wound up."

THE LATE DEPUTATION TO WASHINGTON AND ITS RESULTS.

The interview between the President and the Virginia deputation, an account of which we published yesterday morning, was in all respects satisfactory. The President's whole manner and bearing, in both his official and personal intercourse with the members of the deputation, were marked by candor, kindness and courtesy. The whole delegation was impressed with his earnestness and sincerity, and have returned well pleased with all the incidents of that interview.

The Legislature did a good day's work when it passed the resolutions expressing its confidence in President Johnson, and defining the true relations of the State of Virginia to the Government; and it acted wisely when it provided for the appointment of a joint committee to visit Washington and present those resolutions to the President. The whole plan was well conceived and well executed. It has been attended by many pleasing incidents and has been followed by many gratifying and useful results. Not only did it place the President face to face with an able and truly representative delegation of Virginia gentlemen, but it enabled the persons composing that delegation to hold conversations with prominent and influential persons connected with public affairs, and to represent to them the true condition of affairs in this most calumniated and misunderstood State. Not the least important incident connected with this embassy to the seat of Government, was the summoning of its several members before the Reconstruction Committee, of fifteen, to testify as to the state of feeling among the people of Virginia. That Committee thus received, from the fountain-head, valuable and reliable information, that is worth a volume of such testimony as Carl Schurz could give them.—Richmond Whig, 13th inst.

PLAIN TALK BY THE PRESIDENT.—A correspondent, writing to the Boston Advertiser, furnishes what purports to be a conversation between the President and a distinguished Representative. We quote:

The President expressed himself as being now what he had always been, the friend of the poor and the lowly. He had never broken faith with any body, and if his past course and his former language were not sufficient guarantee that he meant well to the colored people, and would endeavor to secure to them a fair chance, nothing he could say or do now would give any such guarantee.

He thought, however, that it was best to speak plainly, and he did not believe that the effort now making by some who call themselves the negroes' special friends, to force universal suffrage upon the States, was wise or judicious. He thought it tended to embitter the feelings of the whites. Our effort should be to cultivate calmness and confidence. He believed it would result in great injury to the prospects of the colored people in regard to differences with the party that elected him.

He said that he might differ with individuals of what some called the Union party. As to the means to be used he considered himself in general accord with that party, as a whole, in the ends to be reached. He was not a party man, and he meant to sink the partizan in the patriot, but so far as he understood the sentiments of the Union party, he was in general accord with it.

He might differ with some of his friends, and he should feel wholly at liberty to so differ, and to state the ground of his contrary belief or opinion. But he considered himself identified with the great Union party and had no desire or intention of being found outside.

HON. W. T. WILLEY ON THE REUNION OF VIRGINIA.—Mr. Willey, from his place in the United States Senate, at Washington, has written a letter touching Mr. Woodson's resolution looking to a reunion of East and West Virginia. He says he has been requested so to do by gentlemen in both States. He sets out by declaring that the new State was not made as a "war measure," but because of irreconcilable, conflicting material interests; and the war merely afforded the needed opportunity. He proceeds:

"But, in reference to the propriety of the reconsolidation of the two States, I suppose there can be no difference of opinion among all well-informed and well-disposed West Virginians. Nor do I suppose, if the people of (old) Virginia would dismiss from their minds the suggestions of passion and the influences of State pride, and would calmly and rationally consider the question, that they would desire reunion of the two States. Indeed, I happen to know that many of them are decidedly opposed to it; not from any such vindictive reasons as are assigned by Mr. Garnett, but because they see that separation is best for the interests of both States.

"The two States are geographically distinct. There never has been, and there never can be, any real, harmonious and profitable municipal union between them. They are, and must forever remain, physically separated. To-day, if the people of three-fourths of West Virginia were desirous of visiting Richmond, the capital of the old State, they would be compelled to pass around through Maryland and the District of Columbia to accomplish their wish; and they would be indebted to the enterprise of a foreign corporation for the means of doing it.

"There is little or no traffic or commerce between the two sections."

He concludes with a statement of the railroads in this State, which, he says, are all east of the Alleghanies. We have given every idea in his letter.—Richmond Dispatch, 16th inst.

THE PLANTERS' LOAN ASSOCIATION.—The Louisville Democrat, of the 16th, contains the following, which may not be unworthy of consideration in our neighborhood:

We are glad to hear that there is an organization formed by a party of gentlemen, with large capital, called the Planters' Loan Association, which proposes to furnish capital to owners of plantations, so they may immediately resume the cultivation of Southern products, so important to the future welfare of our country. There are a great many planters throughout the the State and the whole South who own large tracts of land ready now for cultivation, but who are entirely unable to go to work on account of the want of means to purchase machinery, stock, plantation supplies and make the necessary advance to procure laborers. This important need the Planters' Loan Association is intended to supply, and we earnestly and cordially recommend its immediate consideration by the Legislature, to whom application is being made for a charter, as the period for putting in the crop for the present year is fast approaching.

SENSIBLE HIT.—We are told now that all must be equal before the law; that the same penalties for crime inflicted on a white man must be inflicted on a negro, and no other. Nothing could be more severe on the race to be regarded as free. Take the vices of stealing and pilfering. All know the habit of the negro, and the opportunities he has had and temptations. He knows little of the rights of property. He has been accustomed to pick up what he wanted. The utmost penalty was a little whipping, and mostly a rebuke and a release on a promise not to do so any more. Now, apply the law to the negro which is made for the white man. Is it just? How many penitentiaries will it take to hold the number that will be incarcerated? What we have said of stealing is applicable to other crimes that might be mentioned.

It is zealously urged that the negro be allowed to give testimony in court. Shall he be subjected to the same pains and penalties as a white man, if he swear falsely? Where the negroes are few and have long been free, in the States, an enormous proportion of them get to the State prison. How will it be where the numbers of this class are very large, as it is in the South? When races are so different physically, intellectually and morally, is it not absurd to consider them as alike responsible to law, and subjected to the same penalties for crimes? In a state of slavery, the infirmities of this race were overlooked and forborne with. They suffered but slight punishment for crimes that would have sent white men to the penitentiary. They are now no more fit for the responsibilities that the criminal law imposes on white men than they were before, and the law that makes them so is more cruel than just.—Louisville Journal.

☞ The commander of a French man-of-war has been exterminating the cannibal inhabitants of a village on the island of New Caledonia, in the Pacific, they having been guilty of killing and eating the captain and four men of a French vessel who fell into their hands. A French garrison has been placed on the island.

THE SOUTHERN MAN THE FRIEND OF THE NEGRO.

The following article, in corroboration of the truth of this caption, is from the Alexandria Gazette:

A gentleman who returned to this city on a short visit to New York, and who, before the war, was one of our largest and most influential grocery merchants, informs us of the following example of kindness and protection invariably afforded negroes by gentlemen from the South: During his late trip from New York to this city, he occupied a seat with Major Gen. Hoke, of the late Confederate States army, who is from North Carolina, as his compagnon de voyage. Immediately in front of them sat a negro, and two United States officers—one a General—filled the opposite seat. Soon after leaving New York, Gen. Hoke saw a man, who was walking through the car, pick up from the floor, near where the negro sat, what he, at the time, supposed to be a ticket, and when the conductor came around and was told by the negro that he had lost his ticket, but that he had bought and paid for one, and that he had a check for his baggage, the General was satisfied that the man he had seen walking through the car had found the negro's ticket, and so informed the conductor, who accepted his statement, and went on marking the checks of other passengers.

A change of conductors takes place between Washington and New York, and when the second one, on his round, was told by the negro that he had lost his ticket, he said that was not his lookout, and that the fare would have to be paid. Gen. Hoke then stated to him what he had told the first conductor, but instead of receiving and crediting the General's explanation, he, in a pert and impudent manner, remarked that neither black man nor white man should pass by him without paying, and that the negro should pay or be put off. The General then rising from his seat, and shaking his forefinger in front of the conductor's face, informed him, firmly and deliberately, that for the past four years he had been fighting for the negro, and that though defeated, he would not, even now, allow one to be maltreated in his presence; that the negro had paid his fare, and should go through. The conductor slunked away, the negro came on to Washington, but the two United States officers never said a word.

THE ABOLITION CRUSADE PREDICTED.—The Hon. Thos. F. Marshall during a speech delivered in the House of Representatives during the session of January, 1842, on a resolution censuring John Q. Adams for presenting a petition to Congress for a dissolution of the Union, drew the following correct picture of the scenes we have just realized:

A more fearful strife than that which convulsed Europe two hundred years ago, is to affront the sun, and pollute the blessed light of heaven, on the soil of these once free and happy States. The fierce and vengeful fanatic, true to the principles of his fathers, and the sworn champion of universal emancipation, holding in one hand his proclamation of freedom and alliance to the slave, and a firebrand in the other—elated, too, with the consciousness of numerical superiority—is to invade the South, and avenge the wrongs of Africa, in massacre and conflagration. He will be met. The haughty slaveholder will greet the new crusader with a bloody welcome. The cavalier's sword will leap from the scabbard, in vindication of a broken covenant, a violated National compact, to which he had vainly trusted as a shield to his property and his rights. Surrounded by his household gods, in defence of his hearthstone, the honor of his wife, the purity of his daughter, pro aris et focis, he will incarnadine his weapon to the hilt.

"To patriot vengeance he'er hath sword,
More terrible libations poured."

And should he fall, "outnumbered, not outbraved," it will be amid the ashes of all he holds dear—his home, his family, his country and his race.

VOICE FROM THE HOME OF THAD. STEVENS.—The Lancaster (Pa.) Intelligencer, in noticing the glorious victory of the Democracy of that gallant city, says: It is, in all respects, the greatest victory ever achieved by the Democracy of Lancaster, and will have a most salutary and beneficial effect upon the rest of the State. The arch-demagogue, disunionist and traitor, Thaddeus Stevens, has been signally and terribly rebuked at his home, and white men everywhere have good reason to rejoice over the result.

The editor gives the following significant notice: We have been requested by the treasurer of the fund to announce to John W. Forney that he is ready, with a detailed statement, to account for the expenditure of the four thousand dollars left by him on his recent visit, to be used in securing an endorsement of Thad. Stevens and negro suffrage at the municipal election.

A GOOD THOUGHT.—The God of the white man and the God of the black man—I speak it with due reverence—is the Being who first made a distinction on account of color. Why was the negro created black? It is beyond the ken of man to ascertain. Why were we created white? Is not the mere difference in color sufficient to warn us that Heaven designed a difference? And have not some of you acted on the fact that there is such a difference? Why are there separate places for the respective races even in your own Chamber? Why are they not put together.—Reverdy Johnson in his anti-Sumner speech.

RECHRISTENING THE BABY.

Mr. Anderson, of Missouri, has offered in Congress a joint resolution proposing to rename the United States. We submit that this child has got rather too old to be successfully rechristened. It may be thought a misfortune that a great man's name is Smith or Jones, rather than Douglas or Percy—though we should not think a sensible great man would care much about it, after all—but having made the name of Jones illustrious, the public would think Jones an ass if he should petition the Legislature for leave to call himself Montmorency.

Besides, we do not think our Baby badly named at all. We are called the United States—well, we are the United States. It is a much happier title than "the United Kingdom," which term contains within itself a very good Irish bull; for there may be united brethren, but if a man should call himself a united brother he would be laughed at. It ought not to be forgotten that this country is a federal union, a union of States, under a common Government, which Government has certain specified powers, given to it for certain purposes. If a name or title should be descriptive, it would be impossible to select one for our country fitter than "the United States." Certainly "America," which Mr. Anderson proposes, is not so good. In the first place, America includes two continents, and a hundred different independent Governments; and unless we intend to filibuster until we have absorbed all the land in the Western hemisphere between the north and south.

NAPOLEON AT HOME.—The French Emperor insists upon retaining his study in the Palace of the Tuileries, the mahogany library he had in his chamber at Elba, and he forbade a glass front being put to it to protect his books. There is in his study a magnificent collection of meerschaum pipes; but they have, of late years, been relieved of duty, his physicians having forbidden their use. The Emperor takes his revenge by giving them away whenever he has a chance. He has not a single dressing-gown in his study; when he is in it, he almost always wears an old frock coat. There are often a great many paintings and engravings piled against the walls, and even on the floor of his study. One of his body servants used to resort to a singular trick whenever he wished one of these paintings. He would place it in front of a pile which obstructed communication with an adjoining room. His Majesty would say, "It seems to me these pictures are constantly increasing. Can't some of them be removed?" The servant would reply, "Certainly, sire," and he would carry off the coveted picture to his chamber. In this way, he formed a handsome collection. Whenever his Majesty wishes to retain the memory of anything he hears in conversation, he makes a note of it on a blank-book, which is always on his writing-desk; he tears out the leaf on which he has written the note, reads it attentively, and then tears it up. This habit one day greatly puzzled the Prince de Metternich, the Austrian Embassador, to whom his Majesty was giving audience. The Embassador expressed his astonishment and curiosity. His Majesty at once gratified it by saying that whenever he once wrote, and afterward read attentively the written note, he never forgot it.—Paris Letter.

SAULSBURY'S DIFFICULTY.—Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, was the other day exercised upon a question in philology. Not having any college to apply to, he appealed to the Senate of the United States. He wanted to know the meaning of the word "colored, as applied to the negro race," and asked "what authority there was for the use of that word." We should suppose that Mr. Saulsbury need go no further than the laws of his own State, and of Southern States, which speak frequently of "free persons of color" as distinguished from persons of African descent who are slaves. But if he is not satisfied with the words as legitimate by usage, he should go into the Congressional library, and consult Webster's dictionary, in which he will find that "color" is "any hue or tint as distinguished from white," and he will also discover the following: "Colored people, black people, Africans or their descendants, mixed or unmixed." Much learning is not expected from Senator Saulsbury, but when he sets himself up as a philosophical critic he should take care to first consult elementary books.—Philadelphia Inquirer, 15th.

CURIOUS PROPHECY.—The following prediction is now a good deal talked about. It is said that at the death of the present Pope a darkness, so intense, that it may, as it were, be felt, will overspread the whole world for three days. During that time no fire or light of any kind will burn except blessed candles. As, according to St. Malachy, the style of the next Pope is "Lumen de cœlo," one may suppose that the light of day will be restored to the earth at the close of the Conclave of Cardinals. The Holy Father is reported to have said lately to a Catholic who was taking leave of him, and who said he hoped to return to Rome next year (1866), "no, not next year, but the one after, when all will be glorious." To another the Holy Father said, some time ago, "there will be two more years of trouble, then all will be well."—Cor. London Register.

CANNIBALISM IN AFRICA.—Very little is heard of late respecting the continuance of the slave trade on the western coast of Africa. The newspapers had an allusion to an abandoned slaver somewhere off the coast of Cuba, leaving it to be inferred that a cargo had recently been landed there. Nevertheless, it is probably true that the traffic in African negroes is very limited, compared with what was done in former years—a fact due, perhaps, mainly to the better understanding which exists between Great Britain and the United States in regard to the right of search and kindred subjects, and in part to the better enforcement of prohibitory laws by the Government of Spain. It might be supposed the wars perpetually waged among the native African tribes would have ceased before now, the instigating cause (according to frequent representation) having been removed when the slave barracoons, or receptacles for prisoners of war, were broken up on the coast. But of this, we are just advised to the contrary. Dates from Sierra Leone to December 30, refer to brutal wars in progress between two powerful chiefs, all captives being "at once sold into slavery." Many factories had been plundered and burnt. At Cahuber, a great "play" had been held, after which, all the prisoners were killed and eaten. The bodies were divided according to the number taken by each man's canoe. Here is a field for philanthropists and reformers. Nowhere in the world do we hear of atrocities surpassing those committed almost under the guns of our African squadron.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce, 26th ult.

THE JAPAN TRADE.—The London and China Express, in a discussion of the condition of the British garrison at Hong Kong, incidentally refers to a curious practice. By the treaty of 1858 three itzeboos—the current silver coin of the Japanese—were declared the equivalent of one dollar. This compulsory reckoning came to an end, so far as traders were concerned, in 1860, but a new arrangement was then made, that every month each foreign legation should receive fifteen thousand and each consulate three thousand itzeboos in exchange for five thousand and one thousand dollars respectively. Moreover, every naval or military officer employed by any of the Treaty Powers at the open ports is allowed to exchange three dollars a day at the old rate of three itzeboos per dollar, and every soldier or sailor one dollar on the same terms. As the average value of the dollar, according to the ordinary exchange of the day, is only some two and a half itzeboos, a considerable pecuniary advantage is thus bestowed on those who are privileged to enforce the old compulsory standard of three itzeboos to the dollar; and in fact, a large and lucrative trade is said to be carried on in this way by the English representative in Japan.

PLEASING INCIDENT.—Upon the arrival of Gov. B. G. Humphreys at Vicksburg, a few days since, he was welcomed by a salvo of artillery, fired in his honor by order of Gen. Wood, commanding the Department. This is the first incident of the kind that has transpired, and this unexpected token of respect from the military to the civil authority of a newly pledged State, was undoubtedly intended to obliterate bitter recollections, and to make those who heard the guns feel as though they, too, had something in common with the Federal army.

It was a proffered honor from a Union soldier to a battle-scarred veteran of the Confederacy.—Sunny South.

The Latest News by Telegraph.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21.—Senate.—Mr. Sumner, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a House resolution to facilitate telegraphic communication between the Eastern and Western Continents, which passed.

Mr. Buckalew spoke in opposition to the Constitutional amendments.

The House, by a vote of 118 against 87, laid upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House yesterday passed the resolution that no Senator nor Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress, from any of the late rebellious States, until Congress shall have first declared the States entitled to representation.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22.—The demonstration of the citizens of the District of Columbia, in support of the President's policy, was attended by an immense concourse. The meeting was addressed by prominent individuals, and resolutions in support of the patriotic policy of the President were adopted and presented to him at the Executive Mansion, in response to which he made a speech reiterating his devotion to the Union, and said the Radicals were endeavoring to break up the Union we fought for.

The President's remarks were greeted with great applause by the vast gathering.

NEW YORK, Feb. 22.—The banquet to our Minister to Russia, by the corporation of Moscow and merchants, was an enthusiastic affair, designed as an acknowledgment of the courtesies shown the Russian fleet while here. The health of President Johnson was drank amid protracted cheering, and a telegram announcing it was sent to the American Consul at Liverpool, for transmission to this country.

Mr. Curtin, the American Secretary of Legation, spoke favorably of the Russian-American Telegraph and of the future Russia and America, concluding: "The more intimately acquainted my countrymen shall become with the Russians the more they will love you." Mr. Curtin was seized and kissed by every Russian present.

STYLE OF EATING IN THE UNITED STATES.—Lord Robert Cecil, M. P., recently delivered a lecture in Chemsford, England, upon America. One of our peculiarities is thus described:

Punctuality was not only the soul of business, but the soul of eating, also, in the States. He had seen waiters told off to various dishes; at the word "one," each dish cover was firmly grasped with the thumb and forefinger, and at the word "two," every cover was removed with military precision, while such was the velocity with which the good things on the table were dispatched that if you showed any shyness or reserve, you stood no chance of getting anything at all.

OBITUARY.

Died, suddenly, on the 7th inst., at her residence in Mississippi City, Mrs. SARAH CALVIT.

In the decease of this venerable Christian lady many hearts are made to mourn; but her mission upon earth was ended, and the Good Father called her to himself. She leaves behind her works of piety and benevolence, which, like fragrant flowers, adorn and beautify her memory. Refined, intellectual, with a mind well stored with useful knowledge, her acquaintance was felt to be a valuable acquisition. Her simple means she used as the steward of her Lord. She sought out the needy, but so unobtrusively that her left hand knew not what her right hand did. She was, in truth, one of "the excellent of the earth." During the war our privations were hers, but even with limited means her benefactions did not cease, and the gentle, warm-hearted sympathy which accompanied her gifts endeared her to the recipient. She was widely connected with some of the oldest and wealthiest families of Mississippi. One who knew and loved her feels urged to this warm but feeble tribute to departed worth. VIOLA.

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO

ON THE

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU BILL.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20, 1866.

To the Senate of the United States:

I have examined with care the bill which originated in the Senate and has been passed by both Houses of Congress, to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a bureau for the relief of freedmen and refugees, and for other purposes." Having with much regret come to the conclusion that it would be inconsistent with the public welfare to give my approval to the measure, I return the bill to the Senate with my objections to its becoming a law.

I might call to mind, in advance of these objections, that there is no immediate necessity for the proposed measure.

The act to establish a bureau for the relief of freedmen and refugees, which was approved in the month of March last, has not yet expired. It was thought to be stringent enough for the purposes in view before it ceases to have effect. Further experience may assist to guide us to a wise conclusion as to the policy to be adopted in time of peace. I have, with Congress, the strongest desire to secure to the freedmen the full enjoyment of their freedom and their prosperity, and their entire independence and equality in making contracts for their labor, but the bill before us contains provisions which, in my opinion, are not warranted by the Constitution, and are not well suited to accomplish the end in view.

The bill proposes to establish, by authority of Congress, military jurisdiction over all parts of the United States containing refugees and freedmen. It would, by its very nature, apply with more force to those parts of the United States in which the freedmen most abound, and it expressly extends to the existing temporary jurisdiction of the Freedmen's Bureau greatly enlarged powers over those States in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion. The source from which the agents are to be selected is from the army or from civil life; the country is to be divided into districts and sub-districts, and the number of special agents to be employed may be equal to the number of counties or parishes in every part of the United States where freedmen and refugees are to be found, and the subjects over which this military jurisdiction is to extend in every part of the United States, includes all employes, agents and officers of the Bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed upon them by the bill in eleven States. It is further to extend over all cases affecting freedmen and refugees who may be discriminated against by the local laws, customs or prejudices. In these eleven States the bill subjects any white person who may be charged with depriving a freedman of any civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons, to imprisonment or fine, or both, without, however, defining the civil rights which are thus to be secured to the freedmen by military law. This military jurisdiction also extends to all questions that may arise respecting contracts. The agent who is thus to exercise the office of a Military Judge, may be a stranger, entirely ignorant of the laws, and exposed to the errors of judgment to which all men are liable in the exercise of power over which there is no legal supervision. By so vast a number of agents as is contemplated by the bill, it must, by the very nature of man, be attended by acts of caprice, injustice and passion. The trials having their origin under this bill are to take place without the intervention of a jury, and without any fixed rules of law or evidence. The rules on which offences are to be heard and determined by the numerous agents, are such rules and regulations as the President, through the War Department, may prescribe. No previous presentment is required, nor any indictment charging the commission of a crime against law, but trial must proceed on the charges and specifications. The punishment will not be as the law declares, but such as a court-martial may think proper, and from these arbitrary tribunals there is no appeal, no writ of error, to any of the courts in which the Constitution of the United States boasts exclusively the judicial power of the country; while the territory and the class of actions and offences that are made subject to this measure are so extensive that the bill itself, should it become a law, will have no limitation in point of time, and will form a part of the permanent legislation of the country. I cannot reconcile a system of military jurisdiction of this kind with the words of the Constitution, which declares that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the naval or military forces or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger, and that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State or District wherein the crime shall have been committed. The safeguards which the wisdom and experience of ages, chosen by our fathers to establish as securities for the protection of the innocent, the punishment of the guilty and the equal administration of justice are to be set aside, and for the sake of more vigorous interposition in behalf of justice, we are to take the risk of the many acts of injustice that would of necessity follow from an almost countless number of agents established in every parish or county, in nearly every one of the States of the Union, over whose decision there is to be no supervision or control by the Federal Courts.

The power that would thus be placed in the hands of the President is such as, in times of peace, certainly never ought to be entrusted to any one man. If it be asked whether the creation of such a tribunal within a State is warranted as a measure of war, the question presents itself, whether we are still engaged in war? Let us not unnecessarily disturb the commerce, credit and industry of the country by declaring to the American people, and the world, that the United States are still in a condition of civil war. At present there is no part of our country in which the authority of the United States is disputed. Offences that may be committed by individuals, should not work a forfeiture of the rights of whole communities. The country has entered or is returning to a state of peace and industry. The rebellion is in fact at an end. The measure, therefore, seems to be as inconsistent with the actual condition of the country as at variance with the Constitution of the United States. If, passing from general considerations, we examine the bill in detail, it is open to weighty objections. In time of war, it was evidently proper that we should provide for those who were passing suddenly from a condition of bondage to a state of freedom; but the bill proposes to make the Freedmen's Bureau (established by the act of 1800) as one of the many and extraordinary military measures to suppress a formidable rebellion—a permanent branch of the public administration, with its powers greatly enlarged. I have no reason to suppose, and do not understand it to be alleged, that the act of March, 1865, has proved deficient for the purpose for which it was passed. Although at that time, and for a considerable period thereafter, the Government of the United States remained unacknowledged in most of the States whose inhabitants had been involved in the rebellion, the institution of slavery, for the destruction of which, the Freedmen's Bureau was called into existence as an auxiliary, has already been effectually and finally abrogated throughout the whole country by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and, practically, its eradication has received the assent and concurrence of most of those States in which, at any time, it had existed. I am not, therefore, able to discern in the country anything to justify an apprehension that the powers and agencies of the Freedmen's Bureau—which were effective for the protection of freedmen and refugees during the actual continuation of hostilities, and of African servitude—will not now, in a time of peace, and after the abolition of slavery, prove inadequate to the same ends. If I am correct in these views, there can be no necessity for the enlargement of the powers of the Bureau, for which a provision is made in this bill. The third section of the bill authorizes a general and unlimited amount of support to the destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, and their wives and children. The succeeding sections make provision for the rent or purchase of landed estates for freedmen, and for the erection, for their benefit, of suitable buildings for asylums and schools, the expense to be defrayed from the treasury of the people. The Congress of the United States has never heretofore thought itself bound to establish any laws beyond the limits of the District of Columbia, except for the benefit of our disabled soldiers and sailors. It has never founded schools for any class of our own people, not even for the orphans of those who have fallen in defence of the Union, but has left the care of their education to the much more competent control of the States, of communities, of private associations and of individuals. It has never deemed it necessary to expend the public money for the rent of purchase of houses for the thousands, not to say millions, of the white race who are honestly toiling from day to day for their subsistence.

A system for the support of indigent persons in the United States was never contemplated by the Constitution, nor can any good reason be advanced why, as a permanent establishment, it should be founded for one class or color of our people more than another. Pending the war, any refugees or freedmen received support from the Government, but it was never intended they should henceforth be fed, clothed, educated and sheltered by the United States. The idea on which the slaves were assisted to freedom, was that on becoming free they would be a self-sustaining population, and any legislation that shall imply that they are not expected to attain a self-sustaining condition, must have a tendency injurious alike to their character and their prosperity.

The appointment of an agent for every county and parish will create an immense patronage, and the expense of the numerous officers and clerks to be appointed by the President, will be great in the beginning, with a tendency steadily to increase. The appropriations asked for by the Freedmen's Bureau, as now established for the year 1866, amounts to $11,745,000. It may be safely estimated that the cost to be incurred under the pending bill will be double that amount, more than the entire sum expended in any one year under the administration of the second Adams. If the presence of agents in every parish and county, is to be considered as a war measure, opposition or even resistance, might be provoked, so that to give effect to their jurisdiction, troops would have to be stationed within the reach of every one of them, and thus a large standing force would be necessary, and large appropriations would therefore be required to sustain and enforce military jurisdiction in every county and parish, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande.

The condition of our fiscal affairs is encouraging, but in order to sustain the present measure of public confidence, it is necessary that we practice not merely customary economy, but as far as possible severe retrenchment. In addition to the objections already stated, the fifth section of the bill proposes to take away land from its owners without any legal proceeding being first had, contrary to the provision of the Constitution, which declares that no persons shall be deprived of life, liberty and property, without due process of law. It does not appear that lands to which this section refers may not be owned by minors or persons of unsound mind, or by those who have been faithful to all their obligations as citizens of the United States. If any portion of the land is held by such persons, it is not competent for any authority to deprive them of it. If, on the other hand, it be found that the property is liable to confiscation, even then it cannot be appropriated to public purposes until, by due process of law, it shall have been declared forfeited to the Government.

There are still further objections to the bill on the grounds of seriously affecting the class of persons to whom it is designed to bring relief. It will tend to keep the minds of the freedmen in a state of uncertain expectation and restlessness, while to those among whom he lives it will be a source of constant and vague apprehension. Undoubtedly the freedmen should be protected, but they should be protected by the civil authorities, especially by the exercise of all the Constitutional power of the Courts of the United States and of the States. His condition is not so exposed, as may at first be imagined. He is in a portion of the country where his labor cannot well be spared. Competition for his services, from planters, from those who are constructing or repairing railroads, or from capitalists in his vicinity or other States, will enable him to command almost his own terms. He also possesses a perfect right to change his place of abode; and if, therefore, he does not find in one community or State a mode of life suited to his desires, or proper remuneration for his labor, he can move to another where labor is more extended and better rewarded. In truth, however, each State, induced by its own wants and interests, will do what is necessary and proper to retain within its borders all the labor that is needed for the development of its resources. The laws that regulate supply and demand will maintain their force, and the wages of the laborer will be regulated thereby. There is no danger that the great demand for labor will not operate in favor of the laborer, neither sufficient consideration given to the ability of the freedmen to protect and take care of themselves. It is no more than justice to them to believe that, as they have received their freedom with moderation and forbearance, they will distinguish themselves by their industry, and show the world that in their condition of freedom they are self-sustaining and capable of selecting their own employment and their own places of abode, or insisting for themselves on a proper remuneration, and of establishing and maintaining their own asylums and schools. It is earnestly hoped that, instead of wasting away, they will, by their own efforts, establish for themselves a condition of respectability and prosperity. It is certain they can attain to that condition only through their own merits and exertions. In this connection the query presents itself, whether the system proposed by the bill will not, when put into complete operation, practically transfer the entire care, support and control of four millions of emancipated slaves to hard overseers or task-masters, who, appointed at Washington, are to be located in every county or parish in the United States containing freedmen and refugees? Such an asylum would inevitably tend to such a concentration of power in the Executive which would enable him, if so disposed, to control the action of a numerous class, and use them for the attainment of his own political views.

I cannot but add another very great objection to this bill. The Constitution imperatively declares, in connection with taxation that each State shall have at least one Representative, and fixes the rules for the number to which at future time each State shall be elected. It also provides that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, and adds with peculiar force that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its suffrage. In the South the original act was necessarily passed in the absence of the States chiefly to be affected because their people were then contumaciously engaged in the rebellion. Some at least of the States are attending Congress by loyal Representatives, soliciting the allowance of their Constitutional rights of representation. At the time, however, of the consideration and passing of the bill, there was no Senator or Representatives in Congress from the eleven States which are to be mainly affected by its provisions. The fact that reports were made against the good disposition of the country is an additional reason why they need and should have Representatives of their own in Congress to explain their condition and their acquiescence in the perfecting of measures immediately affecting themselves. Thus, the liberty of deliberation would then be free, and Congress would have full power to decide according to its judgment, and there could then be no objection urged that the State mostly interested had not been permitted to be heard. The principle is firmly fixed in the minds of the American people that there can be no taxation without representation. Great burdens are now to be borne by all the country, and we may best demand that they shall be borne without a murmur when they are voted by a majority of the representatives of all the people. I would not interfere with the unquestionable rights of Congress to judge, each House for itself, of the election returns and qualifications of its own members, but that authority cannot be construed as including the right to put out, in time of peace, any State from Representatives to which it is entitled by the Constitution. At present, all the people of the United States are included—those who were most faithful during the war, not less than others.

The State of Tennessee, for instance, whose authorities in the rebellion was restored to all her Constitutional relations to the Union by the patriotism and energy of her injured and outraged people. Before the war was brought to a termination, they had closed themselves in relation with the General Government and had established a State Government of their own, and as they were not included in the emancipation proclamation, they by their own action, have amended their Constitution so as to abolish slavery within the limits of their State. I know no reason why the State of Tennessee, for example, should not fully enjoy her Constitutional relations to the United States.

The President of the United States stands towards the country in a somewhat different attitude from that of any member of Congress chosen from a single district or State. The President is chosen by the people of all the States; eleven States are not now represented in Congress, and it would seem to be his duty on all proper occasions to present their just claims to Congress. There always will be difference of opinion in the community, and individuals may be guilty of transgression of the law, but these do not constitute valid objections against the right of a State to representation. It would in no wise interfere with the discretion of Congress, with regard to the qualifications of members, and I hold it my duty to recommend to you, in the interests of peace and in the interests of the Union, the admission of every State to its share of public legislation, however insubordinate, insurgent or rebellious its people may have been. It presents itself, not only in an attitude of loyalty and harmony, but in the persons of Representatives whose loyalty cannot be questioned under the existing Constitution or by legal test. It is plain that an indefinite or permanent exclusion of any part of the country from representation must be attended by a spirit of disquiet and complaint.

It is unwise and dangerous to pursue a course of measures which will unite any large section of the country against another section, no matter how much the latter may predominate. The course of immigration, the development of industry, and business and natural causes, will raise up men at the South as devoted to the Union as those of any other part of the land; but if they are still excluded from Congress, if by a permanent statute they are declared not to be in full Constitutional relations to the country, they may think they have cause to become alienated in feeling and sentiments against the Government.

Under the political education of the American people, the idea is inherent and ineradicable, that the consent of the majority of the whole is necessary to secure a willing acquiescence in legislation. The bill under consideration refers to certain States as though they had not been fully restored to the United States; and if they have not, let us at once act together to insure that desirable end at the earliest possible moment. It is hardly necessary for me to inform Congress that in my own judgment most of these States, so far as depends on their own action, have been fully restored to the enjoyment of their Constitutional rights as members of the Union. Reasoning from the Constitution itself and from the actual situation of the country, I feel not only entitled but bound to assume that with the Federal courts restored in the several States and in the full exercise of their functions, the rights and interests of all classes of people, with the aid of the military in cases of resistance to the law, will be essentially protected against unconstitutional infringement and violation. Should this expectation unhappily fail, which I do not anticipate, then the Executive is armed with the power of March, 1865, establishing a Freedmen's Bureau, and hereafter as heretofore, he can employ the land and naval forces of the country to suppress insurrection and to overcome obstructions to the laws. I return the bill to the Senate, in earnest hope that a measure involving questions and interests so important to the country, will not become a law unless upon deliberate consideration of the people, it shall receive the sanction of enlightened public judgment.

President.

LOUIS NAPOLEON'S MISTAKE.

The intervention in Mexico was a mistake, though we are precluded from condemning it too loudly. Our own government was ill-advised enough to concur in the moderate attempt as first suggested, and we can only congratulate ourselves that it had the discretion to retire as soon as it could with decency. It ought to have been seen from the first that it would be impossible to restrict the movement to its proposed dimensions, and even were it possible, the movement would still be impolitic. The practical question is, however, what shall the Emperor Napoleon do? Luckily, it is not our function to determine his future policy. There are some situations in which it seems equally impossible to advance or retreat. The Emperor may, however, persuade himself that he must either advance or retreat; it is impossible to do both, as so many people would willingly do, and it is equally impossible to stand still. If he retreat, he exposes himself to the imputation of failure, and must run the risk of the disfavor which the French are very apt to feel toward anything like a want of military success; but he would be relieved from considerable exposure, would mitigate some domestic opposition, and would appease the American people. If he persists, he must be prepared for growing embarrassments, and must brave American resentment. We are not inclined to reckon this last danger so threatening as it is assumed to be. American officials must, of course, resent the establishment of an Empire in Mexico; it is opposed to every tradition of American policy, and it is a simple duty to protest against it. American politicians and writers must and will declaim against it, were it only because a little bluster against Maximilian is such an easy escape from the discussion of delicate domestic problems. But were he to withdraw his support, it is most probable that the Emperor Maximilian would soon return to Europe, and the Emperor Napoleon would have to acknowledge that a scheme upon which he had invited thousands of French lives and millions of French money had ignominiously failed, and that the French army had been compelled to recoil from before a contemptible enemy. It is a most painful dilemma.—London Times.

IDAHO—THE FABLED LAND OF OPHIR.

The message of Gov. Lyon to the Legislature of Idaho, contains some points of interest to Eastern people. During the past year it seems over $17,000,000 worth of gold and silver has been produced in that Territory, and the yield is rapidly increasing. The following paragraphs from the message reads like an extract from the "Arabian Nights":

"A bird's-eye view of the accumulating discoveries in our mineral resources, reveals that we have no less than 3000 gold and silver bearing quartz ledges, graded in their value as in their richness, and new discoveries and new locations are made almost daily. The width of these lodes or leads, vary from 3 to 30 feet, and they prospect from $20 to $500 per ton. Located usually where water power and timber are in abundance, they offer the highest inducements to the enterprising capitalists, whose investment can rarely fail of being of the most remunerative character.

Among the other useful ores which have been discovered within the last year, tin, cianabar, copper, lead, and iron in many forms, are of the first value; yet platina, antimony, nickel, bismuth, irridium and rhodium, simple or compounded with other minerals, are found in various localities; but this is not all. Beds of the best of coal, both anthracite and bituminous, with rock salt, sulphur and gympsum—better known as the fertilizing plaster of commerce—while the most precious gems, the diamond, has been discovered in our gulches, all give you a feeling foretaste of the illimitable extent of Idaho's varied mineral wealth when the hand of man shall have unbosomed her hidden treasures. The wide extent of our auriferous placers, only a moiety of which have been well prospected, checkered as they are by auriferous quartz lodes and leads, are rivaled only by argentiferous mountain ledges, striated, luminated and folinted with silver in chlorides sulphurets—arsenical, antimonial and virgin. This presents a fabulous array of marvelous deposits which will require the industry of ages to develop and exhaust.—St. Louis Press, 8.

IMMIGRATION TO MEXICO.

We receive by every steamer from the United States, letters asking information about Mexico. These letters are written mostly from Georgia, Tennessee, Texas and Louisiana. Some are from New York, Maryland, Missouri and Nebraska. For the benefit of all we take this method of answering their questions:

1st. "Do you think the Empire is established on a firm basis? Is life, liberty and property secure in Mexico?"

We think that the Empire is firmly established. The Emperor Maximilian governs to-day more territory than ever did any President or military chieftain in Mexico. Within twelve months the Imperial flag will float quietly over every portion of the Empire. Fresh foreign troops are daily arriving, and the native citizens themselves are forming companies all over the country and putting down the bands of robbers which have ever infested Mexico.

We repent, that within twelve months this country will be perfectly quiet. Persons and property are safer in Mexico now than they were ever known before.

2. "Can we get land from the Government—and if so on what terms?"

All the lands owned by the Government and surveyed have been taken. As fast as these lands are surveyed they are brought into the market. Surveying is a tedious and expensive business, and therefore progresses slowly.

In this view we advise all who wish to emigrate to Mexico as agriculturalists not to come unless they have some capital. It is better to emigrate in companies of twenty-five or thirty, and buy lands in a body, of private individuals. Lands can be had very cheap—at from one to two dollars per acre—according to quality, situation, and improvements. In fact, he who comes here with a small amount of capital will be suited at once, without any trouble. But to those unfortunates who are without means, we advise them to stay at home until they can make enough to have a small beginning.

If you are a civil engineer or surveyor—if you desire to labor with your own hands on farms and railroads, then come, you will all find ample employment.

This is no place for doctors and lawyers and clergymen. These vocations are all filled to overflowing.

In the way of merchandise, business is also overdone, and we advise no adventurers of this kind.

If, however, you have steam engines or other labor saving machines that can be put to practical use, come with them, they will all find a ready sale here.

Fine carriages, buggies, horses, and especially large, well matched mules, in good condition, are in great demand and bring very high prices.

3d. "How is society in Mexico?"

Well, this is rather a vague question, but we will try and answer it. Mexico is Catholic in religion, and the people are principally composed of those who speak the Spanish language. There are, however, many English, French, Belgians, Germans and Americans here. You can select such society as you please. You can go to mass on Sunday morning, and to a bull-fight in the evening, and to the opera at night. Or you can go and hear a very good Protestant sermon in French, and afterwards take a ride on the Paseo. The emigrants make society for themselves, and we believe are all doing very well.

4th. "In what part of Mexico would you advise us to settle?"

The neighborhood of Cordova, Jalapa and Orizaba we think the best portions of Mexico. All these are near the railroad, and will place you as near New Orleans as you would be in Tennessee or Missouri.

The village of Carlota, near Cordova, settled by Americans, bids fair to do well.

The climate is healthy and delightful. The soil is rich and well watered, and produces everything that you may desire to cultivate. In fact, nearly every part of this vast Empire possesses many advantages.

Yucatan is rapidly filling up with emigrants.

In Sinaloa, near Mazatlan, there are many Americans raising cotton.

On the Rio Verdi river, at Parras, and at Guadalajara, are many others, all engaged in raising cotton, which they find very profitable.

Near Orizaba and Cordova, sugar, coffee, and tobacco are the principal productions.

In Yucatan, Tabasco, Soconusco and the southern departments, cocoa, (chocolate) sugar and coffee are the principal articles cultivated.

In Oaxaca, cochineal; in Campeche, the dye-woods.

In Lower California are the pearl fisheries, and Guanajuato, Zacatecas, Guadalajara, San Luis Potosi, Tamaulipas and Tampico are all rich in silver and gold mines. They also are fine agricultural and grazing departments.

The frontier is exclusively a grazing country.

Sonora, Sinaloa, Guerrero and Michoacan are the richest in the precious metals.

The national drink, pulque, is raised all over the Empire.

We have thus given a pretty general account of Mexico. The Empire is open to emigration from all parts of the world. The Imperial Government has, by the most liberal decrees, invited all to come.

To sum up our advice, we say, this is the finest country on the face of God's earth, and presents the best openings for comfortable homes and large fortunes for those who have a small capital on which to begin, but to those who are without means, we say, in all candor, to stay where you are.

5th. "How shall we go? What route shall we take?"

We advise you to go to New Orleans and take a sail vessel direct for Vera Cruz, or take a steamer for Havana and thence to Mexico. It is only six days' passage.

We believe we can safely say that all the emigrants in Mexico from the United States are doing well. They have to work hard and submit to many privations, but this is the case in all new countries. Learn to labor and to wait. Put your trust in Providence, and all will be well in the end. No man in seeking a new home can expect all the comforts of the old, but his energy and industry will, in a few short years, insure him a rich reward, giving him all that the heart could desire.—City of Mexico Times.

EX-PRESIDENT PIERCE'S VIEWS ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Ex-President Pierce was invited to a seat in the Democratic Convention of the State of New Hampshire, recently held for the purpose of nominating candidates for the State offices.

Being called on for a speech, the old gentleman responded briefly, as follows:

Our country has passed through serious perils, but I hope that we are now emerging from the thick darkness which at one time brooded over it.

The present time calls for the calm, dispassionate and patriotic exertions of all good men, in the work of restoration, not merely in form, but a restoration of a community of interests, fraternal feeling, and an equality of rights, among all the States.

I think I can discern gleams of light. The annual message of President Johnson was admirable; and in my judgment his subsequent steps, looking to restoration, have been guided by wisdom, patriotism, and statesmanlike forecast.

I am pleased to greet, as co-workers in a noble cause, all men who desire the immediate restoration of the Southern States to civil rights, and who join their efforts in saving whatever may be saved for the prosperity of our common country. Under any circumstances it would be abject to despair of the Republic.

These are the views of a statesman. Franklin Pierce is made of the right kind of metal. His sentiments evince soundness of judgment. How much better would it be for the whole country, if every man holding position in the Government, viewed the situation as does Mr. Pierce. How much happier for all, would it be, if the same conceptions of honor and justice distinguished the members of the National Congress.

There is a faint streak of light visible on the horizon. Let us hope that it heralds the coming of the great Sun of Peace, with all its rich and choicest blessings.—Augusta Chronicle and Sentinel, 13th inst.

☞ The Reconstruction Committee, says a Washington special, has decided to report another amendment to the Constitution, to the effect that Congress shall have power to control all political rights of citizens in every State. The proposition meets with the almost unanimous approval of the Committee.

AN INTERESTING LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT.

Col. Tal. P. Shaffner, the great telegraph prospector, has been making a tour of the South. He writes to the President:

I had no political consideration to move me in the conclusions or to warp my judgment for or against the people, my sole object being to realize the condition of things, that my pen might be guided in after years, should I continue my history of America beyond the epoch embraced in the heretofore published volumes.

I travelled by railway, coach, wagon, on horse, and occasionally on foot, and during my stay at the different places along the route I mingled with the people, white and colored, of every grade of society, and I did not spare my pains to get their views in regard to the future of the South and their individual aspirations—State and National. Having in former years travelled over most of the civilized world with attentive ears and watchful eyes, ever seeking for knowledge, I felt prepared and qualified by experience to refrain from forming hasty conclusions respecting the Southern States, so recently emerged from the passions of war.

The colored people had been informed by some of these agents that after the 1st of January the lands belonging to the whites, who had been slaveholders, were to be divided among the colored people; that after that date, the "bottom rail was to be on top," and that after Christmas the Union railroads were to carry colored people free of expense. These representations were confidently believed by the colored people, and in this manner they have been deluded and enticed from industry to idleness. I saw many thousands tented by the roadside, many living under shelters made with boughs of trees, and many had no other covering than the canopy of heaven. I saw many hardy men wandering about, with bundle and stick, and when asked whither they were travelling, I received in answer that they were searching for rice lands; or, in other words, they were prospecting are the day of general division. At night they quartered with some colored persons, and it does not require much guessing to determine from whence they drew their rations.

Besides my experience as a traveller through many foreign countries, I had gone through foreign wars, and traversed regions invaded by large armies, and I was exceedingly anxious to see with my own eyes the result of a civil war in my own country, waged by my own people, many of whom, too, were my kin.

The report of Lieut. Gen. Grant gives a very correct account of affairs, as I observed them, in the regions traversed by me, and nothing gave me more satisfaction than his remarks upon the conduct of the subordinates of the Freedmen's Bureau, who are, perhaps, the most responsible for the disturbances and contentions between the white and colored people of the South. I never heard of any complaint against the military throughout the whole of my journey, but nearly everywhere I learned that the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau had been more energetic to disturb the peace of society than to promote the welfare of the poor wandering colored people.

A TERRIFIC SCENE.—We find in the Titusville (Pa.) Herald the annexed description of the terrific scene which occurred at Benehoff Run, in that State. Twelve thousand barrels of coal oil, besides numerous dwellings, barns and outbuildings, all on fire at one time, must indeed have been a terrific spectacle. Here is the account:

About 5 o'clock in the afternoon, while some carpenters were engaged in covering a tank full of oil at the Getty well, on Benehoff Run, sparks from the smoke-stack were being driven by the wind directly over where they were working, and one of the men, apprehensive of danger, went to notify the superintendent of the fact, but he had not proceeded far before the oil ignited. The inch on top of the tank beat a hasty retreat and escaped without injury, and in a few minutes the tank burst, and an immense sheet of flame and smoke shot up into the heavens.

As the fiery stream rolled past, it attacked everything in its course, tank after tank burst, and all the inhabitants of the valley rushed to the hillside to prevent being swallowed up in a river of liquid fire. The stream continued to roll on until it reached within half a mile of Petroleum Creek; here it came in contact with a large accumulation of ice and snow, which stayed its progress. This, however, did not last long, as the oil forced its way through the ice, but came out at the other side extinguished, and flowed on in its course until it emptied into Oil creek. The scene was now grand beyond description; for near a mile one vast sheet of flame shot heavenward, and the dense black smoke covered the whole country with a black cloud. The sun was now setting, and the reflection upon that cloud rendered it first of a dark purple, then of a red color, and the peculiar rolling motion produced an endless variety of shade, till at last it became dark and black as before. The bright blaze of the fire made everything distinctly visible after, and the hillsides were at one time so hot that an individual was heard to remark that if the infernal regions were anything resembling it he never wished to visit them.

Groups of houseless and panic-stricken women and children were wending their way to Petroleum Center, while gangs of men were at work with pick and shovel, damming the creek at various points. The noise of the splitting rocks was like the constant roll of musketry, and as the burning fluid fell over the dam it produced a sharp, crackling sound, like the discharge of innumerable pistols. The flames at one time completely surrounded and played upon the large iron tank containing 2800 barrels of oil belonging to the Ocean Company. Had this burst, the town of Petroleum Center would that night have been laid in ashes. Good fortune, however, saved it. About 9 o'clock the fire had spent itself, and the oil not consumed was on its way to the Gulf of Mexico.

STONEWALL JACKSON, HOOD AND SHERIDAN. Jackson, according to Lee's account, gained for him Chancellorsville, one of the most decisive victories of that distinguished warrior.

"Hood in the lead of his Texans," from Jackson's official report, gained the first great victory for Lee over McClellan, at Gaines' Mill; and according to Longstreet's and Bragg's record, he, at the head of his corps, struck the blow that gained Chickamauga.

Longstreet, immediately after the battle, urged his promotion, saying after gaining the victory he had the misfortune to lose a limb.

Sheridan, according to General Grant's record, dealt the blow that secured for him the victory at Petersburg, resulting in the surrender of Lee.

Jackson's campaign in the Valley of Virginia will be one of the brightest pages in military history.

Hood's Tennessee campaign and his defense of Atlanta, when they are properly understood, and it is known with what a small dispirited force he had to work with, will rank with any operations of the war. This campaign was made as the last hope of success in the West.

Jackson fell at Chancellorsville, the proudest field of his life, amid the brightest hopes of the Confederacy. With 22,000 men he dealt the blow that achieved this mighty victory.

Hood's last fight under Lee was at Gettysburg, the next great battle after Chancellorsville, and the first check of that mile military chief. Here Hood received his first severe wound, and that stubborn old fighter, Longstreet, then said, and also after the battle: "Had Hood been so fortunate as to escape unhurt, Round Top Mountain would have been carried, and that would have secured victory to the Confederates."

Sheridan's operation in the Valley of Virginia and around Petersburg, distinguished him as the bold, dashing mover of the United States army, and the achievements of Jackson, Hood and Sheridan, as military men, will occupy a conspicuous page in history.—Exchange.

☞ Arlington Heights still remains in possession of the Government, but it is said that the wife of Gen. Lee has recently written to a friend that she intends to return there, even if she is obliged to live in the back quarters." This is indicative of the strength of her determination to reassert what she considers the rights of herself and her husband to this historic property; but among the obstacles she will have to encounter is the fact that twelve thousand Union soldiers have been buried upon its soil.

CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

"I have just returned from a trip through Chattanooga, Atlanta, Columbus, Montgomery and Selma. The state of the country is not favorable. General distrust and dissatisfaction pervade the people of all classes. The oppression and tyranny of the military authorities and Freedmen's Bureau—the robberies committed on defenceless people—the outrages perpetrated—and, above all, the madness and fanaticism displayed in the National Legislature—are creating an intense feeling and a general restlessness among the people. Very many are making preparations to close up their affairs and emigrate. This is a true picture—an inside view. Never, since the cessation of hostilities, have I been so discouraged as since I made this trip."

The foregoing is extracted from a private letter from an intelligent observer who resides in West Tennessee, received by us yesterday. When the war closed, the terms granted to the Confederate troops—the succeeding amnesty proclamation of the President, and the just and liberal line of policy pursued by him to bring about a solid and substantial peace, gave pleasure and hope and confidence to the Southern people. They proceeded with alacrity to the performance of everything required of them to effectuate that policy, and to produce a complete reconciliation and restoration of their old political and social relations with the other States of the Union. This was continued up to the time of the meeting of the present Congress. The maddened majority of that body instantly inaugurated a different policy, and have since pursued it with increasing ardor and ferocity. The effect upon the hopes and expectations of the South is exhibited in the above statement. It is natural and inevitable. Their political and social condition is precisely such as to produce such feelings. This despondency and anxiety and restlessness does not spring from hostility to the Government of the United States, but from the terrible prospect before them of oppression, degradation and wrong, if their enemies in Congress succeed in their purposes, as embodied in the measures which each succeeding day brings forward. They see in the future nothing but gloom and uncertainty, which will make them miserable and reduce their fair land to a desolate waste. With no political rights which they can call their own—with an army raised over them clothed with the power of the sword, only seeking points to strike—and with an arbitrary power of trial and adjudication, claiming and exercising greater jurisdiction than their own civil tribunals, these unresisting people present a most deplorable condition. If their woes are to be perpetuated, then the boasted "conquest" of the South will bring no good to the "conquerors." Emasculated of their manhood, their spirit, vigor and energy, those who remain and survive will add nothing to the wealth or strength of the country. Every day which witnesses the successive triumphs of the fanatics only increases the hideousness of the dreary picture, and renders the people more hopeless.

This is a theme which deserves the serious and most earnest consideration of the Government and the people of the North. The South looks to the President, well knowing that he is powerless without the support of the reflecting mass of the American people. They must rise up and make known their attachment to justice and right. They must rise above the mere rivalries of partisanship, and resolve to sustain the country over party. A series of grand and earnest popular demonstrations throughout the North in unfaltering support of the Union and the Constitution as it is, would go further to check the madness of the hour, to cheer the South and to sustain the President, than any or all things else. The occasion not only justifies but demands such action, and at once.—Nashville Union and American.

CONGRESSIONAL PHASES.

The feeling of apprehension in reference to the action of Congress is not in the least diminishing among our people. The bitterness of the Radicals does not seem to relax on account of the apparently firm stand taken by the President. His interview on the 7th with a negro delegation whose business was to lecture him in respect of universal negro suffrage, and his reply to a delegation of citizens from the Territory of Montana who went to approve his policy, show, however, that he stands firm on the principles of his message.

The negro delegation was almost insolent. It wanted to argue the question. The President snubbed it very adroitly, and it left evidently with no love for him.

In this firm stand there is hope, and we may expect soon to find open war declared against the Government by these radical and cruel madmen. Well, then we shall see something to instruct them in regard to the result. We shall see then if the better elements of Northern opinion will not come to the aid of Mr. Johnson. We have hardly a doubt of the result, and confess that we think the President is moving with remarkable wisdom to his purpose—doing nothing overt, but waiting for the reflux of the tide which will carry radicalism into undisputed power or make it sink into the insignificance to which we believe it is doomed.

A good omen of this is the fact that the Judiciary Committee has "rejected nearly all" the Radical propositions for the amendment of the Constitution.—Mobile Tribune, 16th inst.

MAXIMILIAN AS PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF MEXICO.—Now that the Emperor of France has recognized the American doctrine of President Monroe by withdrawing gracefully from his interference with the affairs of Mexico, it is proper to inquire what will be the fate of the monarch he leaves unsupported by his bayonets. When Maximilian first ascended the throne of Mexico he declared that he did so by the will or the voice of the Mexican people. We do not remember of ever seeing a record of the votes of those people, as we did those of the French people when they almost unanimously elected Napoleon III. the first President of their short-lived Republic. And now, as a "cause of emotion", to the American people has been removed by the timely and considerate action of the French Emperor, would it not be well for Maximilian to consider the propriety of removing another "cause of emotion" to our people by promptly abdicating his imperial throne and casting himself upon the suffrages of the Mexican people as a candidate for the Presidency of a restored Republic of Mexico? This would not only quiet the "emotion of the American people" with respect to the Mexican question, but it would fall upon their irritated minds as a grateful shower falls in midsummer upon fields of parching grain. It is not unlikely that our people would rather like Maximilian and his beautiful consort than otherwise, after a concession like this to American principles and policy. His opponent for the Mexican Presidency would naturally be Juarez, who can show his strength after the French troops are withdrawn. At any rate there is a fine field for Maximilian to establish, if elected to the Presidency of Mexico, a republican court in that country that would become as brilliant and distingue as any that could bear an imperial name.—N. Y. Herald, 9th inst.

MAKING OTHERS HAPPY.—A mother who was in the habit of asking her children, before they retired at night, what they had done to make others happy, found her two twin daughters silent. The question was repeated. "I can remember nothing good all this day, dear mother; only one of my schoolmates was happy because she had gained the head of the class, and I smiled on her, and ran to kiss her; so she said I was good. That is all, dear mother." The other spoke still more timidly. "A little girl, who sat with me on the bench at school, has lost a little brother. I saw that, while she studied her lesson, she hid her face in her book and wept. I felt sorry, and laid my face on the same book and wept with her. Then she looked up and was comforted, and put her arms around my neck; but I do not know why she said I had done her good." "Come to my arms, my darling!" said the mother; "to rejoice with those that rejoice, and weep with those that weep, is to obey our blessed Redeemer!"

☞ A Paris paper states that a bevy of ladies, closely veiled, recently passed along the boulevards of that city, making purchases at the most modest stores, and leaving the articles to be sent for. They paid in gold. It was subsequently ascertained that the party included the empress and ladies of her court, who adopt this mode of giving an impetus to the retail trade.

CEREMONY OF THE PYX.

Among the many curious old official ceremonies exacted by the English Government, is the ceremony of the pyx, or trial which was duly enacted on the 10th ult., in the presence of the Lord Chancellor and other high functionaries at the office of the Controller General, in the palace yard, London. For many years this has been done simply because it is an immemorial usage, the reason for which it was instituted having since passed away. The box is a plain iron safe divided into three compartments, two for silver and one for gold. It is secured by three intricate locks, each of which is opened by a different key. From each ingot of gold or silver, specimen coins are deposited through an aperture in the lid while the box is full. In former times this box was much smaller than now, and the assay took place as often as four times in a year. The method of examination is as follows:

The mass of gold and silver coin is rolled under heavy pressure into two ingots, the metal of each being completely mingled and welded together. A piece is then cut from the end of each ingot, and rolled into

SOUTHERN METHODISM.

THE PASTORATE.

No community remains exactly in one state for any great length of time. In some respects there may be permanency, but in others there is constant change. Every organization includes some vital facts, which are of its very essence, and some others which have only an incidental connection with it. The facts which are vital cannot be disturbed without injury—change in the other may be either injurious or advantageous. Changes which come up naturally in a vigorous, healthy community, are almost always beneficial. Those that are imposed upon it by legislation, depend upon adaptation, or the reverse, for their effect.

Sometimes there are changes so radical, as to impart a new character, without destroying organic, or rather, I should say, historic, external identity. The Church of Rome is an instance of this. Its very organism and spirit have undergone the most complete revolution since the apostolic times, while yet a sort of external identity has been preserved, and a certain species of prosperity maintained. But changes of this kind come on gradually. The way must be prepared for them by degrees. Suddenly and violently introduced, they would be destructive.

This inevitable law of progress, or at least of change, in all institutions, was duly provided for in the establishment of the Church. No rigid form was imposed upon it.—Certainly there were great constitutional principles established; but around these the Christian institution is allowed to organize itself with a certain degree of freedom, according to the exigencies of times and men's manners." Thus every Christian society that keeps within the grand charter of the original constitution, is a part of the body of Christ. And the success of each depends, first and mainly, as set forth in my first article, upon its spirit. There may, indeed, be a part of external prosperity, no doubt, and often is, in churches that depart from the true spirit and objects of the Gospel. But this is not Christian success. I consider a church successful, just so far as it actually contributes to prepare men for eternity, and no farther. Mere numbers, and influence and wealth, count to nothing. There is a species of worldly eclat, apparently, which coveted by some churches, but is very pernicious. Where the spirit and power of Christ are, men will be saved, though the offence of the cross be connected with it.

Efficiency of organization, though subordinate, is yet a powerful adjunct in the work of the Church. What about our Methodist polity? Is it the best, or can it be improved? Shall the itinerant system be perpetuated as it is, or modified, or displaced by a settled pastorate? Advocates of each of these forms of policy are to be found amongst us.

Strongly conservative men dread any change. Their motto is—"let well enough alone." The argument is that having prospered wonderfully with our present system, we ought to be satisfied with it. Our system is tried; we know that it has accomplished vast results. To depart from it is only an experiment, and may be a failure. Per contra, it is asserted that of late, in many localities, and especially in large cities, we are not having any great success, but on the contrary, are losing ground. Many young people of our families are going off to other churches, and in old communities the permanent pastors have an advantage over us in a strong personal influence.

We know that there is truth enough in these statements to awaken solicitous inquiry. Is the itinerant system effete? Is there any reason why it should not be as effective now as formerly?

When Methodism originated, its preaching was peculiar. It was so in doctrine. It set forth a free, full, present salvation. As distinguished from predestination, it was very striking, and thoroughly adapted to the popular mind. It had also a test to maintain with the old laxity, for at that time predestination was the established doctrine, in America, at least, and the Arminianism of the English Church was very thoroughly evangelical.—Against the semi-Pelagians it maintained the doctrine of the new birth, and against the Calvinists of salvation for all. It was triumphant at the bar of public judgment. It was peculiar, too, in its exhortatory fervor. The people abandoned the dry, written essays of their old pastors, that were so tedious and tiresome. The extemporaneous pathos of the Methodist preachers attracted them. Once attracted by it, their consciences were aroused. This was a most extraordinary source of success. But it is so no longer. The Methodist doctrines and fervor, and extemporaneous habits are to be found this day in three-fourths of all the pulpits of other denominations in the land. We have lost that advantage, then, and by means that we ought to be grateful for.

The next suggestion I have to make is, that hitherto our work has been, to a large extent, of the aggressive character. There is nothing like a system of itinerant evangelism for aggression. Stagnation is next to impossible. To go into new fields and make conquests in alien territories, is its peculiar function.—While the land was yet to be occupied, these lighthorse skirmishers were just the thing. By no other system could the Methodists have spread themselves all over this broad land so rapidly. For such a work the itinerancy was the very thing. Peering around everywhere, the Methodist preachers found every open door, and entered in. There is a promptness and vigor in it that is not in any other system. But now the case is altered, and our success in the future depends as much upon conserving our past conquests as upon gaining new ones. Otherwise our losses will counterbalance our success. In many places they do so now. But how shall we preserve what we now hold? How shall we keep within our fold the children of Methodist families? Is the itinerant system a good conservative one? My observation is that it is not. It does not supply an efficient pastorate. The influence of the pastor is, to a large extent, personal. This is lost by frequent change. Hence so large a proportion of our revival converts go into other churches, where there is already a pastoral tie between them and the pastor; and hence, too, in a great part, that more deplorable fact, that so many converted under one preacher are lost under the administration of his successor.

The itinerant system is the best aggressive system in the world, but a mighty poor conservative one.

Again. In the West, where the country was newly settled, the success of the Methodist ministry grew partially out of the fact, that it supplied preaching to a great many destitute neighborhoods. This it was enabled to do by means of week-day appointments. As the country grows older, other preachers come in and establish Sunday services. Then the week-day appointment is soon deserted. At least this is my observation. I know populous neighborhoods, where we once had flourishing societies supplied by week-day preaching; but now all is lost, because other denominations introduced Sunday preaching, and we did not.

There is yet one other fact to which I must call attention, in this connection. The itinerant system requires, for complete efficiency, unmarried men. Families are too cumbrous for it. The moment a man has any "circumstances," he becomes a poor traveling preacher. In an early day none of the preachers, scarcely, had wives. Those were the palmy days of the "traveling connection." Then the Bishop had but one interest to consult in making the appointments, and that was the interest of the Church. The question was, where can this man do the most good? Now, nearly all the preachers are married, and another question becomes imperative—where can this brother get bread for his children? Aye—there are many questions. Can the brother move? If so, how far? Can this circuit pay the cost of moving? O! ye Bishops and Presiding Elders, what a time ye have. And I fear much that when the incumbrances of all these great families are duly provided for, there remains often but little room to ask, by what distribution of these men the Church may best be served.

Indeed the fact is patent that the itinerant system is already much impaired by this means. Men are obliged to see to it that their families do not starve. This they cannot do and be perpetually on the move. They procure a home and settle their families. Around this homestead they revolve until they wear out as itinerants, without establishing the solid footing of pastors. They enjoy the advantages neither of the one system nor of the other. My brethren, is this not so?

I come, then, to the following conclusions:

1. That our system is deficient in the pastoral function, and that this defect is inherent in the system.—The ideal class-leader might supply this deficiency, in a great measure; but class-meetings are a failure, comparatively, and the ideal class-leader is scarcely to be found. Now there is no more important office in the Church than that of the pastor. Any great defect at this point must be damaging to the Church. It becomes us to weigh this matter well. It cannot be much longer delayed with safety. Indeed I doubt not that we have already lost ground by this means.

2. That the itinerant system has lost much of its former vigor in having so many families to provide for, and no longer enjoys the advantage of favoring circumstances, as formerly. And it might well be added on this point, that there is a growing tendency to less vigor in the Annual Conference examinations of character. Hence the accumulation of inefficient men in our ranks, and this detracts very materially from the force of the system. It would be the blindest sort of folly to expect the same results as formerly under the present condition of things.

3. Still, the Church needs also a vigorous aggressive policy, and probably always will. The aggressive work is by no means fully accomplished. Much of the land remains to be occupied. Even under the shadow of long established churches there is work for the evangelist to do.

If these conclusions are correct—and to my mind they carry the force of demonstration—what ought to be done? Shall we, from mere dread of change, do nothing? I know that a reckless spirit of innovation is dangerous, and that changes ought to be introduced cautiously, upon due deliberation, and to meet evident necessities only. A thorough reverence of the past is characteristic of a healthy condition of the Church. So also is a hearty appreciation of the present. I would not drive away recklessly from our traditions. A legitimate conservatism is essential to stability. So is also the spirit of progress necessary to growth. It is by maintaining a wise balance between these that we are to find safety and advancement. If we go too fast, we may go to pieces; if we do not move at all, we must stagnate. If we progress at a safe rate, we shall find life, and health and power. We are not to despise innovation. Methodism itself was an innovation.—But it was an innovation called for by the imperious wants of the Church. Mr. Wesley, paradoxical as the statement may seem, though he was the very prince of innovators, was an eminently conservative man. He reluctated at every step. Change, for the sake of change merely, was odious to him. When he did give way, to be sure he took his measures with that decisiveness which secured to his agencies their full effect. He was not a man for half measures. While he did not relish innovation, he could not bear stagnation, and adventured on the one only because it was the sole method of escape from the other. He succeeded because he conformed to the necessities of the time. He was "master of the situation." What the Church needed then was, not a pastorate, but an active evangelism. Mr. Wesley supplied it. If the Church of England had had the wisdom and magnanimity to adopt Mr. Wesley's Conference, and incorporate it, there never would have been a Methodist Church.

But what the Methodist Church needs now is a pastorate—the conservative power of a permanent ministry in our churches. In addition to the facts already given, as indicating the necessity for this, let me call attention to another that ought to fill us with the utmost concern. It is this: We lose many of our best men from the ministry just at the time when their experience is sufficiently mature to qualify them well for the pastoral office, and when their character is so established as to give them weight in any community. They are starved out, not because the people are either unable or unwilling to support them, but because the itinerant friction allows them no opportunity of husbanding their resources.—Many others become half secularized for the same reason. I have have known a Presiding Elder and a Preacher in charge to go a long distance on Saturday morning to a Quarterly Meeting, get there late, and on Sunday, after dinner, ride back home, over twenty miles, to look after their business. Such a slovenly manner of attending to the affairs of the Church is about equal to nothing. Indeed I suspect that the example of Sunday traveling, from motives of business, does more harm than their preaching does good. A half secular clergy is a poor excuse. But these men, as permanent pastors among the people, establishing a personal influence in the community, and with the opportunity of husbanding their revenue, might be comfortably supported.

But "the situation" now is more complicated than it was in Mr. Wesley's time, and requires more delicate handling. He only had a new system to create; we have an old one to modify. He had only to provide for an active evangelism; we have that interest to preserve and re-invigorate, while we provide a more adequate pastorate. Like him, we may well reluctate, but like him, we must act too, or suffer the alternative—stagnation.

What, then, is to be done? I can only "show you mine opinion." I have already said that we need a more adequate pastoral system. I have also intimated that we still need an active evangelism—one endowed with something like the primitive elasticity and force. Can these objects both be secured?—Evidently we need both. Is it practicable?

So far, I have theorized, and I have done it confidently, because the matter seems plain to me.—What remains is to show how to work in view of the theory. This is an infinitely more difficult task. I do not feel by any means so certain of the practicability of any plan I can devise, as I do of the truth of my theorizing. But perhaps it becomes me, after having said so much, to offer some practical suggestions. I begin then with the following general remark:

No change must be so radical as to clash with our general system.—This much is due to conservatism. All modifications of the system must be in keeping with its character. If we get the wheels within the wheels to running in the reverse direction to each other, something must break. We must preserve the due balance between conservatism and progress. This premised, I suggest:

1. Let the Episcopal General Superintendency remain untouched.—We need no innovation there. More than any other one thing, it is the controlling fact of our system. Let it remain as it is.

2. Remove the limit of the pastoral term. I am clear that there ought to be no limit. Let the appointing power act freely. Let men be liable to removal at any time, but only for good cause.

3. Require the young preachers to remain unmarried eight or ten years, to "do the work of evangelism." And if any choose to remain unmarried always, and devote themselves to this work, let the sacrifice be accepted. It shall be a sacrifice of a sweet savor, an odor well pleasing to God.

4. If possible, let the preachers be compelled to avoid secularization. I know this is a delicate and intricate subject, and perhaps a strong moral force is all that can be brought to bear in the case. Every preacher ought to be made to feel that just to the extent in which he becomes a man of business he violates his ordination vows, and damages the Church.

5. I do not see that we need to meddle with the Presiding Eldership. It seems to me to be a very good institution—only that some of the incumbents seem to be men who have been solemnly ordained to the office and work of planters, and who have taken up Presiding Eldering a little occasionally for variety and recreation.

The second and third of the foregoing suggestions imply a difference in the office of pastor and that of evangelist. The difference is real. And the distinction will come out of its own accord in the practical working of the system if these changes should be made. The mature men will fall into those positions where the presence of the pastor is needed, and the younger and available men will be kept actively itinerating. Ultimately, as the changing character of the work may require, the two classes may be somewhat interspersed among each other in the same territory, co-operating with each other and aiding each other in various ways.

This system will place heavy responsibility upon the Bishops, and will depend, for success, largely upon their firmness and sagacity.—But, although some other plans have been suggested in my thoughts, this seems to me to be the best I can devise. I do not expect it to command universal favor. Perhaps but few may approve it.—Yet I doubt not something will be done in this direction very soon.—And I am satisfied that both the pastoral and evangelistic characters must concur in the ministry, in order to the largest success. ICE—The following facts about the strength of ice on the surface of lakes and ponds, will be interesting to skaters: Ice two inches thick will bear infantry; four inches, cavalry with light guns; six inches, heavy field guns; and eight inches, the heaviest siege guns, with one thousand lbs. weight to the square foot.

THE TWO YEARS' LIMITATION OF THE APPOINTING POWER.

Mr. Editor—For many years past many of the laymen and ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church South have expressed a desire for change of some of the features of the polity of their Church. In some this desire is a consequence of a remoter or nearer approximation to a clear seeing of the necessity of change.

One of the requirements which some wish to change is that limiting the appointing of preachers to the same field of labor to two consecutive years. Some of the advocates for a change of this rule propose merely the extension of the number of consecutive years to four, for which an appointment may be held; while others suggest the abrogation of the time limitation, and that the continuance of a preacher at one place be left to the judgment of the appointing power.

I do not now consider which of these forms of change is the better, but simply the thing indicated by both the proposed forms, namely, that there ought to be an extension of the same ministerial life in one place; that instead of restricting to the performance of mere fractional work, opportunity ought to be allowed for labor more nearly exhaustive of capability for ministerial doing.

The opposers of change urge that innovation is dangerous; that the present system has worked well—that through its instrumentality the spread of the Gospel has been beyond all former example.

If a system be perfect, innovation is injurious; for in that case addition, subtraction or substitution, serves only to mar. But if the system is susceptible of improvement, then innovation is dangerous only when the thing sought to be introduced is clearly worse than that it might displace; or is manifestly unsusceptible of adjustment to the other parts of the system. If probability of advantage can be made out for the thing proposed, then trial is the only fair test of worth, and experience must decide whether or not it be an improvement. "The present system has worked well."—If by well-working is meant working consistently with itself—that is, in conformity with the principles and spirit of its distinctive requirements, the assertion is untrue.

It is well known that in most Conferences there are men whose families have remained at permanent homes, or who have rotated through a circle of appointments the most convenient to them, and selected especially to allow them to remain at their homes. It cannot be alleged that this rotary movement is itinerancy; for the thing intended is the avoiding the inconveniences of the itinerancy and yet maintain the appearance of enforcing and obeying the letter of the rule.

If the non-occupancy of the fixed home be the distinguishing feature of itinerancy, the system has not worked well, for in these instances it has not worked at all.

It has been said that Methodistic labor has been more efficient and successful in spreading the knowledge of the Gospel than any other. Let this be granted; yet the efficiency and success will hardly be thought due to the machine, but rather to the living spirit by which the machine has been worked. It is the earnest missionary spirit of Methodism that has carried the Gospel to the neglected multitudes, and not the particular form of ecclesiastical contrivance through which it has wrought.

I have not intended or attempted fully to discover the objections urged by the opposers of change, but simply to hint at somewhat that might be wrought into answers.—As before said, the thing to be effected by the proposed change is the prolongation of the same ministerial life in one field of labor. By many this is believed to be necessary to the well-being of the Church. The existence of this belief is, I think, profoundly significant—significant of the failure of the present system to appease a real and rightful want; in the people, want of fuller and closer communion with him appointed to feed the flock of Christ; in the minister, want of opportunity to reach the conditions which render practicable the faithful and successful performance of pastoral work; and in both, to attain to that trustful friendship, the natural growth of continued Christian intercourse; to realize the fraternity tested by events that awaken sympathy, and approved by experience; and to actualize the brotherhood of heart-association.

The work of the ministry is conservative as well as aggressive—a work of deepening and building up to be done, as well as one of widening. To keep the flock of Christ is required of the ministry; but the different parts of this flock are exposed to special risks of harm, and to peculiar liabilities of loss. To provide against these risks and liabilities, they must be known and understood; and for this time is needed—more time than two years. This statement requires no argument in its support. It is a fact of which every thoughtful preacher is painfully convinced who earnestly desires to be a pastor.

Under the present system full and true pastoral work is not done, and is indeed impossible. The pastoral work, as now understood, is, visiting from house to house, for the especial benefit of the people. Now, to do this, there must be a fuller communion of the heart, and of the truest feelings of the parties concerned. But such communion can only occur when the relationship is felt to be intimate, and where it is known to be true enough and old enough to be trusted. A relation to do this, must have time to grow and mature. And it is only when the preacher ceases to be exclusively an official or social fact, and becomes in every house a domestic fact, that this pastoral relation is matured. There it is that true pastoral work may be done.—Personal intercourse will become Christian communion, blessing the people and blessing the pastor.—By kindly, paternal dealing with the children, he may bring them within the pale of the Church, and thence to Christ. He will become the overseer of souls, by having become the brother of souls. This brotherhood is not a mere inference from denominational connection, but a felt vitality; a living, working fact.

Under the existing arrangement there may be and is much of technically religious visiting. But this is too constrained to be useful, and not unfrequently degenerates into irksome routine.

Extension of the ministerial term would afford opportunity for a fuller spiritual education of the people; and the existence of the opportunity would awaken demand for such education. The milk-dispensing preachers and the milk-requiring people will give way to the meat-furnishing preachers and the meat-digesting people; and the Church will become strong through the increased Christian manhood of her members.

To teach Christ fully requires systematic effort, prosecuted through several years: and if the man be competent to the task, it is clearly better that the work of teaching should be performed by the same man. Preachers would be compelled more diligently to search the Scriptures, and to search whatever else would serve to make available the knowledge of the Scriptures; they would be required to become, besides, well instructed unto the Kingdom of Heaven, and to bring forth the old and the new things out of a well-filled treasure. Preachers would have less of cant and more of truth—would be more thoughtful and less word-full—more instructive and less declamatory. Men's usefulness would be measured by a standard more nearly approaching the Scriptural, and not solely by the arithmetical scale; and success would be determined by the amount of spiritual work done, and not by the length of the master-roll to be presented to Conference.

These are a few of the benefits which I think would follow the extension of the ministerial term.

By those who have had opportunity to know, it is said we have lost ground in most cities, towns and rural districts, where there are settled ministers of other denominations. It is said that resident ministers acquire an influence never possessed by the transitory; and that among us the preachers of the largest social influence are those who have resided at fixed homes.—If these statements assert facts, they are facts the import of which is worth seeking. This, however, I will not now attempt.

The present system has caused the Gospel to touch at many places; but how much of Christian life has it developed? Let one or two facts answer:

There are in the Mississippi Conference, say one hundred and twenty (120) preachers. There are less than twenty (20) parsonages, and these, for the most part, are houses inferior to the average in construction, in dimensions, and inconveniently located. A hundred (100) of these preachers are received at their respective works kindly, but practically out of doors. Annual reports show that many salaries are not fully paid. The largest salaries are small, and in the main made up of contributions which prodigality disdains to waste, and parsimony is ashamed to withhold.

I believe these evils would be lessened by a nearer approach to a settled ministry. Let it be remembered that the proposed changes need not diminish the aggressive vigor of the itinerancy.

In conclusion, allow me to express the hope that this biennial burial of ministers will soon cease, and longer life be allowed them.

Woodville, Miss. L.

THE CHINA MISSION.

Dear Brethren—Although our brethren in China have received no supplies from home since the first year of the war, they have, by renting mission property, and in other ways, been able to maintain themselves up to the present time. The rapid increase in the population of Shanghai, consequent upon the disturbed state of the interior during the Tae-ping rebellion, caused a great advance in the value of real estate, and a corresponding advance, of course, in rents. Our mission had two vacant houses, the one in which brother Lambuth lived, and the one which I occupied. These they rented for a sum sufficient to supply their immediate personal wants—but the men to whom the property was rented failed in business, and left without paying the full amount for which they had contracted. In the meantime the country had become comparatively quiet, and the multitudes who had sought refuge from the interior cities at Shanghai returned to their homes, and hundreds of houses were left unoccupied. Rents as a consequence went down. How the brethren have managed to live since this source of supply failed them, I cannot tell. They have held up bravely, and while their letters to me express anxiety for the future, and show that they are greatly straightened for means, there is no complaining or want of confidence in God or the Church.

The mission must have help. But how it is to be given just at this time, I do not see. The Church throughout the South is but little better off for funds than the mission. But it must have relief some way. The Church cannot afford to let these dear brethren starve.—They have suffered cheerfully, and will bear without complaining as long as it is unavoidable. I hope the Missionary Board will be able to do something for them soon. I am glad to see that the Kentucky and Louisville Conferences have raised funds for the China Mission. But the depreciation of the currency, and the enormous rates of foreign exchange, reduce their contributions so greatly, that I fear the relief they may afford will be but partial.

There are three men with their families now in China—Lambuth, Wood and Allen. Our dear brother Wood has suffered that heaviest of all earthly afflictions to a missionary—the loss of his beloved wife.—One year ago last March, sister Wood left her mission home, her husband and two children, for the missionary's reward in heaven. A more devoted, faithful servant the Church never sent to that field. We have lost much by her death. But she has gained all for which we are toiling and suffering. She sleeps sweetly in Jesus, though stranger hands laid her down to rest in a stranger's land. O! if there be a grave over which angels watch with more care than another, or on which the star of hope shines more brightly, it is the grave of the foreign missionary. God bless the missionaries!

Our native preacher Liew, was, at my last advices from China, in extreme ill health. Serious fears were entertained for his life. I hope God, in mercy, will spare him to the mission. His value to us, in many ways, is beyond estimation. As a preacher, he has no equal among the native assistants in China. His consistent, godly example before his countrymen, is an argument which neither heathen wit nor malice can gainsay.

I must close. This letter is much longer than I intended it should be when I begun.

I have more to tell you about our China mission, but not now. Pray for China.

Your brother in Christ,

W. G. E. CUNNYNGHAM.

CATHOLICISM IN THE UNITED STATES. The Catholic World says that no where has the Catholic Church increased so prosperously within the last fifty years, as in the United States. About two thousand chapels and churches built; an increase of one thousand eight hundred clergymen; one hundred and sixteen schools established for the Catholic training of eighteen thousand boys and thirty-four thousand girls. Moreover, there existed, in 1861, sixty-six asylums, with four thousand nine hundred and sixty-three orphans of both sexes; twenty-six hospitals, with three thousand beds; four insane asylums, besides many other charitable institutions—all established and supported by the private charity of Catholics.

The darker the setting, the brighter the diamond.

Our agents are authorised to settle with all persons indebted to the Advocate at the rate of fifty cents on the dollar.

GENERAL CONFERENCE EXTRA.

During the session of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, to be held in this city in April next, we shall issue a Daily Extra, which will be furnished at two dollars for the whole period of the session. Persons wishing it will please forward their subscriptions at an early day.

TO OUR AGENTS AND SUBSCRIBERS

1. The price of the paper is FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE: and it will be sent or 12 months only, unless the subscription price is renewed. We propose to keep no other books than the one containing the names of subscribers and their address. Due notice will be given in the paper a few weeks previous to the end of the subscription.

2. All travelling Preachers in the several patronizing Conferences throughout the Southwest are our Agents. They will receive a paper for five subscribers, and be paid one dollar for each subscription over that number.

3. If money forwarded by mail is registered at the Postoffice when it is mailed, we will take the responsibility of its safety. But where it can be forwarded by private hands, the security is greater.

4. Be explicit in writing names and offices and routes—especially in directing to the "New Orleans CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE," as the Church North has already issued a sheet in this city entitled the "New Orleans Advocate."

NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

A Branch of the Methodist Publishing House is located in this city, and the Rev. R. J. Harp has recently been appointed Agent of it. It has on hand a good supply of our Church Publications—a large one of Hymn Books.

The well known enterprise and industry of the Agent is the best assurance that can be given that all orders will be promptly and correctly filled. The Express Companies for a trifle will insure the safe delivery of any books which our friends in the country may order.—Address Rev. R. J. Harp, New Orleans, No. 113 Camp street.

CATE & CO.

We have long known these gentlemen as men of enterprise, and as reliable friends of the South. What they profess to do they are actually doing—making and manfacturing Shoes in better style and of better stock than Eastern goods, and at low prices. We heartily endorse their advertisement as a fair statement.

MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE.

We are in receipt of the "Minutes" of this Conference, too late to do more this week than notice the fact of their publication. We are now able to send a number of this Advocate to the members of this Patronizing Conference—guessing, in many instances, at their postoffice.

We will be greatly obliged to our agents to suggest names of persons to whom it would be well to forward a specimen number. By the aid of the Government mail and the Southern Express, we hope to reach every point in Alabama. In this connection we are glad to state that our subscription list is increasing daily; and that Providence blessing our labors, it will be but a little while before the Advocate will have fairly renewed its youth."

DELEGATES TO THE GENERAL CONFERENCE.

We urgently request that the names of the Delegates be furnished us of the Arkansas, Rio Grande and Western Virginia Conferences.—Brethren who have the lists, and are able to furnish them, will confer a favor by doing so immediately.

"ARKANSAS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE." We welcome, among our exchanges, this Messenger of the Churches. It is edited by the Rev. J. E. Cobb, and published at Little Rock, by John Messenger, at $4 per annum.—The "Advocates" are great centres of information. They serve not only to diffuse light, but as a rallying point to the friends of our cause.—The mails are the main obstacle to their success; but our friends must bear, not with the papers, or the Church, but with the Postmaster General.

THANKS.—We are quite obliged to the Representatives of the State Legislature for placing their Hall, desks, etc., at the service of the General Conference of the M. E. Church South, to convene in April.

CHANGE OF NAME.

An able writer in the "Episcopal Methodist" discusses the proposed change in the title of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. He says:

"It may be regarded as a foregone conclusion that the unfortunate postfix 'South,' is to be dropped from the name and title of our Church. There were grave and earnest objections urged against the adoption of this cumbrous and awkward appendage in the Convention at Louisville, when and where the name and title of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Southern States was debated and settled."

* * * * *

"Ineffectual efforts have been made, time and again, to change the name, or at least to substitute it by something else. The time has now come, under the new regime, when this must be done. It admits of no debate. But what title shall be given?—We propose, EPISCOPAL METHODIST CHURCH—that, and nothing more."

"An intelligent correspondent," he adds, "in high position, suggests, "Methodist Episcopal Church in America." From this correspondent he quotes:

"Our theological system has been developed and elaborated in connection with a name—Methodist Episcopal Church. The people can hardly disconnect the two easily or safely. Drop 'South,' of course.—Why not have it this—'The Methodist Episcopal Church in America'? This is my nomination, and I have made some headway in securing its support, in high places, too. It is better than 'Wesleyan' this or that. To name a church after an uninspired man, does not strike me favorably. This is Bishop Kavanaugh's objection to a name offered by a few excellent brethren in Tennessee—such as the 'Wesleyan Methodist Church.' As for leaving Episcopal out of our name, that never will do, unless we mean to give up the thing. The Northern Methodists twit us at our sectionalism, and the word 'South' does bear that construction; henceforth more than ever. Not a fair construction; but very possible. Their title in law is, 'Methodist Episcopal Church, in the United States.' Now, this Church would be away from home in Central America, Brazil, or anywhere out of the United States; but, the 'Methodist Episcopal Church in America," would localize them, comparatively, as does 'South' now sectionalize us, compared with them. Moreover, 'The Methodist Episcopal Church in America' is the ancient and first style of our Church, at its organization in 1784; and it so continued till 1804, when the more limited title, 'Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States" seems to have been adopted. I crave for our branch of Methodism to inherit the old name, and not only a national but a continental one."

Another writer, in the same paper, is in favor of a change. He objects to the present title, that the "appendage 'South' would seem to imply that we intend to confine our operation to the geographical limits of the Southern States; when the great Head of the Church has said, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." He thinks it would be well to take the name suggested by Dr. Charles K. Marshall, viz: the "Evangelical Methodist Church."

In these quotations we have probably given the best, maybe the principal reasons for assuming a new name. As the two Methodist Churches must now come in competition with each other, like other denominations, it is important that the distinction between them, both real and nominal, be made sufficiently obvious. But other considerations, we suppose, lie at the bottom of this very generally expressed wish for a change. The fury with which the Northern Methodist Church, during the war, vindicated her loyalty, has given a new expression to her character. Her Church journals and her Bishops, out-Heroding Herod, were not satisfied with the enterprise and zeal of the more worldly patriot, but bemoaned from the pulpit, that "the war had ended a year too soon;" and long after its conclusion, still baying and scenting the track, they were hard to call off, and the very last to come in. It cannot be disguised, that our people throughout the South turn from that unholy wedlock of Righteousness and Rapacity. "Hating even the garment spotted by the flesh," they look around for some way of escape from the bare imputation of a name which might indicate a participation in the spirit and action of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

We heartily sympathise with this natural horror. Immediately after the peace we tried to think of some other name, by which we might be known as men of another spirit, and concluded that "Wesleyan Episcopal would designate the history and distinctive characteristic of our Church.

Full of this opinion, it was our fortune about that time to pass through regions which had always constituted a part of the territory of Northern Methodists. We then ascertained that the period of the war had invested any word that indicated difference from those Methodists with a new meaning. That whatever misfortune or feebleness might have once characterized the expletive "South," in the title of our Church, it had now come to have an unmistakeable force. It signified the opposite of a Church that during four years of sorrow had lent itself to purposes of ambition, under the guise of loyalty, and had substituted, in the house of God, a piece of bunting for the symbol of the Cross. The people yearned for a gospel purged of political element and fanatical fury.—They were therefore ready to rally around a Church, whose misfortunes, it may be, had preserved it from the taint of earthly ambition. The "Church-Extension" schemes of the Northern Methodists had already developed a quasi union of Church and State. The Secretary of War and Bishop Ames had lovingly "set themselves and taken counsel together" against our Zion. Whenever a pulpit could be found in the Church South worth having, and which, in the words of Special Order No. 15, was not "occupied by a loyal preacher, who had been appointed by a loyal Bishop," it was seized, declared vacant, exorcised, occupied, persistently held, and at length actually claimed, as rightful property, by the Bishop and his accommodating clergy. It is not necessary to say that this policy, kept up during the past two years, and still fiercely pursued, has called forth notice and sympathy for a Church, whose most considerable crime consists in having in its title the word "South," and in having persisted in preaching to the slave, even at the risk of Church isolation.

Every man, woman and child has, by this time, come to understand, that the "Methodist Episcopal Church South" is one by itself, with its own history of persecution, of poverty, and may we not add, of devotion and doctrinal purity.—And without some such history a Church can scarcely be a Church.—This history has gathered around its present title, and to change the title is to confuse, if not to dissipate the story of its privations and its toils.

But there yet remains the very serious objection that is urged against the limiting force of the word "SOUTH." One who belongs to the "South" cannot claim to be of a church universal; in China, in the North, in the East, in the West, he is equally "away from home."—He is not as one going "into all the world to preach the Gospel" His aim is indicated by his name.

As reasonable as this may seem, we venture to ask, what other name so proper for a Church as that of the spot of earth where, in the Providence of God, it has taken its rise, and with which it has been first identified? "The Church at Antioch," or "The Church at Jerusalem" did not suppose its field of operation to be confined necessarily to the city from which it first issued forth to the glorious conquest of the world. Nor was it reckoned to be any less a Church, or as violating its constitution, or its limits, when its messengers were found "away from home."

The Scriptures specially favor a local name. "The Church at Babylon elected saluteth you,"—"Cause this epistle to be read in the Church of Laodicea." The Saviour addresses the "Angel of the Church at Ephesus"—"The Church in Smyrna"—"The Church in Pergamos"—"The Church in Thyatira"—"The Church in Sardis"—"The Church in Philadelphia"—"The Church of the Laodiceans."—St. Paul speaks of "The Church of Galatia"—"The Churches of Asia salute you"—"The grace of God bestowed on the Churches of Macedonia." We do not now recollect that any other than a geographical name is given to the New Testament Churches.

Titles which indicate doctrine cannot be in place, for the reason that a Church of Christ, like its Head, should be so harmonious in its doctrines as to present no doctrinal peculiarity. Even the word "Protestant" fails to indicate an idea of the truth possessed; but rather of some error opposed. Names of men associated with the Bride of Christ, even such men as Luther, are suggestive of infirmities which dim the glory of her beauty. The names therefore of the "Church of Rome," "The Church of England," "The Church of Scotland," "The Greek Church," are eminently proper, and do in no sense confine the limits of their communion, or jurisdiction; for these churches are found in many parts of the world, and yet are recognized accurately and readily by their distinctive names.

The mere form of Church government, as the Presbyterial, the Episcopal, or the form of a single ordinance, as the Baptist, have afforded names; but a Church which in doctrine has nothing wanting, nothing in excess; which does not believe that a particular form of government is specially enjoined in the Scripturos; which is called to be a Church of God, as the Apostle was, "not of men, neither of man, but by Jesus Christ," may well be satisfied with a name indicating its home—a territorial name—the word "SOUTH"—which the Providence of God has also invested with significance in the ear and mind of Christendom.—One may, by searching, find the Mountains which gave a name to the Church of the Nestorians, or the Canton of Switzerland which nursed the Church of the Vandois; but what people have not already heard of that Southern land, the theatre of the most stupendous events in the History of Nations, and the home of our Church; a Church whose sanctuaries, by the hundred, have been consumed in the fires of war; whose Preachers have ministered to tens of thousands of the noblest Christians of earth in the camp, or in the hospital, or dying on the battle-field; a Church whose people have passed, in a single night, with cheerfulness, and with unbroken trust in God, from the heighth of affluence to the depth of poverty—"THE M. E. CHURCH SOUTH."

GENERAL CONFERENCE.

The subjoined article is from the "Selma Messenger." We have already "spoken" upon this proposed change.—Spoken fully in the N. O. Christian Advocate of Feb. 3d, and given the resolutions of our churches: "We strongly deprecate any change in the place for the ensuing session." The city is large, the markets are full, our people are as generous as most Methodists; not easily disturbed by cholera, yellow fever, small pox, or other diseases, when in the discharge of their duty; and not much troubled by the distant possibility of diseases and earthquakes, yet to arrive. We know of no place easier to get to, or from than New Orleans; by fresh water, by salt, by Rail Road, by Steamboat, by any ordinary locomotion, excepting ox-wagons, which we regard as the safest conveyance in the world. And we must insist that the principal danger in attending the General Conference to be held in this city, in April next, will be in getting to it—on the way—and we warn timid brethren that there have been many accidents to travelers of late. But almost any Life Insurance office at any Depot will guarantee the safe conduct of sober men from Dan to Beersheba, for one-half per cent, and insure the preacher, and all that he is worth in worldly goods, for a mere song.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE—CHANGE OF VENUE.

MESSRS. EDITORS: There is a rumor in our city to the effect that an effort is being made to change the place of holding the next General Conference of the Methodist Church from New Orleans to Louisville, Ky. It is urged, we understand, by those who favor the change that the cholera, which has traversed Asia and Europe, may, by April next, reach the United States, and begin its ravages in New Orleans. Now, when we remember that the cholera, if it comes to our shores, will be borne hither by the tide of foreign immigration; that that tide flows mainly to and through the North; that Louisville lies directly in its channel; that the session of '56 was scared from St. Louis by it; that the beloved and lamented Boring was one of its victims; when we remember these things, does it not, Messrs. Editors, seem a singular reason for the change proposed, that "the cholera may come to New Orleans?"

But it is farther urged in favor of the change that New Orleans has been broken in resources by the war, and cannot so well bear the burden of the session as Louisville. Poor little New Orleans! and mighty Louisville! The greatest city in the South must, then, look to semi-Southdom to aid them in entertaining two or three hundred representatives of the Methodist Church during the three or four weeks of a General Conference session! We have been accustomed to think that the disproportion lay in the opposite direction; that in a place so large as New Orleans the General Conference would not be sufficiently felt. Selma, we know, would entertain it joyfully. Has New Orleans grown so poor, so small? Is this her own, or others' complaint? Let us hear from the Crescent city. Has her silver horn so paled and shrunk that she has no longer resources to feed a few delegates while they transact the business of the Church? Let her speak for herself. Does she want the General Conference? Aye or no.

SOUTHERN EXPRESS COMPANY.—This Company has kindly offered to deliver our papers at any point, free of cost. We shall avail ourselves of this generous offer—specially to send where there is as yet no post-office. Persons who do not receive their papers by mail will please let us know promptly, and we will endeavor to find out the cause and have it remedied.

BALTIMORE ANNUAL CONFERENCE, M. E. CHURCH.

The great ecclesiastical event of this disturbed period is the formal adherence of this venerable body to the communion, jurisdiction and fortunes of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. This transpired on the 8th of February, in the city of Alexandria, Va.

On the day previous the Conference convened. It was called to order by Rev. J. S. Register, who called the Rev. Norval Wilson to preside. The Conference was formally opened by the singing of the 642d Hymn, and prayer by the President.

The Rev. Dr. Doggett, who was present as a fraternal messenger from the Virginia Conference, writes a letter to the Episcopal Methodist, which we here insert:

The body was in session when I arrived, the Rev. Norval Wilson in the chair. The session is held in the audience room of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Upwards of fifty members were present at the opening. After organizing, they were occupied with ascertaining their exact membership, and receiving the adherence of several ministers from Maryland to their platform. The business was conducted with great calmness and deliberation, and I was much pleased with the character and gravity of the men.

By resolution, a Committee of the Whole met at three o'clock in the afternoon, to define and settle their ecclesiastical relation. They did so with entire unanimity, and reported the result to the Conference yesterday. I was present and witnessed a scene which all felt to be irrepressibly solemn.

The Rev. Samuel Register presented the report of the committee, prefacing it with appropriate and impressive remarks. The vote was then taken by calling the roll, each member audibly responding in the affirmative, not one dissenting. By this action, which you will publish in this issue, this respectable and influential Conference, representing twelve thousand church members, finally dissolved their connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and took their stand with the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Their decision is taken and has gone to record.—The number voting was about sixty-five, amongst whom there are conspicuous names. The whole number is upwards of ninety.

After the passage of the report, Bishop Early, who had been invited to attend the Conference, and who was in the city, was formally requested to recognize them as a Conference of the Church South, and to preside over their deliberations. In a few minutes he made his appearance, escorted by the Rev. Messrs. Register and Roszell, and was received by the presiding officer, who, after announcing the action of the Conference, offered him the chair, which, after some brief remarks, the Bishop occupied. Your colleague was soon after requested to fulfill his mission to the Conference, but in the absence of his associate, the Rev. Nelson Head, he urged the propriety of deferring any communication for the time, in the hope of his arrival. The suggestion was accordingly accepted, but, I am very sorry to say, for some cause or other, brother Head has not yet arrived. I should deeply regret his failure to attend, and I am sure he will regret it more.

To-day Bishop Early entered upon the regular business of the Conference, which he is conducting with his usual dispatch.—The weather has been exceedingly inclement, and the attendance of spectators, as yet, has not been very large.—But the session is yet in its incipiency—its interest will increase, and many more will, as usual, witness its proceedings.—I will endeavor to keep you advised of the course of events, but for the accuracy of details you will depend upon the reports of the daily press, which I hereby transmit.

D. S. DOGGETT.

THE LADIES AID SOCIETY OF RICHMOND.

We had the pleasure of an interview with the Rev. Thos. A. Ware, who visits this city to solicit aid in behalf of the noble objects of the ladies who compose this Society, of Richmond.

The primary object of the Association was to provide for suffering Southern soldiers in hospital, not only in Richmond, but everywhere else in the land. Another object was, to furnish means to these soldiers when they were able to travel to pay their expenses to their homes.

At its origin it was supposed that the Society would long ago have accomplished its work; but there are still powerful demands for its efforts. There are many who are still sick, or in hospitals, who have never sufficiently recovered to travel; others who are maimed, and unable, by physical labor, to procure the means of living; and others poor, destitute, in feeble health, away from home and friends.

It is sad to think that such men should be in such straits.

The Society is endorsed by Gov. Pierpont, of Virginia, and others, of the highest character.

The officers of the Society are: Rev. G. Woodbridge, D.D., President; Rev. Jas. A. Duncan, 1st Vice President; Rev. C. K. Marshall, D. D., 2d Vice President; Rev W Christian, Treasurer; Rev. T. G. Dashiell, Corresponding Secretary; Robert E. Richardson, Esq., Rec. Secretary.

We recommend this noble charity to all our friends. It is, upon the part of Mr. Ware, purely a labor of love.

The people of New Orleans have heretofore never failed to respond heartily to such calls in the behalf of those who, by the events of the war, have been stripped of every thing but life and honor.

THE CHURCH IN THE VALLEY OF VIRGINIA.

The following we clip from a religious paper in this city:

We have seen a letter from Bishop Ames, which was dated Baltimore, Maryland, January 29, 1866, and which contains this glorious news: "The President has issued an order putting us in possession of 210 churches and 32 parsonages, which the rebel Methodists in Virginia have occupied during the war."

What, reader, do you think of that! It reminds us of the Apocalyptic "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and the sea." * * * Bishop Ames "is come down among you." However, his time has turned out to be shorter than he supposed, for we see by a letter from Washington, that the good man had "reckoned without his host." A Committee from the Virginia Annual Conference waited upon President Johnson.

THE INTERVIEW OF THE METHODIST (SOUTH) DELEGATION WITH THE PRESIDENT.

When the Committee of the Baltimore Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, appointed to wait upon President Johnson, returned to the Conference yesterday, sitting at Alexandria, they reported that they had a most interesting and pleasing interview with the President, who had entertained them kindly, to the exclusion of other more important business.—They said they had laid before him the case of the Church, and of this Conference, which had been taken possession of by the military, and had informed him that it was rumored that the churches had been seized in accordance with an order issued by him. The President replied that he was not aware of any such order. The Committee had promised the President a written statement of the facts in regard to the church property, and the position of the Conference.

At the conclusion of the report of the Committee, which was read by Mr. Wilson, Hon. John Hogan, Member of Congress from Missouri, who had accompanied the Committee in their visit to the White House, arose and substantiated the statements of Mr Wilson, and stated that in a conversation with the President, Mr. Johnson had unhesitatingly said that no such order as the one referred to had emanated from him. He referred to an order from the War Department, that had been issued relative to a church at Winchester, but that order was directed to Gen. Hancock, to investigate the facts and make a report; and the President thought it had been satisfactorily adjusted.

Mr. Hogan also mentioned the case of a church in Missouri, in which the President had directed an investigation to be made and the facts reported to him, in order that he might make a proper adjustment of it.

Mr. Hogan then stated that the policy of the President was to restore the rights of all loyal people, and to leave future questions to be settled by the courts, after the parties shall have been placed in the state they occupied prior to the past difficulties.

BIRTHDAYS—DON'T FORGET THEM.—Young reader, the editor wishes to whisper a word in your ear. Johnny, Mary, or whatever your name is, come near, just a minute. After reading the following short paragraph on birthdays, take it to father and mother and ask them to read it. If either has not time or inclination to do it, read it to them yourself in the sweeter manner possible. That's all; you may go now:

"Birthdays are great events to children. For one day they feel that they are heroes. The special pudding is made expressly for them; a new jacket or trowsers, with pockets, or the first pair of boots, are donned; and big brothers and sisters sink into insignificance beside 'little Charlie,' who is 'six today,' and is soon 'going to be a man.'

"Fathers who have half a dozen little ones to care for, are apt to neglect birthdays; they come too often; sometimes when they are busy, and sometimes when they are 'nervous;' but if they only knew how such souvenirs are cherished by their pet Susy, or Harry, years afterwards, when away from the hearthstone, they have none to remind them that they have added one more year to the, perhaps, weary round of life, or to wish them, in old-fashioned phrase, 'many happy returns of their birthday,' they would never permit any cause to step between them and a parent's privilege."

The Great Eastern had on board, on her trip to England, from attempting to lay the cable, the substance brought up from the ocean 2000 fathoms deep. When dry, it formed into a white substance, like chalk in appearance, but which crumbles at the touch, and leaves minute traces on the finger, something like down from the butterfly's wing.

MARRIED,

At Woodbine Cottage, near Sharon, Miss., the 7th inst., by Rev. W. H. C. Hunnicutt, Prof. WM. H. HARTWELL and Miss SALLIE J. WIGGINS, daughter of Rev. D. M. Wiggins, deceased, formerly of the Mississippi Conference.

OBITUARIES.

AN AGED LADY GONE.

Mrs. SARAH GEORGE died suddenly (supposed of disease of the heart) in Mobile county, Alabama, the 31st of January, 1866, in the 83d year of her age.

She was born in the State of South Carolina soon after the close of the Revolutionary war, her father (Reuben Turner) having been a soldier in the American army for years. Early in life she was married to Travis George; and in 1810 moved to Alabama, settled in Mobile county, where she remained until her death. She witnessed many changes during her long life in Alabama, at the time referred to above, was a vast wilderness, inhabited mostly by various savage tribes. As the community was but sparsely populated, and the forest teemed with wolves, bears and panthers, of course these early settlers suffered many inconveniences, and passed many lonely hours and days. Railroads and steamboats were then unknown in this part of the world; and the spot of ground on which the populous city of Mobile now stands was a mere canebrake and chinquapin groves, with the exception of a few rude dirt huts, covered with cypress bark. But the Methodist preacher had made his way out into these wilds. Our dear sister ceased not to hear the Gospel, embraced it, and as her Saviour, joined the church, and lived a faithful member of the same for more than forty-five years.

Death to her was very unexpected at the last; yet she was neither surprised nor alarmed. A few days before, she said to one of her children that she was ready to go home. And in her last moments she told a friend to tell her children that she was going home to heaven. How sweet it is for an aged saint to fall asleep in the arms of Jesus. She has left numerous friends and more than twenty children and grandchildren to mourn her loss. Many preachers, seeing this notice, will remember sister George of Bethel Church, on the Citronelle Circuit, and the many kind hospitalities which they, in the past and gone, received at her humble home.

Manvilla, Feb. 19, 1866. A. M.

MRS. RIDLEY J. WILLS died at her son-in-law's residence, Mr. Jordan Bailey's, Hinds county, Miss., on the 16th of December, 1865. Mrs. Wills was a native of Virginia, but for many years a resident of Tennessee. For more than forty years she was a member of the Methodist Church. The gentle virtues of her life shone out in her daily life with peculiar grace and consistency.

At the beginning of the war she went to live with us, to escape the horrors of the impending struggle. The Lord kept her, as in his pavilion, until the storm passed over. She then earnestly desired to return to her Tennessee home, at Brownsville. Her affectionate son, Dr. Wills, hastened to her help, and started home, had her to her son-in-law's, as stated, where, surrounded by her children and servants, she slept sweetly in Jesus, in her 78th year.

Loving hearts with weeping eyes laid a father's precious remains in that sweet little spot, to wait the great day. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Lexington, Miss., Feb. 19, 1866.

BY TELEGRAPH.

THE EXCITEMENT IN WASHINGTON.

IMMENSE GATHERING.

SPEECH BY PRESIDENT JOHNSON.

The People Unanimous in their Support.

GREAT ENTHUSIASM MANIFESTED.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23.—The mass meeting to endorse President Johnson, at Grover's Theatre, was densely packed, and the streets without, where the stands for speaking were erected, were awfully crowded. A long series of resolutions were adopted, expressing entire confidence in the policy of President Johnson and favoring the admission of the Southern representatives. Speeches were made by Cox, Blair, Hendricks, Green, Clay, Smith and others, all fully sustaining the President's veto. At the conclusion of the meeting, the people proceeded en masse to the White House, to present the resolutions to the President, who shortly made his appearance and addressed them, as follows:

Fellow-Citizens—For I presume I have the right to address you as such—To the Committee who have organized and conducted this meeting so far, I have to tender my sincere thanks for the confidence and approbation they have manifested in their personal address to myself, and in the resolutions they have adopted. I am free to say to you, this occasion, that it is extremely gratifying to me to know that a large portion of my fellow-citizens approve and endorse the policy that has been adopted, and is intended to restore the glorious Union of these States and their original relations to the Government of the United States. This seems to be the day peculiarly appropriate for such a manifestation—the day that gave birth to him who founded this Government—the father of this country, who stood at the head of this Government when all these States entered into this Union. This day, I say, is peculiarly appropriate to endorse the restoration of the Union of these States, founded by the father of his country—Washington.

Washington, whose name this city bears, embodied in the hearts of all who love the Government. Washington, in the name the eulogist, was first in peace, first in war and first in the hearts of his countrymen. No people can claim him, no country can appropriate him; his reputation and fame are the common inheritance of all who love free Government. I, to-day, had the honor of attending the National Washington Monument Association, which is exerting its efforts to complete the monument erected to his memory. I was glad to assist them, and, so far as I could, to give it my humble influence. A monument being erected to him within a stone's throw of the spot from which I address you. When it be completed, let the pledges which these State associations and corporations have placed in that monument of their faith and love for the Union be preserved. Let it be completed, and in this connection let me refer to the motto upon the stone sent by any one State, "God bless a State which has struggled for the preservation of the Union in the field and in the councils of a Nation."

The motto is inscribed on that stone: "I am led by that sentiment, and she is willing to stand by it." It was the sentiment enunciated by the immortal and real Jackson. "The Federal Union, it must be preserved." Mr. Johnson then referred briefly to the effect of the veto. Jackson in 1833, denounced as traitors those who attempted to destroy the country, and reiterated his determination to stand by the country and the Constitution. He thought, in considering the question of reconstruction, we should not deal with a whole people in a spirit of revenge. The South had acknowledged its allegiance to the Government, and he was willing to open the doors of the Union, and restore them to their former relations. He said: "There is none who has labored harder than I to have the principal conspicuous and intelligent traitors brought to justice, to the end that the law vindicated, and the great fact vindicated that treason is a crime; yet, while conscious and intelligent traitors are to be punished, should whole States, counties and the people be made to submit and bear the penalty of the oath; let them become loyal and willing supporters and defenders of our glorious stripes; let the leaders, the conscious and intelligent traitors suffer the penalty of the law, but let the great mass, who have been forced into the rebellion and, misled by their leaders, leniency, kindness, trust and confidence. The rebellion is put down by the strong arm of the Government, but we are ready to-day to put one rebellion before we are called to the midst of another rebellion.

There is an attempt being made to concentrate the power of the Government in the hands of a few, and thereby bring about a consolidation which is equally dangerous and objectionable with separation. Sometimes revolutions which are most disastrous to the people, are effected without shedding blood; the substance of our Government may be taken away, leaving only the formidable shadow. We find that, in fact, by an irresponsible central director, nearly all powers of the Government are assumed, without even consulting the Legislative or Executive Department of the Government, and the resolution reported by the committee upon whom all the legislative power of the Government has been conferred. The principles in the Constitution which authorize and empowers each branch of the Legislature Department to be the judge of the qualification and qualifications of its own members, has been virtually taken away from the departments and conferred upon a committee who must report before they can be heard under the Constitution and allow the members duly elected to take their seats, by a vote. They assume that there must be a law passed; that that there must be a recognition in respect to States in the Union, with all its prohibited relations restored, before the respective houses of Congress, under the Constitution, shall judge of the election and qualification of its own members. You have been struggling for four years to put down the rebellion; you decided, in the beginning, that nay State had the right to go out of the Union. It has been decided that a State has neither the right nor the power to go out of the Union, and when I have settled that by the executive and military power of the Government and by public judgment, you turn around and say that they are out and shall not come in. I am free to say to you, as your Executive, that I am not prepared to take any such position. I cannot turn around now and give a direct lie to all I profess to have done in the last five years.

I say that when these States comply with the Constitution, when they have given sufficient evidence of their loyalty, and that they can be trusted when they yield obedience to the law, I say extend to them the right hand of fellowship, and let peace and the Union be restored. I have fought traitors and treason in the South. I opposed the Davises, the Toombses and the Slidells and a long list of others, whose names I need not repeat, and now when I look around at the other end of the line I find many I cannot by name call them—(A voice—"call them traitors,") who still stand opposed to the restoration of the Union of these States, and I am free to say to you that I am still for the restoration of this Union. I am still in favor of this Government of ours living and following out its destiny. (A voice, "Give us the names.") A gentleman calls for their names. Well, suppose I should give them. (A voice "We know them.") I took upon them, and repeat it, President or citizen, as much as I opposed to the fundamental principles of this Government, and believe they are as much laboring to prevent or destroy it, as the men who fought against us. (A voice—"What are their names?") I name Thad. Stevens, of Pennsylvania—(Tremendous applause)—I say Charles Sumner—(Great applause)—I say Wendell Phillips, and others of the same stripe amongst them. (A voice—"Give it to Forney.") Some gentleman in the crowd says "Give it to Forney." I have only to say that I do not waste my ammunition upon dead ducks. (Laughter and applause.) I stood for my country, I stand for the Constitution, wherein I placed my foot from my entrance into public life. They may traduce me, they may slander, they may vituperate, but let me say to you that it has no effect upon me. (Cheers.) Let me say in addition, that I do not intend to be bullied by enemies. (Applause, and cry "The people will support you.") I know my countrymen that it has been insinuated—not only insinuated but said directly, the intimation has been given in high places—that if such a usurpation of power had been exercised two hundred years ago in a particular region, it would have cost a certain individual his head. What usurpation has Andrew Johnson been guilty of? (Cries of "None, none.") The only usurpation I have been guilty of was between the people and an encroachment of power, and because I dared to say in conversation with a fellow-citizen and a Senator that I thought amendments to the Constitution ought not to be too frequently made, that it would lose all its dignity and that the old instrument would be lost sight of in a short time, because I happened to say if it was amended such and such amendments should be adopted, it was a usurpation of power that would have cost a king his head at a certain time. (Laughter and applause.) In connection with this subject, it was maintained by the same gentleman that we were in the midst of an earthquake, he trembled and could not yield. (Laughter.) Yes, there is an earthquake coming, there is a ground swell coming of popular judgment and indignation. (A voice—"That's true.") The American people will speak by their interests and they will know who are their friends and who their enemies. What position have I held under this Government, beginning with an Alderman, and running through all the branches of the Legislature. (A voice, "From a tailor up.") Some gentleman says I have been a tailor. (Tremendous applause.) Now, that did not discomfit me in the least; for when I used to be a tailor, I had the reputation of making close fits, (Great applause,) always punctual with my customers, and always did good work. (A voice, "No patch-work.") No, I do not want any patch-work; I want a whole suit. But I will pass by this little facetiousness. My friends, some may say, you are President, and you must not talk about such things when principles are involved. My countrymen, when the existence of my country is imperilled, I will act as I have on former occasions, and speak what I think. I was saying that I had held nearly all positions, from Alderman, through both branches of Congress, to that which I now occupy, and who is there that will say that Andrew Johnson ever made a pledge that he did not redeem or made a promise he did not fulfill; who will say that he has ever acted otherwise than in fidelity to the great mass of the people. They may talk about beheading and usurpation; but, when I am beheaded, I want the American people to witness it. I don't want, by innuendoes, by indirect remarks in high places, to see the man who has assassination brooding in his bosom, exclaim this Presidential obstacle must be gotten out of the way. I make use of a very strong expression when I say that I have no doubt the intention was to incite assassination, and to get out of the way the obstacles from place and power, whether by assassination or not. There are individuals in this Government, I doubt not, who want to destroy our institutions, change the character of the Government. Are they not satisfied with the blood which has been shed? Does not the murder of Mr. Lincoln appear the vengeance and wrath of the opponents of this Government? Do they still want more blood? Have they not honor and courage enough to obtain their objects otherwise than by the hands of the assassin? No, I am not afraid of assassins attacking me where a brave and courageous man would attack another. I only dread him when he would go in disguise, his footsteps noiseless. If it is blood they want let them have courage enough to strike like men. I know they are willing to warn, but they are afraid to strike. (Applause.) If my blood is to be shed because I vindicate the Union and the preservation of this Government in its original purity and chastity, let it be shed. Let an altar to the Union be erected, and then if it is necessary to take me, lay me upon it and the blood that now warms and animates my existence shall be poured out as a libation of the Union of the States; (Great applause) but let the opponents of this Government remember that when it poured out the blood of the martyrs of the seed of the church. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, this Union will grow, it will continue to increase in strength and power, though it may be cemented and cleansed with blood. I have talked longer now than I intended. Let me thank you for the honor you have done me. So far as this Government is concerned, let me say one other word in reference to the amendment of the Constitution of the United States. When I reached Washington for the purpose of being inaugurated as Vice-President of the United States, I had a conversation with Mr. Lincoln; we were talking about the condition of affairs and in reference to matters in my own State. I said they had called a Convention and had amended our Constitution by abolishing slavery in the State, a State not embraced in his proclamation. All this met his approbation and gave him encouragement, and in talking upon the amendment to the Constitution, he said when the amendment to the Constitution is adopted by three-fourths of the States we shall have all, or pretty nearly all. "I am in favor of amending the Constitution, if there was another adopted." Said he, "What is that, Mr. President?" Said he, "I have labored for this Union; I have toiled four years; I have been subjected to calumny and misrepresentation; yet my desire has been to preserve the Union of the States intact, under the Constitution, as they were before." "But" said I, Mr. President, what amendment do you prefer?" He said he thought there should be an amendment added to the Constitution, which would compel all the States to send their Senators and Representatives to the Congress of the United States. Yet, to compel them? The idea was, in his mind, that it was a part of the doctrine of secession to break up the Government by the States withdrawing their Senators and Representatives from Congress, and therefore he desired a Constitutional amendment to compel them to be sent.

How now does the matter stand in the Constitution of the country? Even that portion of it which provides for an amendment of the organic law says that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its representation in Congress. Now what do we find? The position taken that the States shall not be represented; that we may impose taxes; that we send our tax-gatherers to every region and portion of a State; that the people are to be oppressed with taxes. But when they come here to participate in the legislation of the country, they are met at the door and told: "You must pay your taxes—must bear the burden of the Government—but you must not participate in the councils which are to affect you for all time." Is this just? No, no. Then, I say, let us admit into the councils of the Nation those who are unmistakably and unequivocally loyal—those men who acknowledge their allegiance to the Government and swear to support the Constitution. It is all embraced in that. The amplification of an oath makes no difference if a man is not loyal, but you may adopt whatever test oath you please to prove their loyalty. When the rebellion was going on the Constitution was rolled up as a piece of parchment. If it was violated in some particulars to save the Government, there may have been some excuse to justify it; but now that peace has come and the war is over, we want a written Constitution. I say the time has come to take the Constitution down, unroll and read it, and understand its provisions. I come here to vindicate the Constitution and to save it, for it does seem to me that encroachment upon encroachment is proposed. I stand to-day prepared as for as I can to resist these encroachments upon the Constitution and Government. I tell the opponents of this Government I care not from what quarter they come, you who are engaged in the work of breaking up the Government by amendments to the Constitution, that the principles of free government are deeply rooted in the American heart. All the powers combined, I care not of what character, cannot destroy that great instrument—the charter of freedom. They may seem to succeed for a time, but their efforts will be futile. They may think now that it can be done by a concurrent resolution, but when it is submitted to the popular judgment and popular will, they will find that they might as well have undertaken to introduce a resolution to repeal the laws of gravity as to keep this Union from being restored. It is just absent as feasible to resist the law of gravitation, which binds all to a common centre, as that great law which will bring back these States to their relations with the Union. I have detained you longer than I intended. (A voice—"Go on.")

We are in a great struggle. I am your instrument. Who is there that I have not toiled and labored for? Where is the man or woman, either in public or private life, who has not always received my attention according to my opportunities? They say, That man, Johnson, is a lucky man, but no man can defeat him. I will tell you what constitutes good luck: it is due to right and being for the people; that is what constitutes good luck. Some hour or other, the people will find out and understand who is for and who is against them. I have been placed in as many trying positions as any mortal was ever placed in; but so far I have not deserted the people, and I believe they will not desert me. What principle have I violated? What sentiment have I swerved from? Can they put their finger on it? Have you heard them point out my discrepancy? Have you heard them quote my predecessor, who fell a martyr to his country's cause, as going in opposition or in contradiction to anything that I have done? The very policy that I am pursuing now was pursued under his administration, and was being pursued by him, when that inscrutable Providence saw fit to summon him, I trust, to a better world than this above. Is there one principle adopted by him in reference to this resolution that I have departed from? None. None. The war is not simply upon me, but upon my predecessor. I have tried to do my duty. I know that some are envious and jealous, and speak of the White House as having attractions for the President. Let me say to you the charm of the White House has as little influence upon me as any individual in the country, and much less upon me than upon those who are talking about the difference between the little that suffices for my stomach and back. More than enough has not charms for me. The proud and conscious satisfaction of having performed my duty to my country, to my children, to the inner man, is all the reward I ask. (Great applause.) In conclusion I invite this vast concourse here to-day, this sea of up-turned faces, to come with me, or I will go with you, and stand around the Constitution of our country again unpolluted. The people are invited to read and understand, sustain and maintain its provisions. Let us stand by the Constitution of our fathers though the heavens may fall. Though factions should rage, though taunts and jeers may come, though abuse and vituperation may be poured out in the most violent form, I mean to be found standing by the Constitution as the chief ark of our safety as a people and the palladium of our civil and our religious liberty. Yes, let us cling to it as the mariner clings to the last plank when the night and the tempest closes around him. Let us go away forgetting the past and looking to the future, resolved to endeavor to restore our Government to its pristine purity, trusting to Him who is on high, but who controls all here below, that ere long our Union will be restored, and that we shall have peace not only with all the Nations of the earth, but peace and good will among all parts of the people of the United States. When your country is gone, and you are about that place, look out, and you will find that humble individual who now stands before you weeping over its final dissolution.

CANADA.

From the New York World.

The return of the Provincial delegates to their homes without any solution of the commercial difficulties between the Governments they represent and the United States is another instance of the unfriendly sentiments held by the party in power toward all men who are of their own color, but are out of their own immediate ring or clique. The affair has been argued by the majority of Congress, not only by the light of false doctrines, but with gross and obstinate misstatements of alleged facts. And lest there should be any doubts as to the real cause of the final disagreement, the Committee of Ways and Means, of which Mr. Morrill is chairman, was either sufficiently frank, or so indifferent to the proper motives of legislation, or so ignorant of them, as to inform the delegates that it would be impossible to make any commercial arrangement whatever with the Provinces "in the present temper of Congress."

Thus again we are drifting into a series of contentions—very different, indeed, from those with the South, which inflicted so many irreparable calamities on us and our antagonists, but yet of variance and disunion—whereas, with proper and statesmanlike wisdom and foresight on both sides, the same mutually beneficial results, at which we may arrive after much commercial loss and injury, might have been attained at the beginning. Whatever may have been the conduct of the Provincials, the pivot on which the case avowedly turns on our side is "the present temper of Congress," in one of those commercial affairs where the utmost coolness and dispassionate examination, reflection and treatment are pre-eminently necessary.

Obstacles are placed in the ordinary channels of our trade with the provinces at a time when they are unusually prosperous. The banks of Canada hold, we are informed, at present, the unusual surplus of $20,000,000 enormously in excess of their ordinary deposits. The crops of the provinces were never better; a steady spirit of economy already pervades the people; some of their manufactures have, for the first time, found a market in the United States, paying our present duties, but stimulated by the comparatively low prices of their production. Thus they approach the crisis of the change, well prepared for it, and full of indignation at the course which has been pursued toward them, while our debt and taxation weigh heavily upon our shoulders in the struggle.

On the other hand, they are bound to us by the strongest ties of geographical position. Anticipating the termination of the treaty, they seek, as their best substitute or alternative, to form commercial treaties with Cuba and other West India Islands, and with Mexico and Brazil. They could not prove more clearly the natural relations of their country and our own for the best way to all the Southern regions with which they desire to form commercial alliances is through the United States, from the best, most populous and most rapidly increasing portions of the Provinces. It is always to be borne in mind that the distance from Toronto to Cuba is three times as far via the St. Lawrence as through the United States, to say nothing of the superior speed, safety and reliability, at all seasons, of the route through our territory.

The transit business, which can only in part be transacted under a bonded system, with its necessary incumbrances and stoppages, would, of course, be a source of profit to us as well as to our neighbors. Similar principles in various ways apply, also, to all our transactions of bargain and sale, supply and demand, with them; and if our mutual relations are interrupted, and trade is forced through unnatural and expensive and wasteful channels, to our mutual loss and injury, it is satisfactory to know that, after increased experience on both sides, those whose interests are injured by exclusiveness, or would be promoted by removing the obstacles between the people of both countries, will be heard, and a better system than the present will be established in a different temper and on a firmer basis. In the meantime, the people on both sides will appreciate unerringly and plainly the folly and treachery of those who alienate them from each other, and on either side endeavor to make them believe that their legitimate interests are antagonistic.

SOUTHERN LOYALTY.—A correspondent of the New York News sends the following extract from a letter written to him by a relative in Texas:

There is no more need of a standing army in the South than there is in New York city. Nobody, not even the wildest secessionists, ever thinks of offering the least resistance to the authority of the United States Government. They accept the situation, and will do all in their power to bring matters back as they were before the war. This is the truth, so far as my observation goes, (and it has been rather extensive,) anything you may see in the papers to the contrary notwithstanding.

THE MEXICAN QUESTION—A FEELING OF HOSTILITY TO THE UNITED STATES

From the New York Herald we copy the following letter:

PARIS, Jan. 30, 1866.—There is evidently a considerable feeling of soreness growing up here toward the Government and people of the United States. There has arisen from the publication of the correspondence between Mr. Seward, Mons. Druyn de L'Huys and Mr. Bigelow, relative to Mexican affairs, and from the pressure brought, or attempted to be brought, by the opposition press here upon the Government, with the object of hurrying up its movements in Mexico, The despatches of Mr. Seward, plainly and positively affirming the utter impossibility of a recognition by the United States of the Mexican Empire and Maximilian, astonished people here by the firmness of their tone, and the Government press has evidently received the mot d'ordre to treat them as of a character menacing to France.

In fact, this feeling seems to be growing now that your Government has brought too hard a pressure upon this; and the Government press, by a series of articles, evidently written with a very sore feeling, seem disposed to make it appear that France is being menaced by the United States. Once let this feeling become prevalent, and the same people who have been the most opposed to the Mexican blunder from the beginning, will, for the "gloire de la France," join hands with the Government to save it from any anticipated "humiliation."

The Patrie followed up the article in the Constitutionnel which I forwarded you by the last mail, with one of a similar character, facetiously closing, as did that one, with a regret that the United States Government, not having entered into relations with Maximilian, could not apply to him for relief, and could not, of course, apply to Juarez, but denying all responsibility on the part of France.

La France, in its yesterday's issue, published the following in reply to an article in the Siecle:

"We applauded the declaration in the discourse from the throne, announcing the approaching end of our expedition and the return of our troops, and certainly it is not we who endeavor to excite passions in such a manner as to render an honorable solution impossible.

"Those are bad citizens who would place their country, when that country is called France, between humiliation and cowardice.

"Those are bad citizens who, when the flag of France was floating in the field of battle, openly expressed their sympathies for the enemies we were fighting.

"Those are bad citizens who, for more than a year have excited against us, by provocations more or less disguised, the evil passions which are fomented by the partisans of Juarez in the United States.

"We desire that France shall come out of Mexico, but that she shall come out as befits a grand people, in obedience to the injunctions of the laws of no one, and having secured all the interests, moral and material, which called her to those distant shores, as grand and as respected in leaving as she was on her arrival."

On Saturday last rumors of a decidedly alarming character were in circulation, and it was stated that the French Government had determined to reply to the recent despatches of Mr. Seward—and it was averred that this response would be of a character even more than firm, giving our Government to understand that France had only its dignity and interest to consult in its foreign relations, without paying attention to any other consideration."

The publication of the correspondence relative to Mexico, containing a communication of M. Droyn de L'Huys, as late as the 25th of January, fully refute these rumors, as there is nothing in it of a belligerent character. Indeed, the Constitutionnel, of this morning, in an article on the correspondence, takes a very couleur de rose view of the relations which exist between this Government and yours. It is probable that the tactics of the Government and the Government journals have had for their object the excitement of a National feeling which will tend to calm the growing impatience relative to the continued occupation of Mexico.

THE EDUCATION OF WOMEN.—What a change in the education of women now and a hundred years ago. Many, many years ago, a lady's education consisted in learning to read and write, with some of the common higher branches, and she was considered very imperfect without a theoretical and practical knowledge of domestic economy. But at the present day females are taught to act the lady; sent off to fashionable schools, are learned the art of appearing graceful in company; to sit in the parlor and nurse their lilly-white hands, while they converse on the French, music and Latin they have learned; and among all, though not least, is to talk about the "killing" curls (be they auborn or raven) of their sweet-hearts, and (to use a Boise City phrase) "bile soap" while their mothers are drudging their lives away in the kitchen. But alas! how sad the change, when they have houses of their own to take care of; for then they have to play tunes on the pots and kettles and dance a polka with the broom, and in a short time the gay young lady degenerates into a morose old woman, sitting in the chimney corner smoking a pipe or smoothing her apron—the piano closed, and Latin and French neglected.

Now, young lady, come along with me and we will learn to sing a song with the tea-kettle and play tunes on the bars of the gridiron, or spell and define the merits of a loaf of bread; for, alas! woman is looked upon as a wonderful machine—capable of doing ten thousand things in ten minutes, and sometimes in half that time.

Young ladies! be up and doing, and let the "lords of creation" know that woman, no matter what is expected of her, will do—

JUST AS SHE PLEASES!

"When she will, she will, you may depend on't.
And when she won't, she won't, so there's the end on't."

ANOTHER SUEZ CANAL.—The announcement which has created the greatest sensation in Paris, is that of the rival canal through the Isthmus of Suez, which is destined to compete with that begun by M. de Lesseps. A Paris letter says:

This new canal, more important in its results than ever that of the Isthmus of Panama, is to be executed by a company under the patronage of the Pasha of Egypt. The ancient canal dug by King Pharoah is to be followed. The canal extends from the Nile to the Red Sea. M. de Lesseps, to whom the same idea was suggested in the origin affected to treat it with derision; and as it may be disencumbered of sand and rendered fit for navigation with but small expense, it was supposed that M. de Lesseps was fearful that the works by which he lives would be too soon over, and leave less profit to the speculator, and too much time for its enjoyment.

French speculators—all of the Orleans party—are said to have greedily seized upon the affair, but the seal of the company will be in London. Thus far mystery is observed with regard to the exceptional conditions to be observed in the issue of the shares; but it is whispered that the enterprise will be launched forth under the highest patronage in the whole world. Lesseps is, of course, taken by surprise, and bitterly reproaches the French Government with neglect, and the English Government with perfidy—the one for having neglected to give pecuniary assistance, the other for having refused it altogether. Few particulars have been allowed to transpire as yet, but yet it is thought that the project is already ripe enough for issuing in less than a month.

HOW TO PREVENT REVOLUTIONS.—The Vienna correspondent of the London Times says that the celebrated Professor Welcker, one of the editors of the far-famed Conversations Lexicon, has offered a reward of a thousand florins for "the best essay on the means, without having recourse to revolutionary measures, of getting rid of governments which systematically violate the constitutional rights of the people."

The Radical party in this country has hit upon the expedient of making everything constitutional that it wishes to do, by means of constitutional amendment. A violation of the Constitution, paradoxically enough, is not a violation of the Constitution. The most learned men in Europe may compete for the offered prize, but they will write in vain, unless they show how to put down Radical parties like that in this country, or recommend that there shall be no such instrument as a Constitution to be violated.

CAUSES OF THE INDIAN MUTINY.

Major Macpherson's view of the causes which produced the rebellion is, in our judgment, the very best we have seen, and we extract such part of it as we can find room for. Writing from Agra, in January, 1858, the place being at the time besieged, he thus expresses his opinion:

"Nobody here has an idea of the state of feeling in the country, I fear. In relation to this convulsion I have gazed most intensely at the phenomenon in Gwallor, and tried to record them. The difficulty passes belief. * * * * * *

"I don't know what people will say to my view * * * that the primary cause of the revolt was the deep dissatisfaction of the army with our rule, our Government, and our manners, shared with the whole population of Hindostan. I can get at nothing but this, I grieve to say, for a primary cause. The army was fully predisposed by this cause to revolt. It made the cartridge grievance a pretext to rise; and the foremost malcontents, princes, etc., seized the opportunity to stimulate and head the rebellion. The soldiery had a true religious panic from a true grievance; but had they not been ripe for revolt, they had not revolted about the cartridge, but had sought and found satisfactory explanations and assurances. But they would have no explanations, and made the cartridge the pretext for revolt. The Mahomedans, who struck for both religious and secular supremacy, desired both our overthrow and our extinction. The Hindus, who happily did not make a religious contest of it, desired the overthrow of our rule, but protected life. Had the Hindus made a matter of religion of it, no one had remained to report. But Benares, Gya, etc., gave no sign. The great point was, that we had given neither by legislation, nor by missionaryism, nor in any other way, religious offence which could serve the turn of the revolutionists. But people in England had better not think that they can play at proselytism in India at the cost of any army that they ever put on board a fleet. The army revolted in the belief that, from the paucity of our European troops, from the army's having possession of our magazines, and from the aid of chiefs and people, they must triumph. They miscalculated (1) the point of the Sikhs, who saved Delhi; (2) the Chinese expedition, which gave Havelock a force to smash the Nana; (3) Scindia and the other princes, who had their 'doots,' and would stand by us till they saw further. Had Scindia gone, not a rupee would have stood for a day."—Review of "Memorials of Service in India."

PROTECTION AND THE WEST.—In its financial article the Chicago Times says:

We have frequently pointed out the cause of the depression in trade, and again urge our business men to consider the facts we have presented. It is not a stagnation simply local in its character, induced by local causes, or springing from any hostility to Chicago, or to the want of proper facilities and advantages for the transaction of business. It is something broader and more serious than this. It is caused by the general depression of Western interests, by the low prices of produce and the high prices of everything our people are compelled to buy. Agriculture is paralyzed, and in obedience to the great laws of nature, all other interests sympathize with it. The sole cause of this depression is the "protection" given to the few manufacturers of the Eastern States, by the robbery of American industry. The Western people are too poor to endure the tariff, which is draining their pockets of everything; and, if our business men have any desire to remedy the existing evils as soon as possible, they will join in a unanimous protest against its continuance. If this tariff were broken down, the prices of merchandise would fall, the cost of production be diminished, and the present exorbitant rates of transportation would be reduced, and business regain its wonted activity and prosperity. Until this is done, business will languish, and each succeeding month witness the distress, stagnation and gloom intensified.

MAXIMILIAN AND HIS SUBJECTS.—Maximilian, not satisfied with $5000 a day, which he had appointed himself as salary, has now raised the sum to $7000 per day, as he declares he cannot live on less. The balls at the palace are magnificent affairs; the luxury of the toilets are beyond the limits of description of a republican pen. People may groan, but the Court dances and amuses itself. A correspondent writes from Mexico: "The most stringent misery is visible everywhere; the greatest economy is practiced by those deemed wealthy; four per cent. a month is asked and obtained; there is no trade, no improvement, except in the Imperial residences of Chapultepec and the National residence. The city, it is true, has increased, but this is the natural result of the distrust of the inhabitants of the country, who seek the protection of a large city."—Louisville Journal, 17*th inst.*

THE FAMINE NIGHT.—We can well recall the night of ruin which ushered in the famine. It was a warm summer's evening, soft and pleasant, and nothing in the atmosphere foretold to a common observer that anything unusual was impending. It happened to us to drive through some of the large fields of potatoes which at that time occupied so vast a part of the ample land of Ireland, and through the open windows of the carriage came the sweet smell of the potato blossom—the fields were in full flower. "What a fine field!" How sweet the blossom is!" we remarked. A few hours later, after dinner at a neighbor's house, we returned by the same fields. It was dark, but the smell of the field came again into the carriage. But how changed from what it was a few hours before! "What a horrible sort of air came off those fields—there must be something very bad in the atmosphere—some kind of blight to-night," we said as we went home. Next morning every crop in the country was black and blasted. The blight did not come as in later seasons, partially and slowly, but at once and entirely. The whole food of well-nigh six millions of people was destroyed on that one night.—Fraser's Magazine.

THE "IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT."—Says the Macon (Ga.) Journal and Messenger:

We see some of the Northern ministers, according to Cheever, have announced to their congregations that a more fearful sectional conflict with the South than ever, is impending, and they must arm for the fight. Cannot these amiable gentlemen comprehend that it takes at least two parties to make a fight, and the South has already surrendered, leaving the rest of the country, to insult her as much as they please after she is down? Take your satisfaction now, ye kind hearted souls, for the South is defenceless. She will fight us no more. For thirty-seven years she fought you with arguments, remonstrances and entreaty, but you would not hear them. She took to cudgels, and you were too many for her. Then she gives up and proposes that you shall do exactly as you please—only let your pleasure be known. But this don't suit. You must have more fight, more conflict. Why then, frankly, we tell you, you cannot get it out of us. You must try somebody else. There's Mexico—there's France—there's England—fight them. If they won't respond, fight each other; but we are too poor and feeble to give you any more entertainment in this way. You must look somewhere else."

SHOWING UP BATTLE FIELDS.—The Richmond Dispatch tells the following story:

"A Confederate General recently met an Irishman who had served gallantly under him in the war. He was seated on the box of a hack, wielding the whip over a pair of horses that had been overfed. Halting him, and interchanging expressions expressive of mutual satisfaction at a meeting, the General inquired: "And how are you getting along, Pat?"

"Finely, General," said he. "I took to this business immediately after the evacuation, and I have made twenty dollars a day by visiting the battlefields. You know, General, that I know nothing about them, yet I take the travelers to them and talk as if I know'd everything. I took a party of Bostonians the other day to the Sivin Pines, and showed them the hottest part of the fight. I saw a pile of bones in the midst of it, which belonged to some animal or other, and pointing to them, said: 'There lay the bones of the vilest Rebel General that fell in the fight.' Don't you think, General, if they did not believe it, and each of them put a piece of the bones in his carpet-bag to take home wid him."

LADIES THE BEST COMPANY.—Thackeray says that it is better for you to pass an evening once or twice in a lady's drawing room, even though the conversation is slow, and you know the girl's song by heart, than in a club, tavern or pit of a theatre. All amusements of youth to which virtuous women are not admitted, rely on it, are deleterious in their nature. All men who avoid female society have dull perceptions and are stupid, or have gross tastes and revolt against what is pure. Your cloth swaggerers who are sucking the butts of billiard cues all night, call female society insipid. Poetry is insipid to a yokel; beauty has no charms for a blind man; music does not please the poor beast who does not know one tune from another; and as a true epicure is hardly ever tired of water, sauce and brown bread and butter, I protest I can sit for a whole night talking to a well-regulated, kindly woman, absent her girl rowing out, of her boy at Eton, and like the evening's entertainment. One of the great benefits a man may derive from women's society is, that he is bound to be respectful to them. The habit is of great good to your moral men, depend upon it. Our education makes of us the most eminently selfish men in the world. We fight for ourselves, we yawn for ourselves, we light our pipes and say we will not go out; we prefer ourselves, and our ease and the greatest good that comes to a man is from women's society, is that he has to think of somebody to whom he is bound to be constantly attentive and respectful.

REMARKABLE INCIDENT.—A few days ago, as the train on the Platte county road was nearing Atchinson, Mo., it ran over a flock of sheep. The train proceeded and nothing more was thought of the occurrence. After the locomotive was run into the engine house, however, St. Joseph, the engineer was not a little surprised to find a lamb safely ensconced in the cubby-house just below the cow catcher. By some means, the little creature had been thrown upward into the box-like opening, where it was found, and the velocity of the engine had so paralyzed it, probably, that it made no attempt to escape; surely its quietness could hardly have resulted from reason. The engineers kept it as a pet at the round-house.—Mississippi Herald, 17*th inst.*

THE EMPIRE IN MEXICO.—A private letter from an intelligent American gentleman at Cordova, dated 27th ult., speaking of the permanency of the Empire, says: "As to the perpetuity of the Imperial Government, I can say with certainty that there is not vitality enough in the Republican party here to overthrow it, or give serious trouble. Unless the United States undertake to enforce the Monroe doctrine, the Empire is permanent. * * I feel no apprehension about the stability of the Government, and am satisfied that this soil and climate reward labor more liberally than any I have ever seen. Nature has done more and man less for this country, than any other on earth."—Memphis Bulletin, 22*d inst.*

A HEROIC HUNTER.—Lord St. Maur, second son of the Duke of Somerset, lately died in India, in consequence of a fight with a bear while hunting. He suddenly came across the animal, at which he fired his pistol, lodging the contents in the breast of the beast. It then attacked him, when drawing a sheathed stalking knife, his lordship thrust it into the bear, inflicting a mortal wound. In the scuffle, however, they had both approached a precipice, over which they together fell. Here the beaters came up and relieved Lord St. Maur from his adversary. His presence of mind did not forsake him, and he wrote with a pencil on the sheath of his knife (having no other appliances) to his fellow-sportsmen, informing them of his condition. They having arrived, a great difficulty was experienced as to removing him from the ravine into which he had fallen. Amputation of a leg was resolved upon, to which the sufferer submitted heroically. He soon, however, began to sink, from the combined effects of the operation and the shock his system had sustained, and died.

TURK AND CHRISTIAN.—The Pacha of Egypt has presented the American mission at Grand Cairo with a block of houses worth two hundred thousand francs—a liberal gift, seeing that a franc goes as far in Egypt as a dollar in the United States. He has also given the missionaries free passes by the railways, and has exempted religious journals and books from all taxation. On the other hand, in Spain, any person accused of the terrible crime of presenting a Bible to any other person, or even of reading portions to him or her, is at once committed to prison, and may be considered fortunate if, he is released after six months' imprisonment, and then only with an imperative command to quit the country at once and forever. The Egyptian, who has behaved so well to the American missionaries, is a layman who believes that "there is but one God, and Mahomet is His Prophet." The Spaniards, who have people imprisoned and banished for circulating and even for reading the Word of God, are Christian clergymen. The moral here from would seem to be that there is clerical intolerance and persecution all the world over.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON AND GEN. O. O. HOWARD.

These two names are well-known. Gee embodies the realization of true greatness and will be held in admiration as long as the American Republic shall exist, as that of the survivor of the country of which Washington was the founder.

But as the parasite plant grows and entwines itself around the giant limbs of the majestic oak, the name of the second will likewise reach certain notoriety, not over enviable, and thus attach itself to the first, until the are of time shall have lopped off from the main trunk all the excrescences forced out of it by damp and heat. We should have added that Gen. Heward, before becoming the head of the famous Freedmen's Bureau, was for some time in command of a corps, which, in the Federal army, became known after the battle of Chancellorsville, as the "Flying Dutchmen."

But whatever military glory he may then and there have acquired, cannot justify the present attitude he has assumed in regard to the President's policy.

It is, therefore, with unmixed feelings of surprise and indignation, that he is found, on the same day almost when the President has vindicated the Constitutional rights of the country at large, and when from every portion of the great American family a concert of praises is sung in his honor, to throw out a proclamation to his subordinates which breathes the most vindictive feelings against the policy of the Chief Magistrate of the country.

His circular of the 24th instant is an insult to the President, and a challenge to his power. He controverts every position taken by that supreme head of our Government, and seems intent only on creating new causes of dissatisfaction and sowing new seeds of distrust in the minds of the people.

He charges, and the charge is unfounded, that the Bureau is to prepare to repel with renewed energy and vigilance the "increased hostility of those who have so persistingly hindered and troubled them and their agents, and he farther hints, so as to call it forth, to increased restlessness amongst the freedmen."

Now, this is a slander on the whites as well as one on the blacks, with a further bid to the latter to renew an agitation now about to subside.

The people of the South have not said of the Freedmen's Bureau half as much as the honored President of the Republic has given forth to the world.

The people of the South, submissive to the supremacy of those laws just vindicated by the National arms, have only and justly complained of the abuses and excesses which this extraneous accretion to our judiciary has committed or is liable to commit.

Whenever and wherever even the simple though arbitrary system of adjudication of the Freedmen's Bureau has not allowed itself to degenerate into open tyranny, the people have cheerfully submitted.

Our own city has been a fit illustration of this opinion, and although the very paper has never feared to battle up for right and justice, regardless of consequences, there has not been in its columns, for the last three months, a word said in disparagement of the institution, because summary and arbitrary as its decisions may have been, it is but an act of justice to say they have not, in any instance, been of a brutal or passionate character.

A people which has been raised with the instinctive respect of the solemn forms of law, cannot certainly admire, or pray for the perpetuation of a system of proceedings, where the first citation or summons is brought by a squad of armed men in the shape of an order of arrest, for this is not the law to which a free nation had been accustomed; but, barring this, there has been as good a spirit pervading its decisions as the circumstances of the times permitted.

The assertion of General Howard that the President has assured him the Bureau would be continued during at least one year more, is, we are satisfied, an untruth, as, in the absence of any new enactment, the Bureau is functus officio long before that time, and that when the President, in his justice, will see fit to remove the troops, the Bureau will follow.

Men of very inferior mind, blinded by prejudices and passions, and suddenly floated up by political events to certain elevations, become giddy and lose the control of what little mind nature sparingly involved them with. Of this class must be General Howard, and we predict that, one year hence, he and his machinery will have ceased to run.

The spreading of such trash is unworthy a great nation, and we feel satisfied that it will find no response even amongst those to whom it is addressed.

We have practiced reconciliation so far as to have found amongst the officers connected here with the Bureau, men of heart and intellect, who, while strictly obeying their orders, are anxious for the day when they will be relieved from a duty which places them in apparent antagonism with those whom it is their desire to befriend, and not to tyrannize.

Gen. Howard will not be long to be struck down by the same thunderbolt, which has already levelled so many notorious officials, and having no laurels to shade his brow, the bolt will forever annihilate him.

The South has now the solemn pledge that no further violation of its rights shall be tolerated, and the intelligent and unassuming commander of this department will neither urge nor countenance any increased violence in any department of his administration.—Mobile Times, 27th inst.

THE SAME EVERYWHERE.—Pilfering and malfeasance among Quartermasters and Commissaries are not confined to the United States army. The following instance recently occurred in England: By a general order signed by Lord William Paulet, K.C.B., Adjutant General, and issued by command of Field Marshal, the Duke of Cambridge, the finding and sentence of a general court-martial, called for the trial of Quartermaster Macolm Keir, of the Military Train, was announced. The charges were, that in the years 1863, 1864 and 1865, he received pecuniary gratuities in several instances, from Messrs. W. & B. Wright, contractors for supplying forage, the total amount so received, being £125, and endeavoring to obtain from the same firm a loan of £20, promising that he would be useful to them. He was found guilty on both charges and sentenced to be cashiered. By direction of the Duke of Cambridge, the charges, the finding, and sentence, and Her Majesty's confirmation of them, were read at the head of every regiment in Her Majesty's service. The Field Marshal, Commanding-in-chief, expresses the hope that this example will put an end to the pernicious system of receiving money as a bonus from the contractors for forage, and other articles supplied to troops, "which there is too much reason to believe has prevailed to a considerable extent."—Richmond Whig.

INSECURITY TO THE NEGRO.—The New York Tribune, in its negro sympathy, is much moved that some negro regiments in the Southwest are kept in service by the Government in order to repair the levees on the Mississippi river; and it wants somebody to explain "what authority there is for such a use of United States troops?, and why the Government should go into the engineering business for the benefit of plantation owners in that country?"

Had these blacks been ordered to the East to assist the mackerel and cod fishing interest, it would have been all right; but to aid the States through which the Mississippi flows is a very different thing. For ourselves, we regard it as the most sensible order that has emanated of late from the War Department, and we are sure that the "colored regiments" were never so usefully employed as they are now. The Tribune would have no objection that they should be supported in idleness, at the public crib, with nothing to do but strut about in their blue jackets and brass buttons, to the admiration and delight of the sable Cloes and Dinahs; but to doff these for working dresses, and actually take up spade and pickaxe—why, truly, this is "insulting," as Fred. Douglass says. As to the "authority" which our contemporary wants for "such a use of United States troops," we will promise that it shall be forthcoming the moment he tells us what "authority" there is for Uncle Sam's turning farmer in Maryland, and going into the cotton planting business in South Carolina and Georgia.—Mo. Repub., 23d inst.

ENGLAND.—In the House of Commons leave to suspend the habeas corpus in Ireland was given by a vote of 344 to 6. The House of Lords passed it without opposition.

A letter from Rome says it is believed that at the next Consistory a Bishop from the United States will receive a Cardinal's hat.

FROM WASHINGTON.

In the correspondence of the New York Herald we find the following:

WASHINGTON, Feb. 18.—Senator Harlan's resignation of the Secretaryship of the Interior Department is still a topic of speculation, and generally hoped for. Those named as his probable successors have decreased in number, until the choice is said to lie between Gov. Randall, of the Post-office Department, and Senators Cowan and Doolittle. The two latter are considered especially desirous of aiding the Presidential reconstruction proposition in Congress, and it is not deemed likely that they would accept a place in the Cabinet unless especially urged so to do. The field is thus clear to Randall, whose appointment is considered sure whenever the change is made. The time of Harlan's resignation still remains in doubt. He is known to have expressed to a Western Congressman of his own political ilk, a day or two ago, his intention to not remain much longer.

Men that are in the most eligible places for understanding the President's mind upon the subject, assume that he is only awaiting the ostracism of Tennessee as a State which is evidently the plan of the Reconstruction Committee, to invite such of the Cabinet ministers as are keown in accordance with that decision to vacate their places If this policy is to obtain, Harlan, Stanton and Speed have soon to bid a long farewell to their ministerial greatness.

The Radicals are turning heaveu and earth to alienate Johnson and Grant.

The resolution previously adopted by the Reconstruction Committee, providing for the admission of Tennessee as a State, with a constitution guaranteeing the Radical interpretation of a republican form of government, was reconsidered on Saturday under a strong pressure from Bingham and others, and new obligations proposed, under which Tennessee will only be admitted into the Union as a Territory. The latest dictations are that she shall enact an additional guarantee forever repudiating any portion of the debt created by the rebellious States, and recognize all men as equal before the law.

The testimony of Gen. Lee, brought out before the Reconstruction Committee yesterday, is understood to be almost wholly in reference to the State and people of Virginia. Little else was deducted than that, in the belief of Lee, the citizens of Virginia accepted the result of the war as final, and were submitting in good faith to the authority of the Government, and honestly anxious for complete restoration in the Union. In response to an inquiry as to whether a jury could be empanelled in Virginia for an impartial trial of Jefferson Davis, Gen. Lee stated that he thought not, as scarcely any man summoned as a juror could bring in a verdict of guilty without feeling that he, as a party to the same crime, could be held equally liable. Gen. Lee's manner and statements were candid and dignified. Most of the committee treated him cavalierly. Washburne, of the House, though a member of the committee, is not one of the sub-committee of three that conducted the examination, as stated last night. The members of the latter are Howard, Conkling and Blow. The evidence was completed on Saturday, and Gen. Lee can return home whenever he desires.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20.—This has been a field day in Congress. The Senate chamber has not witnessed such an attendance of spectators since the famous days of the winter of 1861. The galleries, aisles and corridors, the cloak-rooms on the floor, and even the reporter's gallery, were filled—ladies being admitted to the latter place. A third of the members of the House were on the floor of the Senate, in anticipation of an excited debate on the President's veto message.

Senator Wade, before the question was reached, introduced a Constitutional amendment making the Presidential office good only for one term of the incumbent. In speaking briefly on the proposition, he said that the President proposed to admit to the halls of Congress rebels lately in arms, and he added that he looked upon those who favored it as little better than traitors at heart. The declaration produced an immense sensation.

After Mr. Wade concluded, the Freedmen's Bureau bill came up. Garrett Davis spoke an hour. Senator Trumbull, the author of the bill, then addressed the Senate for two hours and a half, and was listened to with great interest by the audience. He was entirely courteous to the President, and addressed his argument from a legal point of view.

At half-past four o'clock, amid breathless silence, it was moved that the bill be enacted, notwithstanding the President's objections. The yeas and nays were called, and every vote was watched with intense interest. There was a disposition to applaud when Messrs. Dixon, Doolittle, Morgan and Cowan voted to sustain the President.

When the vote was announced by the Vice President, declaring that two-thirds not having voted for the bill, it was lost, and the veto was sustained, the pent-up mass in the galleries sent up prolonged and enthusiastic cheers, mingled with some hisses from the colored gallery. The Vice President ordered the clearing of the galleries, and the Sergeant-at-Arms and his officers promptly executed the order.

The Republicans who voted to sustain the President, were Senators Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Henderson, Morgan, Norton, Stewart, Van Winkle and Willey. Messrs. Dixon, Doolittle, Morgan, Norton and Van Winkle voted for the bill when it was originally passed. Messrs. Cowan and Willey were absent when the vote was taken.

Soon after the House was called to order Thad. Stevens got the floor and reported a concurrent resolution from the Reconstruction Committee, declaring that, in order to close the agitation of the question, which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainties which exists in the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection, no senator or representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from either of said states, until Congress shall have declared such States entitled to such representation.

In presenting this resolution, Mr. Stevens spoke about five minutes. He said that there had been an earnest investigation by the Committee until yesterday into the condition of Tennessee, to see whether it could admit the State to representation; but since yesterday, there had been a state of things which had induced the committee to consider it wholly out of their power to proceed further without surrendering a great principle and without yielding the rights of this body to the usurpation of another power—meaning the President. He demanded the previous question and refused to allow debate, whereupon there was a great scene of confusion and excitement.

During the struggle there were numerous exciting scenes. Little or no debate was allowed. When Mr. Voorhees attempted to announce that the Senate had sustained the President, his voice could hardly be heard above the shouts of "Order!" from the Republican side. When the vote was brought over to the House, the members gathered in crowds and dissected it, while the monotonous call of the roll was going on.

At 7:30 P. M. it was evident that the opposition could hold out no longer, and Mr. Eldridge announced that it was impossible to resist such a majority. A vote was then had, and the resolution was passed with only 40 votes against it, among whom were Messrs. Raymond, Green Clay Smith, Newell, of New Jersey, and Phelps, of Maryland. The House then adjourned.

The question of the jurisdiction of military commissions will be argued before the Supreme Court on the 5th of March. The question comes up in the case of certain parties who were tried for certain offences in Indiana by a military commission, convicted, sentenced to death, and the sentence approved by President Johnson, and afterwards commuted to imprisonment upon a writ of habeas corpus. The lower court has declined to release them, and denounces the proceedings as illegal, and the case will be heard on an appeal. Gen. Butler is retained in the case for the Government, and ex-Attorney General Black for the prisoners.

Mr. Chandler, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Harvey Watterson, of Tennessee, who were appointed by the President to visit Southern States and investigate the frauds alleged to have been committed by United States agents employed in the purchase of cotton, report the cotton fraude to be enormous, and say that it will require a special investigation committee to consider them. They say that cotton agents and their associates have converted, in many instances, very large sums to their own use which belonged, in fact, to the Government, or to people from whom, under one pretext or another, the cotton was obtained.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21.—A delegation of fifty merchant tailors, representing the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, were before the Committee on Ways and Means to-day, for the purpose of urging the Committee to adopt the report of the Internal Revenue Commission, which recommends that the present system of taxation be changed from six per cent. on the gross receipts to a tax on rates. The Committee promised to fairly consider the request.

Gen. Grant desires that the Army Bill shall be disposed of at an early day, and the House Military Committee have determined to consider it from day to day, until it is disposed of.

The sub-Committee of Reconstruction having the State of Virginia under consideration, are still taking evidence, and are not ready to report. They find the evidence is such that they are opposed to the admission of the Representatives into Congress.

The sub-Committee of Ways and Means will be ready to report to-morrow, on the various subjects of revenue referred to them for consideration. Their general opinion seems to be against any material changes in the Revenue Law as it now stands.

It has been the general opinion that the bill granting universal suffrage in this District would never be acted upon by the Senate; but it was reported for passage this morning, just as it came from the House. The Senate Committee on the District will urge its immediate passage.

The Star says that the Radical Senators and Representatives have telegraphed to their friends in the various States, urging demonstrations to sustain Congress. The first response from Ohio was read in the House to-day. The Star says others are expected to follow.

The mass meeting called for to-morrow to sustain the President, promises to be an immense affair. After the meeting the people are to proceed en masse to the President and present the resolutions adopted. He is expected to respond.

Gen. Rufus Saxton, of South Carolina, was examined to day before the Committee having South Carolina under investigation.

Brig. Gen. E. M. Gregory, Assistant Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau for the State of Texas, reports, under date of Galvestoe, Jan. 31, to Major Gen. Howard, that during a recent trip through the different portions of the State, which comprise the most productive and influential cotton and sugar growing sections, that the blacks were willing to work, asking only that the fulfillment of the promises made them by the planters should be enforced by the Government. Under these conditions, contracts were freely made with the freedmen on liberal terms. The former slave population are under contract for a year, and theft, idleness and vagrancy have almost become things of the past. In the whole State only about sixty-four freedmen are receiving Government support.

The Second Controller recently decided that Indian troops who served during the rebellion in the Federal army were entitled to the same bounties allowed to white troops. In view of this decision, Secretary Harlan has placed in the hands of the Interior Department $400,000, with directions that these bounties be paid at once. It is understood that the number of Indians entitled to receive bounty is about 3500, mostly from the Cherokee and Semiuole tribes, who served under the command of Col. Phillips, on the Arkansas river.

The Commissioner of Customs has been notified of quite a large seizure of smuggled goods at New Orleans, consisting of a hundred and fifty bales of army and Mexican blankets, gray cloth and clothing, amounting in the aggregate to nearly $100,000. These goods were smuggled into Texas from Mexico, through Eagle Pass, about the close of the war.

Reports received at the Freedmen's Bureau from Mississippi, give the usual encouraging account of the advancement of the freedmen's affairs. The freedmen are nearly all at work for their old masters, and the masters themselves are well satisfied with their conduct.

"MESSAGE" OF BRIGHAM YOUNG.

Although Utah is known to the law only as a Territory, with a Governor appointed by the President, and a Territorial delegate (William H. Hooper) in Congress, Brigham Young persists in calling it "the State of Deseret," and has just sent a "message" to the Mormon Legislature, under date of "Executive office, State of Deseret, January 22."

In this document, which has the merit of brevity, Brigham discusses the affairs of Utah from the extreme Mormon standpoint; gives thanks for abundant harvests, praises the untiring industry and enterprise of the people, and proceeds as follows:

Thus has a State been formed and brought into being, of which the honorable members of this Legislative Assembly are the true representatives. 'Tis true our State organization has not yet received the sanction of Congress and the General Government, yet it is considered best for us to maintain it intact, that whenever the propitious moment shall arrive our State may be able the more readily to assume the robes of sovereignty. Notwithstanding the seeming neglect on the part of Congress in hearkening to our petition for admittance into the Union as a State, we are still progressing in the founding of a commonwealth which must, ere long, win its way to place and power. Settlements are continually extending east and west, north and south, throughout the entire limits of the State, and an extensive traffic has been opened up with our neighbors on the north and west.

* * * * It is now about four years since the adoption by the people of our State Constitution and the formation of our State Government, yet Congress has not chosen to act upon our memorial, praying for admission into the Union; and I regret to add that indications do not appear favorable for such action during the present session of Congress. This delay on the part of our Government appears the more remarkable as other Territories of less extent and population have gained their status as States, and no good reason can be assigned why Deseret should continue to be thus excluded. The question, as to how long it will be proper for us to submit to have thus our constitutional rights and franchises withheld from us, is an important one; but we leave its solution to Him who rules all things.

If favors beget obligations, few indeed are the requirements that can be justly claimed at our hands. Other Territories—besides being admitted into the Union with subsidies, grants of lands for schools, railroads and other public uses—have had extended to their citizens pre-emption rights, and appropriations for various purposes, and otherwise been the recipients of the patronage, benefits and bounties of the parent Government, while Utah has been held off at arm's length, and has grudgingly had doled out to her the scantiest pittance; but, after all, it is not the empty forms and enactments of law, muster-rolls, nor worm-eaten parchments that constitute a State; it is the living people—an intelligent, industrious, educated, enterprising people which constitute a Government, and are, moreover, the source of political power in governments, based, like ours professes to be, upon democratic principles.

INSULTING THE PRESIDENT.

The interview between the President and Fred Douglas has given the Radicals a touch of the rabies. They are so enraged that they have taken to openly insulting the Chief Magistrate. The following extracts from the Chicago Tribune, are a specimen of the talk of these extremists:

But let Mr. Johnson step down from his official position, and, standing simply on his merits as a man, meet the ex-slave Douglas in fair debate on any of the political issues of the day, or advertise to speak in competition with him, and who does not know that Douglas' superiority in logical power, in memory, in wit, in rhetorical eloquence, and in every charm of oratory, would leave his competitor wholly in the shade. Had Mr. Johnson possessed those finer instincts of a gentleman and a true Democrat which so nobly distinguished his predecessor, he would have felt that, in conversing with Fredrick Douglas, he was talking with a man who was, in all but official station, his equal and in many respects his superior.

Even during the interview, the dignified, brief, but appropriate words of the ex-slave, contrast forcibly with the rambling, ungrammatical, disconnected harangue of the President, through which the mind wanders in vain in the search for either heart, intellect, logic or coherency. In illustration of this contrast, we ask the reader carefully to weigh the modesty, dignity, conciseness and condescension of argument in Frederick Douglas' brief speech, on which a Clay or an Everett could have made no improvement. * * * * *

The contrast between the dreary twaddle of such a speech and the pithy utterance of our late President, always keenly revealing some jewel of principle or gem of truth, is painful in the extreme. One thing, however, is shown clearly, and that is, that Mr. Johnson respects no feeling or sentiment on this question that is acceptable to the great majority of the American people. The unanimous approbation of copperhead only confirms our censures. What they have approved has been steadily and always wrong from their birth, as a party, until to-day. Fortunately, as this is a government in which men of mediocre abilities may by accident become President, it is also a government which the mediocrity of their abilities cannot destroy.

A SOUTHERN CONGRESS.

A despotism more absolute and degrading than that now exercised over the Southern people does not exist elsewhere in the political systems of the world. The subjects of the Czar of the Russians have, at least, the consolation of knowing that they obey a hereditary sovereign, and that their vassalage was bequeathed from generation to generation under sanction of precedents of their form of government. The Chinese, scanning far back the history of their nation, can find nothing in their political past to render their present condition intolerable by comparison. The bondmen of other climes were born to servitude and have no memories of freedom to brood upon. The Tartar roves in semi-barbarism under an authority that he acknowledges. The Indian follows the chieftain of his choice. The benighted Africans pay willing homage to the savage code in the more cruel caprices of some hereditary monster whose rude sway he accepts as legitimate. It has been left for our countrymen of the South to be hurled from republicanism to a despotism that is unsupported by precedent, by law, or by acquiescence.

There can be no worse form of oppression than that which compels an enlightened people, educated and habituated to self-government, to dwell in complete political dependence upon the will of a faction inimical to their sentiments and wishes. Much of the legislation of the present Federal, or rather present Radical Congress, will include the determination of questions of vital importance to the South, and yet the South has no representations in that Congress, no voice in discussion, not a vote upon issues that concern the interests of that section. They have absolutely been deprived of political life. Their political existence is limited to the necessity of obeying laws in the construction of which they have no more share than the cattle on their farms. Those sovereign States, whose right of representation in the central legislature is inalienable, are denied the privileges accorded to the Territories of the United States, for they at least have their delegates in Congress, who have the privilege of discussion, a privilege refused to Mr. Maynard, the duly accredited and elected representative from Tennessee, a State whose existence within the Union is established by the presence of one of her citizens in the Presidential chair.

In all enlightened communities, the interests of all classes of citizens are protected by organizations that are made up of representatives of such classes. Artizans of all kinds, capitalists, machinists, manufacturers, artists, actors, laborers—all men that compose the industrial world—have their Unions, their Associations, their Congress, in fact, for the purpose of consulting and advancing the interests of their respective order. There is to-day in session in this country a Fenian Congress, regularly organized, and engaged in deliberation and legislation in behalf of the welfare of Ireland. It is imperative, in the nature of civilized government and of society, that interest of value shall be represented in some form of organization. And shall millions of our countryman, entitled to the enjoyment of a Republican Government, remain utterly without political representation? Shall one section of our country be subject to the caprice of a faction of the other section, without even an opportunity to explain their wants, to express their views, to protest against injustice, or place upon record their arguments and vote upon questions of general importance or of special interest to themselves? Such a condition is compatible with the essence of republicanism. It does not exist in the monarchies of Europe. It would breed revolution in Imperial France. It would provoke convulsion even under the iron sceptre of the Russian Czar. But here, in this boasted Republic, it is regarded with exultation by the Radicals; with apparent indifference by others in the North who profess Democracy, and by the South with the dignity of helpless manhood enduring indignity and injustice, and awaiting the hour when a sense of equity and a revival of public sentiment, to restore to the political system its normal attributes.

But, in the meantime, should the Southern people be dumb and inactive in the presence of this persecuting spirit? By no means. They should make an opportunity for the utterance of a solemn protest to the world against the despotism to which they are subjected. Since they are denied representation in the National Legislature, since they are prohibited from assisting in working the machinery of the Central Government, they should at least organize for the interchange of sentiment upon questions that concern them. If a Fenian Congress can assemble and deliberate in New York, why not a Southern Congress in Richmond? it is eminently proper that there should be some organization representative of Southern interests, if for no other purpose than to place upon record the verdict of Southern popular opinion. We suggest that the gentlemen who have been elected to the Federal Congress as representatives of the Southern States, and who have been rudely denied the exercise of their functions at the National Capitol, assemble elsewhere on their own soil to deliberate, in Southern Congress, in behalf of their constituents.—New York News.

THE HERODIAN HORROR.

Herod the Great may not have died from partaking too freely of trichina spiralis with his roast pig, but the presumption that he did is supported by the historic assertion that he was eaten by worms before the breath was fairly out of his body. It is apparent that he died of no ordinary disease. Other and greater men died before Herod, and the histographers were at no pains to mention the particular disease that took them out of the world.

It was reserved for an age of microscopes to discover that the Herodian horror was only an aggravated case of trichina in the stomach and viscera. We are indebted to the German physicians for this important addition to the list of ills which flesh is heir to—swine flesh in particular. It is not a pleasant reflection that a single ounce of this flesh may contain a hundred thousand animalculæ, and that while they show the same preference for swine that the devil did, they readily colonize the human stomach, and are indefatigable pathfinders through the human system. Microscopic as they are, they endure extremes of temperature with a tenacity of life that is wonderful. They boil, fry, and stew with comparsure. Indeed, any degree of heat under 212 rather quickens than retards their vitality. They become torpid, like frogs and lizards in winter, but at the first sensation of heat awaken to an alarming activity.

Good people, who dearly love a roast of pork, a slice of ham, or a savory sausage, have flattered themselves that trichinæ were indigenous to Germany, and would confine their labors to the domesticated and demoralized offspring of the wild boar of the Thuringian forests. Not a bit of it. Since the German physicians made such a vulgar use of their microscopes, others have been engaged in inspections of pork, and the result is the announcement that trichinæ have developed themselves in the swine of America. The Chicago papers inform us that a load of pork put on sale at Peoria, Illinois, last week, was examined at Dixon, and also discovered to be inhabited by these infinitesimal creatures. The St. Louis papers of Saturday announce the poisoning of two families in that city from eating "diseased pork," though no attempt appears to have been made to discover the character of the disease. Doubtless it was the Herodian horror.

There are two ways of keeping trichinæ out of the human stomach. Buy a microscope, or leave off eating pork. If you are as fond of roast pig as Charles Lamb was, and will have it, keep a microscope in your kitchen. It will have to play an important part in domestic economy. Engage no cook who is not as familiar with the microscope as with a waffle ring. Avoid sausage. German sausages (imported particularly.) Yield not to temptation of Bologna, and eschew Westphalia ham. Eat sparingly of pork, though you know who raised it and are positive that it was corn-fed. A microscope would not be objectionable by the side of your plate, to inspect the morsel that tantalizes you on the fork's end. It will be a slow process, this inspection by monthful, but it will be safe.—Cincinnati Gazette.

MEXICO.—Whatever may be the obscurity of the diplomatic language by which the French Government endeavors to conceal the termination of its Mexican policy, the act itself is hardly disputed any longer by any one. France has partly yielded to the pressure brought against it by the remonstrances of the Washington Government, supported as they were by the whole public opinion of Europe; and it has held out the official promise of a withdrawal of her troops at an earlier period than, without a pressure from abroad, she would have been willing to announce.

Some of the Paris journals, which drew their "inspiration" from the French Government, seem to be intent upon denying, what everybody beside them acknowledges, the defeat of the French diplomacy in the Mexican question. Thus the Constitutionnel asserts in an article which is supposed to have a semi-official porentage, that the French Government will never yield to intimidation, and that the French troops will return precisely at the time when it can be done without endangering the interests which France went to defend in Mexico. The Nord, the Russian organ in Paris, states that the French Government was to send a Special Envoy to Washington, in order to demand categorically whether a protracted occupation of Mexico by the French troops would be held as a casus belli. Any irritation that articles of this kind may be able to produce, will serve the purposes of the French Government; but, according to present appearances, the intention of that Government does not extend beyond the desire to protract the negotiations with the United States, to find new supports for the stability of the rule of Maximilian after the withdrawal of the French troops, and, at all events, to secure the French bondholders of the new Mexican loan against loss.

The reinforcement of the Austrian and Belgian contingents to Maximilian's army is undoubtedly regarded by the French Government as a prime necessity, in case of a withdrawal of its own troops. Negotiations concerning this point have undoubtedly been going on for a considerable length of time, but the report of a treaty between Austria and France, by which the former power engages to furnish Maximilian one hundred thousand men, is extremely doubtful. The Austrian Government would seem to be neither politically nor financially in a position to assume such a responsibility.

From the seat of war we have not had for many weeks any facts that would indicate a change in the position. For those who sympathize with our sister Republic, and who, with Bancroft, hope that the Mexican Republic must and will rise again, nothing has of late been more mortifying than the Bagdad affair, and the unceasing quarrel between the Liberal chiefs on the Rio Grande, which recently, as is reported, even led to a fight between Cortinas and Canales. It is to Generals different from those now commanding on the Rio Grande, that the Republic must look for its restoration.—New York Tribune.

DANGEROUS POWER OF THE NATIONAL BANKS.—Fifteen hundred or two thousand National banks, issuing all, or nearly all, the currency, and controlling the moneyed power of the Republic, will place the people, the Government and the whole industry of the Nation at their mercy. The old National bank was a pigmy beside this monster. It will have its grip upon the agriculture, manufactures and trade of the country, and its thousands of directors and others interested will be able to forestall the markets, regulate the prices to suit their own speculations, and destroy everybody or everything that should raise its head against them. Such is the prospect before us, unless Congress take some step to put this dangerous monopolizing institution out of existence. If that body can raise itself to the magnitude of the subject, it will begin at once to reduce the banks, to substitute Government money for their circulation, and finally, to break them up altogether.—Omachita Teleg., 22d.

☞ In one of his letters to the Marquis de Montholon, published in the Yellow Book, Drouyn de l'Huys says: "Now that there is a regular Government in Mexico, the legitimate object of our expedition will be obtained. We are endeavoring, while satisfying our own interests and our dignity, to make arrangements which will enable us to consider the mission of our army in Mexico as terminated."

MONETARY.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE,
NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 1866.

The most noticeable feature of the market, to-day, has been a still further decline in rates of gold and foreign exchange. The gold market opened exceedingly flat, at yesterday's quotations, and with a heavy supply on hand, holders tried hard to effect sales at previous figures, but failing to realize their hopes, they soon reduced the rates, to correspond with the depressed views of buyers. The demand, nevertheless, continued restricted throughout the day, and the only sales of any kind, that have been verified to our satisfaction, will be found in the annexed statement, viz: $5000, $500; $15,0 0 and $18,000 at 135¾; $3000, $5000, $5000 and $6000 at 135½; $5000 and $11,000 at 135¼; $12 000 at 135⅜; $6000 and $10,000 at 135⅛; $1000 at 135, and $10,000, gold checks, at ⅛ ₱ cent. premium. Sales of silver comprised $1500 at 130⅝, and $1000 at 132, all American. We now quote gold at 135@135¾, and silver at 130@132 for American coin, and 133@136 for Mexican dollars.

Foreign exchange has declined ¼ ₱ cent. to-day. Offerings showed a still further increase, owing to recent heavy sales of cotton for the European markets, while the demand was, if anything, of a still further restricted character than heretofore. Most of the principal buyers continue out of the market, awaiting lower prices; and the movement since our last has been confined to the following amounts, viz: £2000 and £15 100, sold in the morning at 146¾; £6000, in two lots, at 146¾; £800, £2000 and £4000 at 146, £15,000 at 145¾, £5000 at 145¾, £5000 at 145, and £4000 bill of ladies bills at 144¾. The sales of francs included 40,000f., 50,000f. and 150,000f., at 3.86¼, 50,000f., 100,000f., $100,000 and $100,000 at $8 87½, and 100,000f at 3.88¾.

DOMESTIC EXCHANGE.—There is no variation of any kind to notice in domestic exchange; offerings continue light, and the demand is only moderately active either at bank or on the street. The checking rate at the former has been steady to-day at ½ ₱ cent. discount, and the purchases of private and commercial has been confined to $28,000 at 5-16 ₱ cent. discount; $30 000, $30,000, $40,000, $50,000 and $100,000 New York sight at ⅜ ₱ cent. discount, and $75,000 at ⅜@⅝ ₱ cent. discount; $14,0 0 and $20,000 of ten days' sight at ⅜ ₱ cent. discount; $50 000 thirty days' at ⅜ ₱ cent. discount, and $20,000 sixty days' at 2 ₱ cent. discount. We still quote New York sight at ⅜ ₱ cent. discount, and outdoor sight at ⅜@½ ₱ cent. discount; five and ten days' sight, ½@¾ ₱ cent. discount; fifteen and twenty days', ⅝@1 ₱ cent. discount; thirty days', 1@1½ ₱ cent. discount, and sixty days', 2 ₱ cent. discount.

STOCKS AND BONDS.—The movement in all classes of securities has been of a very restricted character since our last. Offerings of the general run were ample, but the supply of the few descriptions which now attract special notice was exceedingly restricted. The only actual sales that have transpired for the day were 13 shares City Railroad Company's stock at 126 and $5000 City Consolidated Bonds at 91½.

UNCURRENT BANK NOTES.—There is a moderate inquiry noticeable for the issues of one or two of the banks that are in liquidation, but all of the others are considerably neglected. Offerings, however, disclose but little, if any, increase of any class and transactions since our last have been confined to $600 Louisiana State Bank at 74c., $10,000 do. at 76c., $ 400 Bank of New Orleans at 9.½c., and $230 do. at 93½c. ₱ dollar.

NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 1866.

COTTON.—The market opened quiet but firm this morning, and after a rather dull movement was of a very restricted character. Most of the principal buyers had been sent from an early hour, however, examining samples and selecting suitable lots. But it was apparent throughout the early part of the day that the inquiry was prospective, and the operations at a later hour would depend to some extent upon the tenor of the European advices, which were part due and anxiously awaited. The steamship Asia's accounts to the 17th ult. inclusive, were published in the evening papers, and considered small news, inasmuch as the Liverpool market was reported to have declined ⅛d., while the quotation for middling uplands at the close of business on Saturday, Feb. 17th, was given at 10d., which would leave Orleans middling, as before, at 10½d. Yet the news instead of depressing actually imparted increased strength to our market, as buyers had apprehended much less favorable accounts, owing to the reports of heavy receipts, which had been transmitted from this side, and must have reached the other previous to the departure of the Asia. The principal movement in our market to-day was effected after the receipt of foreign news, and the fact that prices not only continued firm, but that the upward tendency in the movement, which has been noticeable from the opening of the week, has culminated in an advance of 1c. ₱ ₱, as will be seen by our revised quotations, shows that the intelligence from the trans-Atlantic markets has not been considered very unsatisfactory. The sales for the day amounted to 3277 bales, and the market closed steady at the subjoined quotations, viz: Ordinary 37@40c.; good ordinary 41@42c.; low middling 43@44c. and middling 46c. The operations for the day have been divided among buyers in the following order, viz: 800, 600, 350, 300, 200, 200, 200, 140, 100, 100, 100, 50, 42, 37, 30 and 28 bales. Heavier purchases have been credited to outside parties to some buyers, but we have, we feel satisfied, obtained the full and actual sales for the day, and we only aim at accuracy in our reports.

All descriptions of bacon are scarce, while lard is in fair supply, both command full prices. Sales will be found the full particulars of the condition of our market.

PORK.—Dealers are supplying the demand at $32 50@$33 ₱ bbl. for even weight mess, and $29@$30 ₱ bbl. for prime do.

BACON.—There is but little of any kind on hand, and all qualities are in demand. Small parcels are changing hands at 15@16½c. for shoulders, 21@21½c. for ribbed sides, and 23c. ₱ lb for clear do. There are no plain hams on the market; sugar-cured do. covered are selling at 28@27c., and do. uncovered at 25@26c. ₱ lb.

COFFEE.—Dealers are supplying the demand at 23c. for ordinary, 29@29½c. for fair, and 31c. ₱ lb, currency, for prime choice Rio.

WHISKY.—The supply greatly exceeds the demand, and

OUR MISSION.

The division of the Church into various branches, having various names, and differing in doctrinal statement and government, is in the order of Providence and for the greatest good. It is productive of a spirit of emulation, and furnishes all sorts of people, and all circumstances, with a system adapted and efficient.

It is also a standing exhibition of the essentials of religion in which there is unity, in connection with what is merely expedient, in which there is variety. The maintenance of a pure Christianity is doubtless, in a great measure, owing to the separate ecclesiastical organization of the Church of Christ. Every Church has in its economy something which gives it superior efficiency in some directions, and enables it to meet the wants of different classes of individuals to which the Gospel is addressed. There must be adjustment to the temperaments, idiosyncrasies and outward conditions of men. Within the scope of what is saving and essential, there must be the latitude of a free ecclecticism; and the individual is warranted in choosing that form of worship and doctrinal symbol which shall best enable him to work out his own salvation. To him the Church of his choice contains in her peculiarities what is essential, but essentially necessary to him alone, whilst another communion may possess the more essential helps to piety for another honest seeker after the truth. All religious mind cannot revolve in the same orbit; it cannot be pressed into the same groove, nor can it be reduced to one uniform system. What may seem to us blemishes in the doctrines and government of some Churches, their exclusiveness and bigotry, or their errors of doctrine, are calculated to attract certain orders of mind, and so to bring them in saving proximity to evangelical truth.

As Methodists, we gladly recognize the wisdom and efficiency of this diversity in unity; and in proportion to the breadth of our charity, is the earnest conviction that our own system must be maintained in its integrity. Whether it be the best system in the world or not, we believe it to be the best for us, and that, under Providence, her very peculiarities mark out for her a work which she is called to perform.

Methodism is but one phase or aspect of an organized and working Christianity; and Southern Methodism is but one variety of the common Wesleyan stock. It must, however, be insisted upon that it is a variety, and so far having distinctiveness from every other form of Methodism. The argument which applies to the division of the Church into separate organizations, applies to the divisions that exist in the Methodist family. It is best for general efficiency, and for the spirituality of all, that they should remain apart. This is the declared feeling and purpose of Southern Methodism. The results of the war have affected this question only to deepen this conviction and to define her mission more perfectly.

And yet the report is industriously circulated that we are about to return to the bosom of the Episcopal Church. The fears of some honest souls have been excited by these unfair statements and false representations as to the temper and tendencies of Southern Methodism in the direction of the Episcopal organization. It was an opportune time to resort to the old trick, and to raise the cry of return to the true Church. Such representations, known to be false by those who utter them, can have no effect upon the piety and intelligence of our people. A few it may mislead—and some may have been entangled in this tissue of falsehood. Let it be understood, then, that our Church is not about to expire and leave her heritage to others. Slavery is dead, but Southern Methodism is not dead. The dread alternative of union with the Episcopal Church or affiliation with the Northern Methodists is by no means forced upon us. We can and will do neither.

Under various and questionable influences, it is to be expected that some shall become Episcopalians in the future as in the past. The elaborate, and, to some, imposing ceremonials of this Church, and her disciplinary indulgence and license, towards those who seek the fashionable pleasures and dissipations of society, may lead away the young. Occasionally, through some idiosyncracy of mind, or more frequently through ignorance, some will be shaken by the preposterous dogmas of the "true Church," and Apostolical Succession. And there are others who will be repelled by the simplicity and spirituality of our worship and proportionably attracted by what is highly respectable and highly formal. But that the intelligence and piety of our Church should entertain the thought of uniting with the Episcopal Church, is a statement which could spring only from bigotry and ignorance. The causes which expelled Methodism from the English Church, are operative still. Her high Church notions are not abated, her burdensome ritual is retained, and her sacramentarian and papistical tendencies become every day more apparent. To put our Methodism into the Episcopal Church would be like putting new wine into old bottles; a new patch on an old garment. The tremendous incongruity makes the idea farcical. In all charity we may admit that this Church, under Providence, is doing a good work, and we would advise those who can be more holy in her communion to go there and stay there.

But Methodism has its uses also, and has shown itself by far the more efficient system in reaching and converting the masses. Besides, it is a part of our mission to refute the dogma of ecclesiastical unity, and to be a living testimony to the pureness and spirituality of the Gospel. To Southern Methodism there is nothing peculiarly attractive in the Episcopal Church.—The action of the Southern Dioceses in retracing their steps Northward, was doubtless taken for reasons sufficient to themselves, and we make no objections, but it certainly is no valid argument for union with us.

Southern Methodism is more distinctive, and has within herself more of the element of longevity than ever. Her work in former years was not alone to give the Gospel to the slave, nor was the ethical question involved in slavery the principle upon which she stood. In reference to these she remains unchanged. What she regarded as right in these matters four years ago, she regards as right to-day.—Our law contained no declarations upon slavery; and what was done for the slave, was done in obedience to the principles of fidelity to her great mission to preach to every creature, and to spread scriptural holiness everywhere. She did not feel warranted in meddling with the political affairs of the country, but sought to ameliorate the condition and save the souls of all classes.—It was an apostacy from these principles which drove Luther from Rome, that eliminated Wesleyanism from the English Church, and that severed Southern from Northern Methodism. In the last instance slavery may have been the immediate occasion of the rupture, but it was so only as it became the test of fidelity to the broad principles of the Apostolical commission. It was this comprehensive ground upon which the South stood, and not upon the mere ethics of slavery; and her separation from the North was forced upon her by the defection of the Methodist E. Church.

Here we have the initial point of the mission of Southern Methodism, as it stands related to the Northern Church. The extinction of slavery and the political union of the country, does not affect the question. The attitude of the two Churches to the great principles on which they separated is relatively the same, except that the apostacy of Northern Methodism is more wide-spread and appalling than it was twenty years ago. Then we adhered to the spirit and principles of the Gospel commission, and fidelity to these principles thrust us out, defined our mission and gives this mission its perpetuity.

If there were indications of reform and return to a purer and better spirit, union might not appear so utterly impracticable. But the reverse is true. We are repelled by the same broad principles upon which the original separation took place. Our mission is still to maintain a spiritual Christianity, to preach Christ and him crucified, without dabbling in the politics of the day, and unmoved by revolutions and changes, to maintain the Methodist economy in unimpaired vigor and efficiency.

That the two Churches should remain apart, granting that both are equally pure and spiritual, would seem to be best. More power and wealth would be unsafe to the Northern Church, inimical to her piety, and dangerous to the country. This would be true were the Northern Church pure, and faithful to her primitive standards and spirit. But in her present condition the argument has greater weight. It is this Church which boasts of having elected a President, of carrying the country through a long and bloody war successfully, and of having enriched herself with the spoils of this unnatural and barbarous conflict. If the mission of Southern Methodism were far less clear than it is, there are cogent reasons why no affiliation should be thought of with a Church already too wealthy and numerous for her own and her country's good.

Nor is it possible that a Church, animated by the spirit of Christ, should find anything congenial in the tone of Northern Methodism.—As it looks to us, there is utter corruption at the heart. The lust of power, ecclesiastical and political, spiced with peculiar malignity towards Southern people and Southern Christians, is the animating principle. Moved by this combined lust of power and malignity, our brethren of the North have invoked the military arm to drive us from our churches, and to scatter our flocks. But for the interposition of the Executive, they would have possessed themselves of our entire Church property; and their grasp upon what they held was relaxed only upon compulsion. Our people have been scattered, our Sunday Schools broken up, and infinite damage has been done. Whether we regard these facts in the light of enlightened patriotism, or of Christianity, they are alike indefensible. They knew that this course would make neither patriots nor Christians.—There was in it neither love of souls nor of country, but a malign ambition, and an unbridled lust of power. To these base passions the heritage of God has been sacrificed, and in their gratification souls have been lost. A different course and a different spirit might have brought us more together in heart, but these could not spring from a Church spiritually rotten, and degenerated from her true mission by a growing apostacy of more than twenty years.

The mission of our Church was never better and more sharply defined than now, when she stands opposed by an organization which avows its purpose to absorb and "wipe us out," and invokes political and military power to aid its unhallowed aggressions. So far from our mission having expired, the field expands before us, and there is a louder call than ever for thorough and effective work. Precious little Gospel will white men or negroes get from those who represent this corrupt and spiritually backslidden Church. Stones, and not bread—serpents, and not fish, they will furnish.

Southern Methodism must give the Gospel to the people, as heretofore. The negro, in due time, will return to his only true friends, and the people will recognize as their teachers those who have never turned aside from their proper work as ambassadors of Christ.—As a Church, this is the hour of our responsibility, and we have need to realize the unbroken greatness and distinctiveness of our mission.—Southern Methodism must hold on her course—her work can be done by no other. Reduced as she may be in fortune, she is the richer and stronger for all her losses. The gold has been purified, and her spiritual power and capabilities of usefulness have been increased by her sufferings. Providence has raised and developed her for the work which now, and but now, has reached its sublimest expansion.—Southern Methodism has her specific mission, and she is identified with the South, with the brighter suns, the richer life, the warmer hearts, the heroic sufferings of this Southern land.

COMFORT IN AFFLICTION.

Affliction is the certain and the universal lot of all ages, climes and classes. It is various; assailing us in body, mind, family and estate.—In view of this sad and certain inheritance of woe, men have taxed their utmost powers of invention to discover some resource and sure support; indeed all life's labors are to escape from afflictions already upon us, or to provide against those that, we know, alas! too well, must come upon us. Different temperaments, education, or associations, dispose us to adopt various theories of happiness, but our aim is one—to escape afflictions, if we may, or how best to bear them, if we must.

One class propose, by gaiety, and stimulated amusements, to escape, or better bear affliction. This is a weak device, for when real sorrow comes—sorrow that overshadows and bows down the soul, who can be gay? Who can mingle with the merry-making throng, or find aught of joy in the thoughtless laugh?

Others hope, by the accumulation of wealth, to escape; to soften or sustain affliction. This plan has more of plausibility than that which proposes to make amusement our comfort in affliction. Wealth can satisfy, in a pleasant way, our material wants—ward off many material hardships and privations—can afford us the means of usefulness, of enlarged hospitality, and extended benevolence. This scheme, however, must fail, for wealth cannot soothe pain, wipe away tears, prepare us for death, or remove its tremendous fears. Wealth, in the uncertainty of human calculations and institutions, often takes wings to itself and flies away, and leaves those who depend upon it bereaved and bankrupt of all.

Another description of minds try, by the cultivation of the intellect, by intellectual delights, to escape or provide against the inevitable ills of life. They occupy themselves with history, live in the past, follow the march of states through their mutations, from obscurity to renown, from weakness to power, and from maturity to decay.

Others seek to amuse their minds by the perusal of those models of composition embodied in the epic, the tragic or comic muse, or else roam through the vast, the brilliant, and fascinating realms of fiction.—Others, of more reflection and sober cast, follow the march and rejoice in the triumphs of science. This plan has the advantage of meeting our intellectual needs. It is a mode of life freer from anxiety than the pursuit of wealth; the treasure can be more easily retained, and never can be altogether lost. It affords the means of instruction and usefulness to our fellow-men. So far it is well; but knowledge, no more than gaiety or wealth, can soothe the agonizing pain, or cure disease, or wipe away our tears, or prepare for the awful realities of that tremendous future, that so soon expects us.

Another order of minds propose, with what they are pleased to dignify with the name of philosophy, to escape, or overcome the afflictions of life. They propose to train and school the mind to meet all events, joyous or sad, with equal indifference—to be superior to fortune, as they are wont to call Providence.—That to live, to suffer and to die, are inevitable, and therefore any concern is alike improper and useless. This brave talk may do when all is well, but it is a poor solace in the hour of our woe. Who of us, indeed, ever complains to help or escape our calamities? Alas! we weep because we must; our brimful hearts must pour out their woe, because, indeed, we are powerless, and can only weep. This affectation of indifference cannot take away our inborn desires for comfort and peace; neither can it remove our anxieties in relation to our temporal or eternal needs.

What, then, are afflicted men, with all their hopes and fears, to do? What shall give them comfort?—Whither shall they turn? The Psalmist of Israel alone counsels, with the wisdom from above—"This is my comfort in affliction—for thy word hath quickened me."

Men who do not rest on God's word, have no solution of sin and sorrow. To them it seems that God made man miserable and subject to death, or else that God is heartlessly indifferent to our fate. Such conclusions must fill the mind with bitterness, or overwhelm it with despair. Such men can see no moral uses in affliction; to them it wears the guise of cruelty and wrong.—Such men have no support in affliction; and, worse still, no ray of hope cheers the gloom of the awful future. That which is bad can only grow worse; that which is dark can only settle down into deeper gloom.

The man who turns to God's Word for comfort, finds the dark enigma of human suffering solved. God did not make us prone to evil—did not make us to suffer and to die.—He made us in his own image, holy and happy, and capable of endless joy. We may not fear that God is either unjust or unkind; if tares are found in his field, be assured an enemy hath put them there.

God's Word teaches us that afflictions are sometimes punitive, and take the form of judgments upon aggravated and hopelessly impenitent sinners; but often they are meant to lead men to repentance; for when God's judgments are abroad in the earth, the inhabitants thereof learn righteousness.

God's Word teaches us that afflictions are disciplinary, and are meant to develop and exercise the graces of Christian life. To wean us from the world, and to kindle our aspirations for heaven. Job, under the pressure of his afflicting burden, said—"I would not live alway."—The Psalmist, weary and anxious to escape, exclaims, "O that I had the wings of a dove, to fly away and be at rest." The great Apostolic Missionary to the Gentiles, having the witness of the Holy Ghost that bonds and afflictions awaited him in every city, felt and said, "It is better to depart and be with Christ."

God's Word promises support—"As our day, so shall be our strength." Job, afflicted from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, can exclaim—"I will trust him though he slay me." David, in sore bereavement, feels that "it is good to be afflicted." Paul, in hunger, nakedness and peril, is enabled to utter those heroic words—"None of these things move me." On Stephen's dying eye the glory of heaven kindles, and in full view of his heavenly home he exclaims, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit."

God's Word promises that every real or apparent mal-adjustment shall be righted—every dark providence shall be illuminated—vindicating every way of God to man.—The Judge of all the earth will do right. "This is my comfort in affliction—thy word hath quickened me."

THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE

This body convened at Alexandria, Va. on the 7th February, Rev. N. Wilson presiding, and Rev. Jno. S. Martin Secretary.

On the second day of the session the formal vote was taken to adhere to the Methodist Episcopal Church South. We copy from the Richmond Advocate:

Rev. Mr. Register said that this body had now reached a point when he considered it time to unite with the Methodist Church South. This change in their relation, he considered, second only to the conversion of the soul to God. After so long a period, and after so many trials, he thanked God that so many have met under such auspices. He found it, under the circumstances, impossible to again unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church, but in the Methodist Episcopal Church South they had met all the requirements necessary for a union. In answer to questions as to the boundaries of the Baltimore Annual Conference, the Virginia Annual Conference will accord all this body will ask. In taking the present course they may lose much—nearly all but honor, integrity and religion, but trusting in God, the future holds out bright prospects, and under his guidance they would go forward. In conclusion, Mr. R. offered the following paper:

Whereas, the regular annual sessions, in the strictest sense thereof, of this Conference were prevented for several years by the existence of civil war in the country, so that it was impossible for us earlier to have completed the course of action inaugurated by this body at its session held in Staunton in 1861. And preferring, as we do, the connectional principle of church government, including episcopacy as an element thereof, and believing any further continuance of Conference independency would be prejudicial to the efficient working of our itinerant system.—And whereas, the animus and practice of the Methodist Episcopal Church is such as to make it improper for us to resume our submission to the jurisdiction of said church; and the organization, doctrines, and discipline of said church, and the organization, doctrine and discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, fully according with our own views what constitutes a scriptural branch of the church of Christ: therefore,

1. Resolved, by the Baltimore Annual Conference in Conference assembled, That in pursuance of the action of this body, in 1861, we do hereby unite with and adhere to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and do now, through the President of this Conference invite Bishop Early to recognize us officially and preside over us at our present session.

2. Resolved, That in taking this action, we adhere to no dead political institutions, questions or issues, being actuated by sentiments of sincere loyalty to the Government of the United States, and to that of the States respectively, to which we may be assigned to labor, but are influenced by motives of a far higher and holier nature, such as usefulness among the people whom we serve and the best interest of the Kingdom of Christ, whose headship alone, we acknowledge in things pertaining to salvation.

Resolved, That having no unkind feeling towards brethren from whom we differ, we do hereby assure our former fellow laborers of our Christian affection and fraternal sympathy, and shall do all we can, consistently, to prevent strife between them and us, and to promote good will, and brotherly kindness towards them, and do most sincerely cherish the hope that the day may speedily come when, at least, a hearty and universal fraternal fellowship shall be established between the two coordinate branches of the great Methodist family of this continent.

(Signed,) S. Register,
E. R. Veitch.

Mr. Register trusted for unanimity of action, and hoped that the paper would be adopted by a rising vote.

Rev. Mr. Poisal wanted inserted Methodist Episcopal Church North.

Rev. Mr. Martin objected to the insertion; no action.

Rev. Mr. Brooke suggested a called vote. He thanked God that he had lived to see this day, and he wanted his name recorded in favor of this paper.

Messrs. Thomas, Poisal and Gilbert heartily acquiesced in the adoption of the paper.

Rev. Mr. Martin moved that the vote be taken by ayes and noes—decided in the affirmative.

On motion of Rev. Mr. Martin, all young men admitted during the war were recognized as members of the Conference and allowed to vote.

The roll was then called on the adoption of the paper, and it was adopted without a negative vote, as follows:

S. Register, F. O. Tebbes, L. R. Jones, A. Q. Flaharty, J. P. Etchison, C. A. Joyce, J. S. Martin, J. J. Engle, W. R. Stringer, H. A. Gravor, D. Ball, J. W. Wolff, W. Hedges, J. W. Tonguo, H. Hoffman, C. L. Terreyson, J. H. Temple, D. Thomas, J. H. Wolff, S. S. Roszol, F. H. Richey, J. H. March, J. N. Gray, J. P. Hyde, J. S. Gardner, S. Keppler, J. W. Ewan, L. C. Miller, A. A. P. Neal, P. S. E. Sixeas, L. Butt, S. H. Griffith, J. Beaty, S. B. Dolly, T. Briley, E. R. Veitch, S. C. Dice, R. Smith, G. R. Jefforson, A. P. Bonde, J. E. Armstrong, L. Lenz, W. J. Baird, W. G. Eggleston, F. H. Wishner, J. Poisal, E. Welty, N. Wilson, G. G. Brooke, J. Landstreet, J. M. Grandin, W. G. Coe, P. B. Smith, S. Rodgers, L. W. Haslup, W. R. McNeer, T. Hilderbrand, E. H. Jones, A. W. Wilson, E. F. Busey, T. E. Carson, W. J. Perry, W. V. Tudor, W. H. Wilson, J. W. Bull, A. B. Dolly, J. L. Gilbert, D. Shoaf, F. N. Mills.

On motion all absent members and those that may be received during the session of Conference be allowed to record their votes after this, was adopted, and a motion that those who are not present may send their acquiescence to the Secretary to be recorded, was likewise adopted.

Messrs. Register and Roszell were appointed to wait on Bishop Early and request him to take charge of and preside over the Conference.

Bishop Early, in a few moments entered the church, escorted by the committee, and was received by the President, Rev. N. Wilson, who requested the Bishop, in accordance with the resolution of Conference, to take the body under his charge and preside over its deliberations.

The resolution of invitation to the Bishop was then read.

The Bishop suggested before taking the chair, that the resolution should be so amended as to read that "we adhere to the plan of agreement made in 1844," as he thought that would secure the property of the church.

Messrs. Register, Brooke and Wilson objected to the amendment, which was favored by Mr. Gilhort.

Bishop Early made an explanation of his suggestion, stating that he believed it for the interest of the Church, but did not press the matter, and the question was dropped.

The Bishop then took the chair, and made some very appropriate remarks, explaining the rules of the Church, and saying that no scene of the kind had occurred in his life. The recollections of fifty years crowded upon him and brought to his mind the faces and forms of the fathers and predecessors of those who now composed this body.

* * * * * *

On the 9th of Feb. Rev. Nelson Head, fraternal messenger of the Virginia Conference to this body, was introduced.

Dr. D. S. Doggett, his colleague, addressed the Conference in relation to his mission. The Southern Church, unharmed by the shock of war and the machinations of her enemies, stood firm and fearless, and boasted as firm an obedience to the symbols of the fathers as any branch of the Methodist family in existence. The loyalty of the church was unquestionable, and the experience of all would prove the fact that not a single official church paper or resolution could be produced inveighing against the powers that be, or breathing any other spirit than that of submission to authority.

There is much in the present position of the Baltimore Conference resembling that of his own. They have protested as we did against the tide of heresy; and now when unable longer to stem it, had withdrawn from them only a few years after us. He had witnessed a spectacle on yesterday of grand import; and the venerable bishop here, on taking the chair, had formally riveted the golden chain that bound them to their sister Conferences of the South. This step may cost wealth, comfort, even life itself; yet their position, taken on the side of truth, would be as impregnable as the rock of Gibraltar against the feathered javelins.

The land groans even till now for rest—for peace. God grant that under the administration of wise laws, all may yet be well.—We leave to others the management of secular affairs, and the solving of the greatest problem that was ever submitted to man's judgment. This Conference has passed into relations that will diffuse their influence down to the latest period of time. He invoked upon the body that was before him the "wisdom that cometh from above, without partiality and without hypocrisy." At the conclusion of his address, Rev. N. Head took the floor and made a few appropriate remarks.

Rev. Mr. Duncan, Editor of the Richmond Christian Advocate, addressed the Conference, extending to them a cordial Christian greeting. The step they had taken would prove a redemption of Christianity from radicalism, and hoped that it might lead to the formation of a conservative Christian platform, free from all charges of sectionalism. He greeted the members of the Conference individually as members of the Methodist E. Church, South, and threw open the columns of his paper for their use and to advocate their welfare. Mr. D. adverted to his former pleasant pastoral relations in this city, also to the fact that there were those who disliked very much to see this union of the Baltimore Conference with the Church South. At the conclusion of Mr. Duncan's remarks, which were well received, the usual committee notices were given.

It was announced that Rev. Mr. Duncan would preach in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and Dr. Bond in the Baptist Church, that night at 7½ o'clock.

The bishop then pronounced the benediction and adjourned the Conference till the next morning at 9 o'clock.

HARRY'S SERMON.

"Eddy," said Harry, "let us go to church, and I'll be the minister, and preach you a sermon."

"Well," said Eddy, "and I'll be the people."

So Harry led him away, and they went up stairs together. He set an old fire screen in front of him, by way of a pulpit, and thus began his sermon:

"My text is a very short and easy one—"Be kind."

There are some texts in the Bible on purpose for little children, this is one of them. These are the heads of my sermon.:

Firstly. Be kind to papa, and don't make a noise when he has a headache. I don't believe you know what a headache is, but I do. I had one once, and I did'nt want to hear any person speak a single word.

Secondly. Be kind to mamma, and don't make her tell you to do a thing more than once. It is very tiresome to say, "It is time for you to go to bed," half a dozen times over.

Thirdly. Be kind to baby.

"You have leaved out, be kind to Harry," here interrupted little Eddie.

"Yes," said Harry, "I did'nt mean to mention my own name in my sermon. I was saying, Be kind to little Minnie, and let her have the red soldier to play with, when she wants it.

Fourthly. Be kind to Jane, and don't scratch and kick when she washes and dresses you.

Here Eddie looked a little ashamed, and said—"But she pulled my hair with the comb."

"People mustn't talk in meeting," said Harry.

Fifthly. Be kind to kitty. Do what will make her purr, and don't do what will make her cry.

"Isn't the sermon most done?" asked Eddie, "I want to sing," and without waiting for Harry to finish his discourse, or give out a hymn, he began to sing; and so Harry had to stop; but it was a very good sermon. Don't you think so?—Freedman's Journal.

Your Mother.—Speak kindly to your mother, and ever courteously, tenderly of her. But a little time, and you shall see her no more forever. Her eye is dim, her form is bent, and her shadow falls graveward. Others may love you when she has passed away—a kind-hearted sister, perhaps, or a kind-hearted brother; or one whom, of all the world, you choose for a partner, may love you fondly; but never again, while time is yours, shall the love of one be to you as that of your old trembling mother has been.

In agony she bore you; through puling, helpless infancy, her throbbing breast has been your safe protection and support; in your wayward childhood she bore patiently with your thoughtless rudeness, and nursed you through a legion of ills and maladies. Her hand it was that bathed your burning brow, or moistened your parched lips; her eye that lighted up the darkness of wasting nightly vigils, watching always in your fretful sleep. Oh, speak not her name lightly, for you cannot live so many years as would suffice to thank her fully. Speak gently, then, to your mother; and when you, too, shall be old, it shall in some degree lighten the remorse which shall be yours for other sins, to know, that never wantonly have you forgotten the respect due to your mother.

BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

Whatever motives may have urged this influential body of Ministers to affiliate with the M. E. Church South, it is evident that worldly ambition and love of ease did not enter into the calculation.—In their address they set forth truly enough—"The Church South has no material benefit to give us. They are, as we are, very poor. A partnership with them is a community of distress—a fellowship of suffering." While, on the other hand, by submitting to the Northern Methodist authorities * * * our churches would not only be secured to us, but exuberant bounty would repair them from the injuries of war, and fill them with everything necessary to worship, except the presence of the Lord."

After all the explanation which the press of Northern Methodism makes of this flank movement, that it was to be expected as the "logical result" of a position assumed during the war, the great fact remains—these men of God have turned away from offers which were something more than a logical result; and after time enough had elapsed to survey the whole ground, the "treasures in Egypt," on the one hand, and the "reproach of Christ" on the other, have deliberately "refused" the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The "Methodist" says—"The Sham Baltimore Conference ought to remain just where it is. To come to us in its present frame of mind, would be to bring weakness and discord. In what was once the border, the Church needs especially to be distinctly pronounced. The wave of loyalty and liberty must roll onward, not backward;" and with many other like reflections comforts itself.

If Northern Methodism finds real satisfaction in the determination of the Baltimore Conference to separate from its "ecclesiastical kindred," we can affirm that the M. E. Church South receives these noble brethren with the admiration and love with which Naomi heard the choice of Ruth—"Whither thou goest I will go: and where thou lodgest I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me and more also, if aught but death part me and thee." But we can readily believe it quite possible for a Church to avail itself of the plea of "loyalty and liberty," in order to fill its coffers, and enhance its political power; and, it may be, to carry on a course of systematic robbery under the very plausible pretext of "putting down the rebellion."

Here is a Conference, one of the oldest in the Methodism of this country, not with haste, but after long years of patient endurance, and constant trial of radical legislation, finds itself forced to choose between "a Politico-Ecclesiastical Confederation" and a Church "coming out of the wilderness, leaning only on Christ." The verdict of such men is worth something—"We believe that Christ's kingdom is not of this world. Evil and evil only can come from every ecclesiastical departure from this fundamental truth. We believe that from this truth, nevertheless, the Northern Church has gone away—the Southern Church has not." As a protest against Church secularization, the action and position of this Conference is only second to that sublime movement which gave birth to the Free Church of Scotland, and defines with distinctness and power the principle which determined the Southern Conferences, in 1844, to a separate organization. We are bound to regard this as a vital principle—one that will not die."—Our Revolutionary Fathers were careful to separate the interests of the Church and the State; and in so doing discovered a wisdom which has been generally recognized.—Certainly no feature of the Constitution is more marked, and none is watched by the people of this country with greater jealousy. This union of the Northern Methodist Church with the Radical Republican Party, by which bayonets are employed to "extrude congregations," fixes the animus and status of that Church, and will be remembered long after the storm of Fanaticism shall have blown over.

It is satisfactory to consider that we have suffered annoyance at a thousand points, churches seized, poor ignorant colored congregations plied, tempted, forced away, but that now, here we have a single compensation in ministers and members, which more than balances all that we have lost.

Those who have thought that the M. E. Church South must at last yield to the war of extermination avowed and waged against it, would do well to take counsel of these brave spirits; who, with such contempt of earthly ease, go forth from churches and parsonages, if it must be so, not to secular employments, but to the ministry of the word. These spiritual men have not so estimated our Church. They see in it spirit and life. Undeceived by the glory, activity, numbers, wealth, or power which seek their alliance, they turn to a Church, which, "amid the floods of the revolution," has "kept a burning coal upon the altar." They strengthen our hands.

PASTORAL ADDRESS OF THE BALTIMORE ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE M. E. CHURCH SOUTH.

The Baltimore Conference has proposed ecclesiastical union with the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and the proposal has been frankly accepted, so far as it could be, without the action of the General Conference of that great Methodist body. A Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, has presided over our Conference, and from him, as one of our acknowledged Superintendents, we have cheerfully taken our appointments.

An act so important would require long and detailed explanation to others; it needs little to you. You will see it in the logical conclusion of enforced circumstances, consistent conduct of honest men and spiritual fruit of Christ's religion. To you this change of relation will appear as it is, not the beginning but the ending of the new and unknown way by which God has been pleased to lead us away from the denomination of political and ecclesiastical confederations, to the liberty of church fellowship, the love of brethren and the conscience of those to whom He would make us messengers of salvation.

To the public, time would fail us to give the information which they should have. But many will inquire of you, and through you, we will put one argument to that common sense, which rarely fails in due time to ascertain and support the good and the true. We will ask men, who know men and the universal motives of human action, to try us by the infallible tests by which honor and right are commonly and certainly judged. The single argument for our sincerity, is, that all the world could give us, much that it has given us, solicited to a conduct opposite to that which we have chosen. By submitting to the Northern Methodist authorities we would have entered into as much rest, as can be enjoyed by the Demases, who forsake Jesus for the present world. Our churches would not only be secured to us, but exuberant bounty would repair them from the injuries of war, and fill them with everything necessary to worship—except the presence of the Lord. Our parsonages, from which the soldiers, led on by Methodist preachers, are extruding our wives and our little ones, would be made sure to us. Missionary money, ostensibly appropriated for the christianization of the South, would be the gracious reward for our conversion, and prostration before a Northern Bishop, would be accepted as full compensation for imputed hostility to the nation. For in a long absence and uncertain return of charity, it is loyalty to a Methodist Church that covers a multitude of sins. By union with the Northern church we save everything but honor—by going to the South we save nothing else.

A band of ministers, who for four years have dwelt in the very vortex of a great war, have come together for the first time. They bring a common contribution of sorrowful memories and alarming facts. All are poor; many so destitute that they have no means to reach their appointed fields of labor, except on foot. In other denominations old kindness has survived the shock of war. However violent have been the political attitudes of their ecclesiastical bodies, charity did not die; and from that greatest of the virtues their suffering brethren in the South are receiving cheerful and important aid. We, too, look across the blood-stained border to a denomination, the largest, the wealthiest, the most liberal in gifts. Their coffers are filled with millions. They are consciously and actively a great political power, to whose demands it is perilous for authority to demur. Of all other people we had most to expect from those who bear a common name, teach a common creed, and have formerly constituted with us one Christian family. In the sympathies of natural kindred it has become an adage, that "blood is thicker than water," and from men of the world we expect that the ties of love shall, in the time of trouble, prove stronger than the strife of opinion. That the children of God would exhibit at least equal charity, we might reasonably have expected. But there was no charity for us, who followed not them. On the contrary, our former brethren are our bitter and unpitying enemies. They indeed offer us their pottage; but for it they will have our birthright. Their love or hate, their beneficence or hostility, are determined by our reception or rejection of their ecclesiastical supremacy.

This demand for our subjection is not based upon any spiritual consideration. They are content that we shall remain here and preach as we now preach, and live as we now live, and guide as we now guide. It is not a conversion of mind or heart that they require, but a cession of territory. It is not as a part of Christ's Kingdom that they approach us; but as the M. E. Church in the United States. Because we will not determine our relations simply upon consideration of their desires, they have arrayed themselves and, as far as possible, the Government and nation against us, for a war avowedly of extermination. They take our churches by force, and instal their ministerial agents by file of soldiers. They imperiously order our families from their homes, and bring strangers to occupy them. They extrude congregations, and force them to comfortless rooms, and to the woods and fields. Money got from well meaning piety by fervid rhetoric and well administered taxation, ostensibly to send the Gospel to our people, is used to drive them away from the Gospel, and to gain only a barren conquest of buildings, at the expense of a demoralized ministry and an ignominious name. Only, of all ministers in the South, we find ourselves without sympathy from our ecclesiastical kindred.

On the other hand, the Church South has no material benefit to give us. They are, as we are, very poor. A partnership with them is a communion of distress, a fellowship of suffering. Now we ask men to explain our conduct, upon any other principles than those whose inspirations come from the things that are invisible and external. The reply, of course, will be that political sympathies determined us. But the accusation is false. The Methodist Episcopal Church South is, in this respect, a noble monument of Christian consistency. Neither her General Conference, nor her annual Conferences, nor her Bishops have presumed in the name of God to cheer on resistance to the Federal Union. Not one word of that Church has committed her as a party to a merely secular strife. It was her aim to hold up the Cross in the midst of the war of human passions—to keep a burning coal on the altar of God amidst the very floods of revolutionary deluge, and to exalt the crown of Christ the higher, as popular idols were lifted up. This we also, in our lot, ever essayed to do.

We believe that Christ's kingdom is not of this world. Evil and only evil has ever come from every ecclesiastical departure from this fundamental truth. We believe that from this truth, nevertheless, the Northern Church has gone away, the Southern Church has not. We believe that one is on the way to secularization, the other to spirituality and usefulness. We believe that one is expecting a mixed success from money and material force—the other comes out of the wilderness leaning only on Christ. And her eye is single. Men whose work is to know only Jesus, to preach only Jesus, to count all things but loss for his name, cannot hesitate which of the two proffered associations to accept. We have made our choice with unanimity, which of itself, is a demonstration of its propriety. And now we come to you. Will you receive us as before in your confidence and love? We are all coming. Scarcely a man has withdrawn to secular employment; a fact as surprising to us as to you. We are coming to take our wonted places as your preachers and pastors. Perhaps when you receive us, you must go away from the houses of God you have built, from the graveyards you have enclosed around your fondly remembered dead. You must give as you can of the little oil and few cakes that you have. Temporarily you will be poorer for your love of us. In all worldly respects you will find us anything but profitable. But we know you, and God knows both you and us. We solemnly and fearlessly appeal our cause to Him. With regard to temporal things, He shall think for us. We, by his help, will think only of things that minister to salvation. "We trust not," brethren, "in ourselves, but in God, which raiseth the dead, in whom we trust that He will yet deliver us, ye also helping together by prayer for us. For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and Godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world and more abundantly to you-ward. For we write you none other things than what ye read or acknowledge and we trust you shall acknowledge even unto the end. As also ye have acknowledged us that we are your rejoicing even as ye also are ours in the day of the Lord Jesus, and in this confidence we are minded to come to you." That you will receive us we know. That God will bless us, we believe. That we shall be instruments in his hands to spread Scriptural holiness over these lands is our only desire and our cheering anticipation. "And having this confidence," brethren, "we know that we shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith, that your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for us by our coming to you again." Only let your conversation be as it becometh the Gospel of Christ, that whether we come and see you, or else be absent, we may hear of your affairs that you stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel, and in nothing terrified by your adversaries, which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation and that of God. For unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe Him, but also to suffer for His sake, having the same conflict which ye saw in me and now hear to be in us.

Humble yourselves, therefore, under the mighty hand of God, that He may exalt you in due time, casting all your care upon Him for He careth for you. But the God of all grace who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus after that ye have suffered awhile, make you perfect, establish, strengthen, settle you. To Him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen.

Finally, brethren, we exhort you to study to be quiet, and to do your own business, abstaining from all controversy and strife, believing that "in quietness and confidence, shall be your strength." Maintain a steadfast adherence to the economy and usages of the church, as transmitted to us by our fathers, and embodied in our Book of Discipline.

Procure good and useful books for the instruction of yourselves and your families. Train your children carefully, by means of Sabbath Schools and otherwise, that in due time they become pillars in the temple of our God. Prayerfully study the ministry of the word. Withal make it matter of conscience to supply the wants of those preachers who are appointed to labor in your midst. We be brethren. Let the connectional principle be maintained. Thereby shall we mutually aid one another, and promote the interests of our common christianity.

Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight through Jesus Christ. To him be glory forever and ever. Amen.

Alexandria, Feb. 15, 1866.

Signed by order of, and in behalf of the Baltimore Conference.

A LETTER from Rev. N. H. Lee, of the Louisville Conference, says—"The prospects of the Methodist E. Church South within our part of Kentucky were never better than at present. We have had extensive revivals in many places. There seems to be a prevailing impression among the ministry and laiety that our Church is now entering upon a new era in her history. The main point is to observe the 'Old Landmarks,' and 'whereunto we have attained to walk by the same rules and mind the same things.'"

THE SAVIOUR AMONG HIS FRIENDS.

PART II.—MATT. XXVI.

"Might have been sold for three hundred pence and given to the poor," still lingers along the arches of God's house, and its oft-repeated echo disturbs the assembly of the saints.—"Waste somewhere—better to give to the poor, though even they are not always deserving—still I can see good in that way. Hospitals and poor houses I believe in, but not those distant and invisible fields of missionary toil."

Our gifts to Heaven are, alas! not often so large as to justify this watchful fear of waste. It was not intended that a man should always see the processes by which his charities are transmuted into heavenly treasure. It is better for us not to see, when we can believe. But there is a divine force in the very prodigality of love. A sense of joy and heaven ought to unlock the soul. A man should entertain his Saviour as the widow did the Prophet, if necessary, with the last handful of meal, and the last oil in the cruse. Mary herself must have poured upon the person of her Saviour a large part of her living—twice the value of that sum which Judas received as his price.

The prodigality of love is the economy of angels. But what costly oblations have the princes of our Israel made to the Church of our God? Answer, ye men of God who have annually wasted or reinvested incomes not unworthy the petty potentates of Europe; ye whose fortunes have suddenly gone up to heaven, like the smoke of a furnace. All that ye have saved out of the fire is, the gift upon the altar. Is there prodigality in our love, or is our love of a kind which has no prodigality in it! Has not the spirit of a rigid, earthly economy stamped itself upon the very structure of our Zion! O, if this hard casing might be broken, as the alabaster, in honor of the Saviour!

"Why troubleth ye the woman? for she hath wrought a good work upon me." All religion cannot be resolved into deeds of charity. Doing good to the poor is not the fountain of good. It comprehends the world's religion, but is not the sole good. There were two tables in the hands of Moses. What estimate, then, should be made of a love for God, which does not include a love for "our neighbor"—and what of a love for our neighbor, which is without a love for God—a love which recognizes a fellow-creature, but ignores the higher relation of the Creator.

To love God, to love his Son—this is religion. "If any man will love me, my Father will love him." This is the sufficient cause of the Revelation of the Son—a divine person, whom we could know and love. "Whom having not seen, ye love." The Person of Pure Love; that our hearts might fasten upon God, as well as our minds admire Him; that, as Mary, we might sit at his feet, or as John, lean upon his bosom. The object of all true faith is the Embodiment of Love—The Well Beloved. The deeds of religion are the deeds of love; as He for us, so we for others—"That ye love one another as I have loved you."

Religion is not merely self-denial, not merely a trust in God, but it is a life of love—"Faith which worketh by love." Love which is full of kindness, gentleness and thoughtful offices. It is not "the camel's hair" and the "leathern girdle," the meat of locusts and wild honey, but the amenities of the house of Simon—the Lord reclining among his friends, at once a Prince, a Saviour and a Friend. He himself is the soul of the fellowship of the saints.

It will not be the great deeds of life which at the last day will yield us satisfaction, but the kind ones. Who can think of that Tragic Hour, or see the Dead Christ, without thinking of the precious odor that still lingers on His head and on those bruised limbs; as we hear the rendering which the Saviour gave to it—the perfuming the dead—"She is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying." Though his mind was filled with the shadows of the coming sorrow, he by one sweet sentence has sent the story of this precious deed all over the world—"Wheresoever the Gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of as a memorial of her." Anxious as his friends were to anoint him after his death, they were disappointed. They came with the spices early in the morning, all prepared to render this last office to their departed Lord, but upon arriving at the sepulchre found him not. He had gone! It greatly added to their sorrow, to be thus defeated in the last offerings of affection. But He needed it not. Heaven had anticipated it all. Despite the Guard, the Descending Angel, the Earthquake of Life, the Powerful Ascent, He was not unanointed. Mary's love came "aforehand." He was "with the rich in His death"—rich in gifts, rich in love.

We believe not only in the "forgiveness of sins," but also in the "communion of saints." The House of the Church is full of this "odor of a sweet smell," this hallowed fragrance—"Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ"—"Salute every saint in Christ Jesus"—"Brethren, by love serve one another"—"The Lord give mercy to the house of Onesiphorus, for he hath refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain"—"The Elder unto the well-beloved Gaius." This open, self-forgetting, all generous love, "how good and how pleasant" it is! "It is like the precious ointment upon the head that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard; that went down to the skirts of his garments. As the dew of Hermon and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion; for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forever more."

WHAT IS A FANATIC?

The term Fanaticism has, of late years, become very familiar to our ears. We have seen and felt no little of its mischiefs. The thoughtful mind, acquainted with the sad perversions of human nature, and instructed in the history of the past, may well forebode future evils, arising from fanaticism, intenser and more desolating than any thing yet seen in the annals of this country. The question then, what is a Fanatic?—becomes quite important and profoundly interesting. And if it be found that a perversion of religious sentiment lies at the bottom of this type of character;—that a spurious and corrupt Christianity is the hatred in which its rancorous and malevolent passions are bred and matured, then a most emphatic warning is held out to us to hold the truth in righteousness; to maintain on our part, the simplicity and purity of Christian principle, untainted with elements which poison the whole mass, and turn God's most gracious gifts and highest blessings into unmitigated curses.

A fanatic is a religionist—"so called." He has a God; but instead of conceiving of Him as the bright centre of all excellence, as the Infinite Benignity and the Supreme Goodness, he shapes to himself a being in whom the malignant powers predominate. He began, perhaps, by being an enthusiast. His imagination was touched, not his conscience—not the genuine affections of his soul. This religion of the imagination was found too airy, too unsubstantial. It involved no commitment to the principles of universal rectitude, no true faith of a penitent heart in Christ as the atonement for sin, no peace with God, the result of justification, no vital love, the outgrowth of regeneration. As a not unnatural or uncommon consequence, the enthusiast, in the course of time, merged into the Fanatic. His spurious pietism sought energy and vitality from rancour. The cold illusions of the enthusiast become the warm impulses of malign passion. That place in the heart which true religion fills with love to God and man, has become occupied with hate—a relentless intolerance, a merciless bigotry.

The fanatic whose God is supposed to be possessed of malignity, easily brings himself round to the belief that men outside of his ecclesiastical pale or faction, or party, are cursed by God. His idea of the divine Justice is limited to a pertinent conception of divine favoritism to himself and his sect, and a gloomy vindictive power to punish outsiders. And particularly, if these outsiders are supposed to be connected with some wide-spread scheme, called "the sum of all villanies,"—if they are considered obnoxious to some sweeping charge of heresy—or what will do just as well, "disloyalty,"—why then he feels called on to curse them in the name of conscience and God;—his religion, "so called," finds a pleasurable enhancement in assuming the prerogative and hurtating the vindictiveness of his God. Nay, he recommends himself to his God by the intensity of his hate towards the supposed enemies of his God. They are to be eternally damned; so he prays,—as rumour says a certain Annual Conference of the North did during the late war—for the eternal destruction of Southern white men, women, and children.

This fanatical element takes, readily, the direction of inflamed political zeal. One of the most graphic of Macaulay's descriptions in his History of England, is his account of the dasturdly and perfidious assassinations of the McDonalds of Glencoe, by order of the Master of Stair. This Master of Stair was one of the first men of his time,—jurist, statesman, and scholar. But although there had been no feud between the Glencoe men and his family, and although he gained not a single pound by the act which has covered his name with infamy, yet he hated them with a hatred as fierce and implacable as if they had wasted his fields, burned his mansion, murdered his child in the cradle. The historian accounts for the case by supposing that he was actuated by an inordinate, unconscious, remorseless zeal for what seemed to him to be the interest of the State. This explanation, says Macaulay, may satisfy those who have not considered how large a proportion of the blackest crimes recorded in history is to be ascribed to ill-regulated public spirit. We daily see men, for their party, for their sect, for their country, for their favorite schemes of political and social reform, what they would not do to enrich or to revenge themselves. At a temptation directly addressed to our private cupidity or to our private ambition, whatever virtue we have takes the alarm. But, virtue itself may contribute to the fall of him who imagines that in his power, by violating some rule of morality, to confer an important benefit on a church, on a commonwealth, on mankind. He silences the remonstrances of conscience, and hardens himself against the most touching spectacles of misery, by repeating to himself that his intentions are pure, that his objects are noble, that he is doing a little evil for the sake of a great good. By degrees he comes altogether to forget the turpitude of the means in the excellence of the end, and readily perpetrates, without one internal struggle, acts which would shock a buccaneer.

Would you reason with the bloodred Fanatic? As soon might you stop the rush of a storm by a syllogism. Can you awaken compassion in his heart? Attempt rather to tame the ferocity of a tiger or wolf. He has brought himself to believe that he is doing God service, that he is saving the country; or he is helping his party in power for the highest interests of down-trodden humanity. In the arrogance of some such self-assured delusion, what in other men would be a sin, a crime, in him is highest virtue. The world is scarce a State in Europe, the soil of which has not drunk the blood of its best men massacred in the name of God; by men who thought themselves demi-gods in so doing. Is human nature, essentially, a more or less liable to illusion and perversion the 19th than in the 10th or 15th century?

When a religious communion becomes generally, the spirit of true piety, ceases to substitute in its place the fervors of fanatical, politico-ecclesiastical zeal, the very pulpits, instead of being the place of thunders for awakening and calling men to repentance, are filled with the din of political partisanship and triotism—of a certain sort—being the best passport to heaven. By precept and example the people are taught to hate certain classes of their fellow-citizens, all men, belongs to the absolute reign of an antiquated Gospel. Look at the Fanatic in the pulpit! He is a man not with the spirit of grace and love, but with the oil of vitriol. His heart is touched, not with a live coal from the altar, but from the hell of hatred that burns in his own bosom. He an ambassador for Christ! Christ was the impersonation of Infinite Love. This man possesses the every-day kindness and charity of even fallen humanity. Fanaticism put its virus into every fibre of his being, every drop of his blood. His creed is damnation, not salvation. If not a fiend, he is at least as venomous as the worst. Fit tool of the devil; select instrument of perdition; he is set for the fall and rise of those over whom he wields a pernicious influence. When he dies his epitaph for his tombstone will be "it were better for this man that he had never been born."

We were startled the other day in reading over one of the Chapters of "Wesley and Methodism," to read the following passage:—"If the Wesleys started on their way—let us not only with the same evangelic zeal, but also by the modern political zeal that zeal would quickly have given in their own bosoms to a turbulent and in time that followed toward the end of Wesley's course, every Wesleyan congregation throughout England would have been a club, fraternizing with the France." Alas for our country at present day!

THE ADDRESS OF REV. DR. SHALL, on Sabbath evening, at Odd Fellows' Hall, in behalf of Ladies' Aid Society of R[illegible] was varied, affluent, original and suggestive. He interested every one in the audience, by some means or maybe never all the same way. We like a speaker who runs like a mountain stream, direct, though roughly, smoothly, sometimes, part for the boys, some windings for the young people, some deep pool for the reflective angler, but ever flowing on, and gaining the open sea. The vitality of manner refreshing to the eye. Many a veteran in the war of the States, men who have been maimed, wounded for life, and who have in the past four years received substantial sympathy and aid through the exertions of the Society will rise up and call him blessed.

JACKSON CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE have received a prospectus of a paper to be published under the above title; it to be edited by the Rev. Wm. Price.

WOMAN'S ASPIRATIONS UNREALIZED.

Barbarism is to be ameliorated by the remonstrances of those who live amongt it, if at all. The hideous practices of a part of the American people in a distant Territory are being energetically assailed by a daily newspaper printed at the capital of the abomination, the Salt Lake City Vedette, from which we extract:

There is much in the doctrine of Mormonism that is abhorrent to the noblest and most sacred feelings of the more intelligent, especially of the young ladies connected with the Mormon families, revolting to their native sentiment of refinement and to the beautiful and tender ideals of homes and domestic life that the pure-minded instinctively cherish. In every virtuous young woman's heart, if not swept by the blighting influence of false teachings and mistaken views of duty and of life, there is a deep and sacred yearning after companionship, and in that companionship a fullness, devotion and entireness of affection and sympathy; a yearning implanted by God himself, to be cherished as a means of elevation, and which is sweetly satiated only when the Divine law of her being is obeyed, but to which Mormonism, with all its pompous pretensions and lofty claims, presents a dreary blank; nay, to which it opens up a Gethsemane of unutterable anguish, a scene of continuous crucifixion with the wormwood and gall of many slights and many neglects. In those tender moments in woman's history when so much of beautiful and solemn truth mingles with the creations of fancy, when the future is star-crowned with pleasant hopes, when woman's nature in its virtues asserts the laws whose obedience constitutes the sum of domestic felicity and, guides the young to happiness; it is the hoarded wealth of one faithful heart that is coveted. In the ideal of womanhood, when reflecting what God would have her be, and her divinely inspired affections and sympathies have qualified her to become, it is no manhood, radiant with the diadem of many virtues, and glowing with the enkindled divinity of all the affections that fills and hallows the scene of her anticipations, the Eden of her delight. But in Mormonism—material, heartless, loathsome, sneering at sentiment—she finds no promises, no hope of realization for the heaven-sanctioned cravings and aspirations of her nature. Instead of a companion and friend in her husband to constitute, with herself alone, the regal pair, with oneness of aim, of interest and affection, Mormonism presents to her a lord, a master, a tyrant, the beggarly tithe of a man whose affections are divided, withered, cursed.

VISIT OF THE EMPEROR OF BRAZIL TO THE MONITOR MONADNOCK.—A Rio Janeiro letter, of January 1st to the New York Herald, says:

The visit of the Emperor to the monitor Monadnock took place to day. At 11 o'clock his Imperial Majesty's yacht arrived nearly alongside, towing a rowboat, into which his Majesty and suite entered, and thence transferred themselves to the Monadnock.

On the imperial party entering the small boat, the vessels of war and the forts belched forth a salute. It is unnecessary to state that in this the American war vessels had the lion's share. His Majesty was accompanied by his son-in-law, the Conde d'Eu, and his officers of State and of his household. He was received by Commodore Rodgers and Lieut. Com. Bunce, commanding the Monadnock—the yards of the several vessels of war in the port being manned.

His Majesty passed around the vessel on deck, followed by his suite and courtiers. After this, his Majesty inspected the interior of the two turrets, and listened with much attention to the explanation given him in regard to the system of pointing the guns. The turrets were made to revolve, and two guns were fired therefrom, in illustration of the explanations made. It may be observed that the charge of powder was only fifteen pounds, while the full charge is sixty pounds.

After exploring the mysteries of the engine-room and lower deeps, the Imperial party partook of refreshments in the cabin of Captain Bunce, when sentiments of respect between the two Nations were interchanged. His Majesty and attendants left under another salvo of artillery, after a pleasant visit of about two hours. His Majesty expressed himself highly satisfied with his visit.

HOW THE FENIAN CONVICTS ARE TREATED.—A letter from Dublin to the New York Herald says:

When O'Donovan and his five companions were taken from the Mountjoy Penitentiary in this city, where they had been confined since their conviction, for transmission to Kingstown, and there to be put aboard a steamer for conveyance to England, they were honored by an escort of a troop of dragoons the whole of the way; but they were chained three and three to each other. They had chains on their ankles and around their waists, and iron wristlets.

These badges and symbols of degradation, together with the gray convict dress, skullcaps, shaven heads and faces, gave them a most lamentable appearance; and if these poor men had considered the penalty of treason, they would never have joined the movement. Recently—Monday week last—ten more of the prisoners were sent away to Pentonville. These proceeded by train to Kingstown, in charge of policemen, and were not chained, but merely handcuffed together. At Kingstown, they were put on board a mail steamer, in charge of a convict guard from the Royal George man-of-war, and steamed for Holyhead, at which port they were transferred to armed warders, who escorted them to prison.

STILL OTHER STATES.—New Mexico, Colorado and Nebraska will shortly be applying for admission into the Union as States at the same time, and as, in all probability, their applications will be granted, they will augment the number of States to thirty-nine. Of these three new States, New Mexico is by far the most populous; indeed, almost as much so as the other two combined. In the year 1860 the census gave it 93,516 inhabitants, an increase of 5194 per cent. in ten years. At this rate of progress, New Mexico would have in 1870 a population of 141,357. Of the aggregate returned for 1860, the census gives as the number of Indians only 10,507, all the rest being set down as whites, except eighty-five colored persons. These whites are mostly of Spanish race, the American immigration having thus far made but little impression on the Territory. As a consequence, the institutions, language, religion and customs are all Mexican, this being the only organization of that kind in the Union.

California, Florida and Texas, all of Spanish colonization originally, have been overwhelmed by the great influx of Americans, so that they have few traces of the old element. Louisiana also had been a foreign colony before coming into our hands. But New Mexico alone remains with the old Spanish language, customs and institutions predominant. It contains some of the oldest settlements in the United States, and is believed to be very rich in mineral resources, though, as yet, these treasures lie neglected. Railroads and navigation must infuse into the Territory a new spirit, and start it forward in the career of improvement. But both are as yet distant.—Louisville Journal, 23d ult.

☞ In Peru, South America, rain is unknown. The coast of Peru is within the region of perpetual southeast trade winds, and though the Peruvian shores are on the verge of the South Sea boiler, yet it never rains there. The reason is plain. The southeast trade winds on the Atlantic Ocean first strike the water on the coast of Africa. Travelling to the northwest they blow obliquely across the ocean until they reach the coast of Brazil. By this time they are heavily laden with vapor, which they continue to bear along across the continent, depositing it as they go, and supplying with it the sources of the Rio de la Plata and the southern tributaries of the Amazon. Finally they reach the snow capped Andes, and here is wrung from them the last particle of moisture that a very low temperature can extract. Reaching the summits of that range, they now tumble down as cool and dry winds on the Pacific slopes beyond. Meeting with no evaporating surface, and no temperature colder than that to which they were subjected on the mountain tops, they reach the ocean before they become charged with fresh vapor, and before, therefore, they have any which the Peruvian climate can extract. Thus we see how the top of the Andes become the reservoir from which are supplied the rivers of Chili and Peru.

THE TEMPER OF THE SOUTH.

Never, since the surrender of the Southern armies, have the people of the South had such cause to feel the long forgotten charm of cheerfulness as they have to-day. Never have they had less cause to be dissatisfied with that result. The calm, conscientious and dispassionate message of the President in returning to the Senate, in which it originated, the "bill to establish a bureau for the relief of freedmen and refugees, and for other purposes," is conceived in such a spirit of catholic patriotism, and embodies such cogent reasoning and unanswerable logic, with such elevated devotion to the country at large, that we may well take courage to repeat the almost forgotten maxim, "Nil desperandum de Republico."

When such a paper emanates from the Executive of the Republic, it brings us back again to the better days of its history, and we poor, disfranchised and discarded outcasts from a once common patrimony may find comfort in the hope that we, even we, may "have a country now." It is not the jubilant outburst of a sectional triumph which finds a voice in our congratulation, but it is the advent of that long deferred, but ever hoped for time, when some tangible evidence should be given that the days of domineering despotism were ended, and that the Republic was once more, indeed, entering upon its career of freedom, glory and prosperity. It has come. We may now indulge the belief that the gloomy days are over.

> "Now is the winter of our discontent
> Made glorious summer—"

And the people of the South, throwing aside the lethargy and supineness which has well-nigh disqualified them for all activity, may take heart again, and enter upon the cultivation of their fertile fields, and the development of their mighty resources, and put their houses in order to assume the character, the dignity and the honors which belong to American citizens. They may now begin to indulge the anticipation of a glorious future, and renew their hopes of coming prosperity. Thank God, the Union may now, indeed, be reunited, and we may once more claim a part of the glory and renown which were bequeathed by the founders of a common country. It is no part of our purpose to bespatter Andrew Johnson with the treacherous tribute of partisan applause.

We are not his partisan, and his own declaration announcing his intention to retire from public life at the expiration of his present term, has removed him from the arena as well as the influence of mere party organization, even if we belonged to any such. But the same manly spirit which has ever inspired the people of the South, and which led them into revolution against overwhelming odds, will now cause them to rally to the support of the man who can forget his own personal grievances in the noble spirit of patriotic devotion to principle, and unflagging determination to perpetuate the Union as the Constitution made it. By every means at their command they will hasten to uphold his hands, and by every effort in their power they will sustain him in his undertaking.

There is needed, to secure the coming of the new era which the President is endeavoring to inaugurate, only that the conservative masses at the North shall follow their example, and bury mutual animosities in one grand uprising to put down faction, discord and fanaticism, no matter where they may exist. We have faith in the belief that it will be done. The President will find, in the returned soldiers of the Union, such coadjutors as will give him unconquerable strength. They have witnessed the fortitude and high bearing of our people even in their darkest disasters, and they have witnessed the heroism of our soldiers in their fiercest conflicts.

They will not now hesitate to sustain a measure which will make allies of their late adversaries and friends of former foes. It is impossible to repress the reflection that the exhibition of such a spirit as the President has manifested, will do more to reunite in feeling, interest and affiliation the long separated sections than anything else he could have done. If such a spirit had been manifested when Virginia sent her Commissioners to Washington, in 1861, the Old Dominion never would have passed her ordinance of secession, and the last five years of conflict would have passed in peace without the drawing of a single sword.

The lonely prisoner, "in his stony cell at Fortress Monroe," would never have left his seat in the Senate if his appeals had been heard in this spirit; and alas! the fertile fields of Virginia would never have been deluged with blood and devastated. But the five years we have passed are only a speck of time in the long ages through which this Republic is destined to endure; and if the sacrifices of each section shall bring about a better understanding and more fraternal feelings, the experience will not be valueless.—Richmond Enquirer.

THE FIELD IS INVITING.

There are, at this time, many Englishmen and Northerners already in the South availing themselves of the rare advantages presented by this country for the investment of capital. Many more are coming. We are glad to know that this is so. Never, in the historic annals of any country, were such inducements offered. There are plenty of such investments here which would enable a practical farmer to double his money the first year; and this, too, without the risk of loss. Lands are cheaper now than they ever will be again. The tendency of the price of cotton lands in this country is upward, and this is necessarily so for the reason that they are now sold for a mere song. There are many large bodies of fertile land offered for sale for a little more than the actual cost of stock and improvements on the place. This cannot last. Lands in this country possess a real, tangible and intrinsic value, and will, ere long, command something like their worth in money. Capitalists who wish to invest in cotton and sugar lands have golden a opportunity, which will pass away as soon as the present pressure is removed from the shoulders of our impoverished people.

We are truly glad to notice that there is almost a universal disposition among the intelligent portion of our population, to encourage the practical tiller of the soil to make investments among us. Our people realize their condition, and know full well that their true policy is to welcome practical agriculturalists and practical mechanics and capitalists to our shores. We can dispense with Yankee lawyers, doctors, preachers and school-marms; but we are prepared to welcome the sterling worth and thrift of the North and other climes.

The field is large and inviting. The soil is endowed with a teeming and inexhaustible fecundity. We need capital and increase in our population. The Southern people invite emigration.—Mississippi Standard.

SOCIETY AT RICHMOND.—The Norfolk Old Dominion contains a letter from Richmond, from which we copy the following:

There is scarcely a Northern gentleman in Richmond who is not liked by the old residents here, and their residence among us is to our pecuniary advantage. Daily the social intercourse between the newcomers and the old residents becomes more and more easy and pleasant, and both parties learn to know and respect each other. As to the military officers here, they do not seek to go outside of their duty, and your correspondent thus far has heard nothing but praise of them.

The only institution of the Government here which the people cannot look upon with favor is the Freedmen's Bureau—for, as it is now called, "House and Lot, Farm, Clothing, Ration, Fuel and Piano Negro Furnishing Bureau." There are too many reasons why this institution is unpopular, and why it will long remain so. I am not aware that its officers do more or less than their duty—but they have a hard and thankless task to perform, and get more curses than caresses.

But I have strayed away from the purpose of this letter, which was to speak of the second ball given by the United States army officers, on Friday night, and which was quite as successful as the preceding one at the Ballard House. This ball was given at the Spottswood, and was very brilliant. The guests numbered some two hundred and fifty, of whom fully one-half were ladies. Among the latter were some of the most elegant ladies of this city and Petersburg, and the papers here give glowing accounts of their respective toilettes. Among the gentlemen present, were all the military officers, Gov. Pierpont, Dr. Robinson of your city, and many other members of the Legislature, and a number of our prominent private citizens.

LABOR SYSTEM.

The labor system in the South is now attracting more attention than any other subject. The results of this year's experience will determine, in a great measure, the fate of the negro race. That they may do well is the hope of every true-hearted man. The Southern people are not responsible for the abolition of slavery, but they are willing to do all in their power to improve the condition of the negro race. Their pretended friends are the very ones who are most anxious to make money or political capital out of the negro, regardless of his highest interests. The Southern people are willing to give their employees better wages and require of them less work than are Northern capitalists. The negroes will find out in course of time who are their true friends.

We regret to say that there is a disposition to plant cotton this year, to the neglect of the necessaries of life. There is danger that there will be suffering in the South, next year, on account of the scarcity of the necessary articles of subsistence. It appears from a recent report of a committee of the Alabama Legislature, that there are now in that State 12,540 destitute families, numbering 52,921 persons. There are doubtless a like number, in Mississippi, and other Southern States, and if the policy which the Southern planters seem now inclined to adopt, (that is, planting cotton to the exclusion of other articles,) be carried into effect, there is danger that the destitution will be increased rather than diminished. It is a matter of doubt with some intelligent Southern men, whether the cotton raised in the South this year will be more than sufficient to purchase the necessaries which the South will have to buy, and which, under a wiser and different system, might be produced at home. Why, let us ask, should we be so anxious to raise a large crop of cotton, and thereby reduce its price, and then buy our breadstuffs at enormous prices? Will we never learn, even by sad experience, the folly of attempting to raise cotton to the exclusion of the necessary articles of subsistence? We have no doubt that many who are attempting to raise large crops of cotton will most signally fail. They do not seem to think that it is much more difficult to produce cotton now than formerly. Cotton must be planted at the proper time, worked and well worked at the proper time, and then after the crop is made it must be gathered at the proper time. A failure at any time in the requisite labor will lose the crop. Not so with corn and other articles of that kind. It requires less labor to make grain crops and they are much more easily gathered than cotton. It would, therefore, be well if our Southern planters and farmers would first raise all the supplies needful for their farms and then raise as much cotton as they can for market. Let our cotton be surplus. This is the sure policy and will tend to make our people more contented and more prosperous. There is a considerable deficiency of labor in all parts of the South. What has become of the negroes we cannot say. Scarcely any landowner has as many laborers as he wants. They are paying very fine wages to their hands, and we learn that the negroes are generally working well, where they have made contracts. Many fine plantations are now even uncultivated for want of the necessary labor. Hardly one-half of the land is cultivated. The high price of cotton and corn will cause the land to command high prices, for it is a self-evident proposition that as the amount of cotton is decreased, the price will be increased, so as to make up the deficiency.—Memphis Avalanche, 1st instant.

EXEMPTION LAW.

AN ACT IN RELATION TO EXEMPTION FROM STATE, PARISH AND CITY TAXES, FOR THE YEARS 1862, 1863, 1864 AND 1865, IN CERTAIN CASES.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana, in General Assembly convened, That where lands, houses, or any real estate whatever, situated in any parish, town or city in this State, shall have been taken possession of by the civil or military authorities of the United States, without the consent of the owner thereof, during the years 1862, 1863, 1864 and 1865, no State, parish, municipal or city taxes for said years shall be collected, nor the payment thereof enforced by the State, parish, municipal, corporation or city, where the same are situated, for or on account of said lands, houses or real estate, for the period during which the owner was dispossessed or deprived of the use and control of the same, and the said lands, houses and real estate so taken possession of, shall, for the period aforesaid, be exempt from the payment of said taxes: Provided, the owner has received no compensation for the use of his property: And provided further, that where the deprivation of the use of the said lands, houses and real estate shall not have continued for a longer period than three months, during any one year, such owner shall not for such year be entitled to the benefits of this act: And provided further, that any owner of such lands, houses and real estate, embraced within the provisions of this act, who may have paid his taxes prior to its passage, shall be refunded the taxes so paid by him by the State, parish or city, with costs and interests, as the case may be, on due proof thereof, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Auditor and Treasurer, so far as State taxes are concerned, and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the parish, municipal or city authorities, so far as parish, municipal or city taxes are concerned, and in case the parish, municipal or city authorities shall fail, for the period of four months after the passage of this act, to prescribe regulations, then such owner shall be authorized to offer his receipt for such taxes as an offset against any future State, parish or city taxes, upon making oath before any Justice of the Peace stating the facts of the case under oath, and that he has received no compensation for the use of said property. And if any person shall make any false statement under this act under oath, he shall be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury as prescribed by law, and this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

A STRONG AND STRIKING LETTER FROM ROBERT J. WALKER.

At a great Conservative meeting held in New York on the anniversary of the birth of Washington, last Thursday evening, the following letter was read, from the Hon. R. J. Walker, one of the most influential Union men during the war:

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 22, 1866.

Simeon Draper, Esq.—Detained from the great Union meeting by circumstances beyond my control, I must address it telegraphically, and not as I did after the fall of Sumter. President Johnson's veto opens the new campaign in favor of the Union. It arrests the overthrow of the States and the concentration of all power in one consolidated military despotism. It prevents the expulsion of eleven States from the Union, and the erection of eleven Irelands within its limits, to be controlled and oppressed by military power. It prevents the quartering of a large standing army and hosts of officials in the South, with an enormous increase of our debt, to be followed surely by oppressive taxation or dishonoring and disgraceful repudiation. It prevents the defeat of the plans of the Secretary of the Treasury for the funding and reduction of the public debt, and a safe and gradual return to specie payments. Repudiation is disgrace and ruin, and the probable extinction of Republican institutions throughout the world.

This result, or large standing armies and oppressive taxation, caused by the policy of the President's opponents, would produce an earthquake convulsion. It would quadruple the exercise and income tax; blight every field; become every vessel; break every bank and railroad, and ruin every factory in the country. It dissolves the Union, destroys the Constitution, and erects a military despotism upon its ruins. It would postpone perhaps indefinitely, the transfer of the command of the commerce and exchanges of the world from Europe to America. European despots would exult, while the friends of freedom in the old world, and especially in Ireland and Germany, would weep tears of blood. Johnson is walking in the footsteps of Jackson and Lincoln, and touching their sentiment. The Union shall be preserved. The prolonged government of eleven States as conquered provinces, enforcing taxation without representation, would permanently alienate the South from the North. It might drive them to madness and despair, and renew the civil war when our credit and resources were exhausted. We have emancipated, through a great Constitutional amendment, carried only by Johnson's policy, four millions of negroes.

Let us not attempt to enslave eight millions of our erring white brethren of the South. They will all welcome death before such a state as this. I have fought all my life against secession and disunion in the South, and I renew the contest against it in the North. Congress has no constitutional power to dissolve the Union; and to condemn eleven States to territorial pupilage is a dissolution of the Union. I cannot go with Northern or Southern disunionists. Johnson's policy alone can practically restore the Union. It has already crushed the heresy of secession at the South, and it alone has secured a constitutional majority for the abolition of slavery. If the heresy of secession is crushed at the South, and emancipation secured, the crowning glory rests upon the head of Andrew Johnson. Slavery and secession—our only discordant elements—being thus extirpated, the Johnsonian policy will go on conquering and to conquer, not by the sword, but by wisdom and magnanimity. It will subdue at the South passions and prejudices; it will touch their hearts and conquer their affections.

We shall hear no more of exceptional and individual acts of insubordination, for we shall have a Union of interest and affection; a Union of States with States, and not with conquered provinces. We shall have a Union and representation of all the States as ordained by the Constitution. We shall have a cordial, fraternal, an ever-expanding, an omnipotent, an indissoluble and perpetual Union. Men of the South, from Virginia to Texas, close up the ranks, and fight harder to get into the Union than you ever did to get out of it. You fought us as under the secession flag with unsurpassed courage and endurance to get out of the Union. Come now, our erring but much loved brethren of the South, and reassemble with us again at the political family altar at Washington. Come with loyal hearts under the flag of our sires and to the music of the Union, and we will give you a cordial welcome. Come, and the recording angel will blot out, with reconciliating tears, the memory of human follies and frailties. The people on whom Johnson has always relied are with him, and will welcome back all loyal Unionists to seats in both Houses of Congress.

R. J. WALKER.

THE GREAT BURNING WELL.—We have published an account of the great burning well, on the eastern bank of the Allegheny river, about twenty miles from the town of Franklin. The following farther particulars, from a Pennsylvania paper, will be found highly interesting:

As you approach the region of the well, the country becomes rough and romantic in the extreme. High hills and abrupt precipices are covered and overhung by immense masses of detached rock, that seem scattered at random on the hill-tops and on the sides of the acclivities. If the glacial theory of Agassiz be correct, then the icebergs that were anchored here were thickly laden with mighty boulders from the North. Be this as it may, the rocky masses are lying here in wonderful confusion.

Before you approach near enough to the well to see the flames, your eyes are saluted with the roaring sound similar to that which Ross Brown describes as peculiar to the Geysers in Iceland. It seems to be due chiefly to the rush of gas from the depths below, but may be in part from the flame itself as it rises high in the air.

Like most great curiosities, this well suffers from surrounding circumstances. There is no good object near with which it may be compared as to height. Added to this, the hills all around it are from six hundred to a thousand feet in height, affording as a back ground rocks and shrubs and stunted trees, that tend to diminish its effect on the eye and imagination.

The well was of course bored for oil. It had reached a depth of some five hundred feet, when the column of gas, that must be immense, rushed up and became ignited from the furnace of the engine. Soon, of course, the derrick, engine-house and fixtures were consumed, and the engine itself a wreck. The top of the conductor which emerges from the pit, being of wood, was burned off, when an attempt was made to fill up the pit with earth and extinguish the flames. This proved a failure, as the pressure of the gas was too great to be easily filled up.

As it is seen at present, the gas rushes through the loose earth in a thousand jets, and the result is that a column of flame constantly emerges from the pit equal to its size, which is, perhaps, eight feet square. This column rises to a height of from fifty to one hundred feet, varying every few seconds from the minimum to the maximum height. The pillar is not regular in form, but rough and jagged. Sometimes it is divided, and sends its tongues of flame out in every direction. As it reaches its greatest height, the top of the flame leaps off and is extinguished. This is the appearance in daylight. At night, and surrounded by darkness, its appearance must be awfully grand and imposing.

I am inclined to think that there is some oil mingled with the product of the well, inasmuch as every three or four seconds a cloud of dark smoke rolls up with the flames, and is swept to its very summit, when it disappears.

Some visitors compute the height at one hundred and fifty feet. This is probably correct at some periods, as the day I visited it the air was damp and unfavorable to its reaching its greatest height.

The roaring sound is constant, and almost resembles the sound of distant thunder. The climate in the neighborhood is very mild and summer-like. The buds on the shrubs are expanding, and the grass is green and fresh as in April, while the very ice on the river has melted and disappeared.

The well has been burning about three weeks, with no apparent diminution in its power, or in the quantity of gas, so that at present it bids fair to afford light to the people for some time to come.

Although the fire is surrounded on all sides by hills of such lofty proportions, yet at night the light is seen at a great distance. At Franklin it lights up the Southern horizon with a bright, tremulous glow.

This light assumed a very strange appearance one evening last week. It was somewhat cloudy, and in addition to the usual ruddy glow, the light appeared to concentrate itself into a bright lance-like figure about four or five degrees in length, that remained stationary about midway between the horizon and the zenith, where it continued till the evening.

OUR RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.—The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger telegraphs as follows: "Reports are afloat intimating that our dispatches to the French Government have recently taken a more decided turn, and that there is a possibility that the present good feeling may receive an unexpected jar. The cause assigned for this rumored change of tone is said to be the tenor of the January dispatches of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, which are scarcely up to the expectations of the Government. I do not vouch for the correctness of these rumors, but give them as I hear them. One thing is certain, the news we had yesterday from Mexico, with reference to the slaughtering of French officers and troops, is not such as will warrant Maximilian in fixing a very early 'epoch' for the withdrawal of his French supporters, for if he is to experience many such attacks, he will require all the force he at present has to make the situation at all comfortable."

MR. DAVIS.—Gen. Early, writing to the New York News, from the city of Mexico, under date of Jan. 10, 1866, says:

In a ride from the State of Virginia through the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas and Texas, I did not find a solitary good man or woman who did not express the deepest sympathy and profoundest respect for Mr. Davis, and it may be assumed as certain that wherever any pretended Confederate, at home or abroad, is found denouncing him, that man has either done nothing for the cause himself or has been a positive injury to it.

President Davis, during the long and severe struggle which he sustained by the energy and integrity of his character, may have committed errors of judgment as to men and measures—not to have done so would have required him to be more than human—but when the history of that struggle is fairly and truly written, all men will be compelled to yield him credit for the loftiest patriotism.

At present, he is suffering obloquy and imprisonment for the cause of his countrymen, and he is entitled to and receives the sympathies of all the good and true among them.

BEFORE THE RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

The Wilmington (N. C.) Daily Dispatch gives the following notice of one of the recusant sons of the old North State:

The Rev. Col. James Sinclair—late a minister of the gospel—Chaplain of the 5th North Carolina State Troops, Colonel of the 35th Regiment, Southern slanderer, semi-detective for Federal officials, emissary, or, rather, agent (with a fat salary of course) for a Pennsylvania Abolition Society, to operate in this section, would-be editor of a paper to be entitled the "Freedman," and, finally, a nobody, has been recently summoned before the "Reconstruction Committee," we suppose, at his own suggestion, for the purpose of rendering his testimony as to his opinion concerning the conduct and character of Southern gentlemen.

This unprincipled man, surely, is not known in Washington City as well as he is here. As our cotemporary of the Fayetteville News very properly remarks, his testimony before the committee may be "in our favor, and will be, if his interest is here, rather than at the North."

In justice to the good people of Robeson county, in which this man resides, it is but right to say that he not only has no influence—no followers of his shameful course—but that, on the contrary, all feel that disgust for him he deserves. All this feeling is indulged in to a greater or less extent even by the colored people whose friend and benefactor he professes to be. They know, however, who are reliable, and they know that the belligerent (?) Parson (?) Ins't.

If the chairman of the committee doesn't find this out before the Rev. Colonel finishes testifying, he isn't as smart as a large number of our friends and acquaintances who have not been on the Committee on Reconstruction.

Gen. Robert E. Lee testified before this committee a few days since. James Sinclair will, in a few days—or maybe he has already. From the sublime to the ridiculous.

LABORS OF THE PRESIDENT.

President Johnson is a leading member of the working class, and it may be doubted if any mechanic or any laborer more fairly earns his bread by the sweat of his brow and brains. Were it not for the relief of two Cabinet days in the week—Tuesdays and Fridays—when none but the heads of departments are granted an interview, no physical constitution, however strong, could endure the exhausting labor he performs. The Washington Star gives the following interesting sketch of the daily life and work of the President of the United States:

"There is no office of the Government so burdened with responsibility and anxiety, and no man living required to listen to such an endless recital of private griefs, as unsophisticated visitors pour into the President's ear at every public interview. President Johnson has few equals in industry. He rises at six, and until breakfast, at half-past seven, looks over the newspapers.

"Immediately after breakfast he goes to the Executive departments and commences the labors of the day. First there are bundles of letters to be read and the replies dictated to the secretaries. Applications for the appointments, promotions, discharges from the army and navy, political advice, petitions for the executive clemency and innumerable other subjects to be disposed of; but before half completed the visitors have commenced to flock into the ante rooms and thrust their cards upon him. Pardon seekers swarm on every hand. Former owners of confiscated property pace up and down before the door of the President's room, and females, with indescribable effrontery, insist upon immediate admittance.

"After the most important business in the morning has been disposed of, the visitors are admitted one by one, and the President submits himself to the artesian process. This lasts till about half-past one or two, sometimes three o'clock, when the doors of his apartment are thrown open and the whole crowd admitted. At such times Col. Johnson, son of the President, the Private Secretary, stands near the President and takes memoranda, as dictated by him, on the cases of visitors who succeed one another with subjects for executive action, like the dense throng at the office window.

"The President's manner at such times is always pleasant, and gives confidence to the most timid. His decisions are quick, and each individual who lays his case before the President learns in a half-a-dozen courteous words the final decision. When all have been listened to, and the walls are once more empty, the President turns again to papers on his table, until four o'clock, the hour for dinner. After dining he returns to his office, and there generally remains until a late hour, seldom retiring before eleven o'clock.

"In addition to all these duties it must be remembered that there are distinguished visitors constantly presenting themselves. Representatives of foreign Courts, Governors, Senators, Generals, and hundreds of lesser magnitude must be received, each having some important subject requiring care and deliberation, while above all towers the great and ever present problem of reconstruction. Cabinet days and the Sabbath afford three days of rest from the petty and exhausting annoyances that beset the President; but at no time he is free from the oppressive weights of National difficulties, which now, more than ever before, obscure the future."

FUNERAL OF GEN. STEPHEN ELLIOTT.—The funeral services over the remains of the young, brave and gifted son of South Carolina, Gen. Stephen Elliott, were performed at St. Michael's Church yesterday morning. The Church was filled by a large and sorrowing congregation of all classes of our citizens and denominations, who came to pay the last and tribute of respect to one so universally loved while living and unspeakably lamented in his death. Many of the seats were occupied by well-known brother officers of the deceased, and men whom he commanded and who shared his perils. Rev. P. T. Keith read the burial service of the Episcopal Church in a most solemn and impressive manner, and when he pronounced the words "dust to dust, ashes to ashes," the congregation, hitherto silent, were visibly affected, many of them to tears. During the morning many of the stores and offices were closed in respect to the memory of the deceased. The United States Quartermaster having kindly offered transportation on the Government steamer, the remains have been taken to Beaufort, to be interred in the family burial ground at that place.—Chas. Courier.

OUDITIES OF GREAT MEN.—The greatest men are often affected by the most trivial circumstances, which have no apparent connection with the effects they produce. An old gentleman of whom we know something, felt secure against the cramp when he placed his shoes, on going to bed, so that the right shoe was on the left of the left shoe, and the toe of the right next to the heel of the left. If he did not bring the right shoo round the other side in that way, he was liable to the cramp.

Dr. Johnson used always, in going up Bolt Court, to put one foot upon each stone of the pavement; if he failed, he felt certain the day would be unlucky. Buffon, the celebrated naturalist, never wrote but in full dress. Dr. Routh, of Oxford, studied in full canonicals. A celebrated preacher of the last century could never make a sermon with his garters on. A great German scholar writes with his braces off. Reisig, the German critic, wrote his commentaries on Sophocles with a pot of porter by his side.

HIDDEN TREASURES.—In the "green room," in Dresden, where for centuries the Saxon princes have gathered their gems and treasures until they have become worth millions of dollars, may be seen a silver egg, a present to one of the Saxon queens, which, when you touch a spring, opens and reveals a golden yolk. Within this is hid a chicken, whose wing being pressed, also flies open, disclosing a splendid golden crown, studded with jewels. Nor is this all: another secret spring being touched, hidden in the centre is found a magnificent diamond ring.

So it is with every truth and promise of God's word—a treasure within a treasure. The more we examine it the richer it becomes. But, how many neglect to touch the springs!—American Messenger.

☞ Mr. Barth, printer, of Breslau, celebrated in 1854 the 350th anniversary of the first book printed in his establishment. This book is a German legend of some rank, and appeared in 1504. Mr. Barth's printing office is the oldest in Europe, and has been for 350 years uninterruptedly in the hands of his ancestors and himself.

ELOQUENT PROTEST AGAINST MILITARY LAW IN TIME OF PEACE.

A court martial has been sitting in Charleston for some weeks, engaged in the trial of Francis G. Stowers, a citizen, charged with the murder of three Federal soldiers on the 8th of October last. The Charleston Courier publishes the speech of the Hon. Armistead Burt, one of the counsel for the accused, delivered in his defence on the 23d ult.:

I will not dissemble by attempting to conceal the concern and embarrassment which I feel on this occasion, and which depress me in the presence of this court. The anomalous character of the court, its methods of taking testimony, and its forms of procedure trammel and embarrass me. I feel a painful consciousness that I stand in the presence of a military court, organized for the administration of martial law—a court whose members are strangers alike to the witnesses, the accused and his counsel—a court the most of whose members were born and trained to the profession of arms, men in authority, "having soldiers under them." The whole paraphernalia of the court are exciting and embarrassing. Instead of the scales of justice I see displayed before me the sword; Instead of the emblems of peace, I see before me and around me heavy harness and the gleaming weapons of war. Instead of a hall dedicated to justice, I find myself standing in a military camp, hundreds of miles from the scene of the alleged crime and from the home of the accused, and that camp filled with the stern, strong men of war. I cannot shut out the consciousness—would to God there was nothing to force upon me the unbidden and unwelcome conviction that this fearful trial, by the mandate of the conqueror, is held in a conquered country and a captive city. I wish I could forget that I humbly trust this court may forget that the victims of the impated murder were soldiers of the army of the conqueror, wearing his uniform, bearing his arms and following his flag.

Whilst I feel the most undeigned and profound respect for this Court, and for every member of the Court, whilst I have an unaffected confidence in their purity, justice and magnanimity, I hope to be pardoned for craving, with all the earnestness of my nature, instead of that glorious old institution, the noblest of all civil institutions, that institution which is not more justly the boast of all Englishmen than of all Americans, the safeguard of human life, and the palladium of personal liberty, the trial by jury as it is known to the common law of England and the Constitution of the United States. If there be any case in which the trial by jury, always of inestimable value to the rights of the accused, and to the cause of truth and justice, is especially appropriate and indispensable, the nature and the circumstances of this case define it to be one of that character. The chief and striking excellence of this trial consists in the knowledge of the parties, and their witnesses by the jury, and in their peculiar and admirable aptness and fitness to determine to credibility of witness, and to elicit truth from conflicting testimony. They are familiar with the habits, customs and usages of the community in which they live; they are concerned to hold up the majesty of the law by the punishment of crime, and their verdict is the voice of reason, responding calmly, but firmly to evidence. I find additional cause of regret that this time honored trial by good men and true of the vicinage—the peers of the accused—is denied to him, in the fact, that peace and order reign throughout this country, the Courts are open, law is enforced, and justice administered in every District of the State—in the city in which this uncongenial Military Commission with all its military appliances and surroundings now sits to administer a novel and unfamiliar law—a law which derives its existence not from the Constitution, but a law which finds its origin and its definition in the mere will of military power.

Mayor Warner, shot by negro troops on the [illegible] of the [illegible] disturbance at Memphis, died from the effect of his wound on Wednesday, the 21st. It will be remembered that this gentleman was in no way connected in the difficulty, and was maliciously and wantonly fired upon while passing the quarters occupied by the colored troops. The Enquirer of the 22d thus alludes to the character of the deceased.—Memphis Constitutionalist.

Major Warner came to this city several years ago, to take charge of the Confederate Naval Iron Works, and by his deportment won for himself the respect and affection, not only of the numerous class whose operations he directed, but of the whole community with whom he associated. He was a true gentleman, and an honest and honorable man—faithful and competent in every position, and exemplary in all the relations of life. He leaves a bereaved family, consisting of his widow and several interesting children, who have the heartfelt sympathy of this community in this their hour of trial and affliction and loss.

We have seen a specimen of quartz rock, stained with the oxide of iron, that contains a large amount of gold. This is said by gold miners to be one of the richest specimens of gold bearing quartz they have ever seen. This was found in the neighborhood of the foundry, and is supposed to have been dug up while sinking a well a few years since.

This is not the only gold that has been found in that vicinity. Where Cunningham & Co., were digging a well at their flouring mill, a few years since, a vein of gold bearing quartz was struck, and a negro saved several penny-weights of the precious metal, but it failed to attract the attention of parties able to make a full examination and search. A thorough test will now probably soon be made. If there is an abundance like the specimen before us, a thousand dollars to the hand, per day, would not be an unreasonable yield.—Rome Courier, 24th.

The following dispatch announces the demise of a good and great man:

MILLEDGEVILLE, Feb. 27, 1866.—Gen. Jno. K. Jackson died at 2 o'clock this morning; expect to reach Augusta Thursday morning with remains. W. S. JONES.

A few days since, as the ferryboat was crossing the river at Columbus, Ga., the ferryman lost his hold upon the rope and the boat floated down over the falls below. The passengers were rescued by some boys who had skiffs conveniently by; but the horse and carriage were swept over the falls. Strange to say, the horse was not killed.—New Era.

There are 43,497 freed negroes fed at the expense of the Government in Georgia alone. In all the Southern States, the number exceeds 434,000.

☞ The Richmond Republic beautifully says there never was a more gallant, a more generous, a more high-minded people than the fallen young men of the Confederate armies. They were most of them the very flower of the sunny land. Reared in the lap of comfort and ease; educated in moral and, often, religious principles; trained from childhood to a high sense of personal honor; they were the idols of happy homes, and bade fair to be pillars and ornaments of society. Perhaps there was no army which ever took the field, of the same numbers, in which could be found so many young men of intelligence, of moral worth and social position. To think that three hundred thousand young men are sleeping in bloody graves; that the multitude of homes, of which they were the light and life, are dark and desolate; that society and their country are despoiled forever of such a galaxy of worth and brightness. Of all the losses which the South has suffered, there is none like the loss of these glorious dead. Other damages may be repaired; fields that have been devastated will grow green again; cities which have been burned down will rise from their ruins, more prosperously and stately than before; trade and commerce will recover from their temporary paralysis, and pour their vivifying tides over the land; but the dead come back no more. No more will their bright, ingenious faces gladden the eyes of kindred and friends, or animate the hearts of the old with the assurance that those who are about to take their places in society and the world will be worthy inheritors of the traditional virtues and renown of their ancestry.

The children of to-day, who will be the men of to-morrow, are, in all the peculiar virtues of the Southern character, the counterparts of those who have fallen on the battle-field. If they are permitted to grow up to manhood in peace, and to take the places in active life of those who have fallen on the field, the loss of valuable lives which the State has suffered in the present generation may be repaired. We propose to politicians to show their appreciation of the dead by mercy to the living. We invoke them to pursue a course that will spare the youths now approaching manhood to their homes and their country. Instead of distilling the poison of discontent into their young minds, and preparing the way for a future war, let them assist in burying the past in the waves of oblivion; in cultivating conciliatory and friendly dispositions, and in inspiring the young with the sentiments of nationality and patriotism.

INTERESTING EXPERIMENT.—The famous experiment of Perkins, in cutting hard steel by a disc of soft iron, was, not long since, repeated in the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia. The disc used was steel, similar to those from which small circular saws are made, but annealed so as to be very soft. This was mounted on a steel spindle furnished with a three-inch driving wheel, and the whole was carefully balanced. The driving-wheel was connected by a belt with a thirty-six inch wheel, on the shaft of which was a ten-inch wheel, communicating with a forty-eight-inch wheel driven by the engine. The engine running at 120 turns per minute, the result of the combination was that the soft steel disc revolved at a speed of 5000 to 6000 turns per minute. At this velocity the hardest files were cut into like wood, a shower of sparks and a blaze of light being given off during the operation, but the edge of the disc did now show any signs of injury.

GOLD MINING IN MONTGOMERY COUNTY, MARYLAND.—The gold bearing quartz in the vicinity of the Great Falls of the Potomac, about fourteen miles from Washington city, is beginning to attract considerable attention, and one company sunk a shaft some months since at a locality about two miles this side of the falls, near the line of the Washington Aqueduct, where the surface indications promised a good yield of the precious metal. This stock company, of which Mr. Griffiths (formerly of the Quartermaster General's Office, but now a resident of Philadelphia) is president, seems to have entered on the work in earnest, judging from the extensive preparations now making. A large quantity of heavy machinery for crushing, washing and amalgamating the quartz has arrived in this city from Philadelphia by railroad, and is now being hauled to the mine. Gold has been discovered on the farms of Messrs. Griffith, Richard Jackson, Gustavus White, and others, all within a mile or two of the falls, on the Maryland side. Property in the vicinity is rapidly changing hands at advanced prices, and parties are now prospecting on the Virginia side of the river; but we have heard of no discoveries south of the Potomac so far. It is urged with some show of reason that the strata from which the gold is obtained is a continuation of the like formation in Virginia and North Carolina, which has proved so remunerative in those States.

A NEWSPAPER.—It was Bishop Horne's own opinion that there was no better moralist than the newspaper. He says:

The follies, vices, and consequent miseries of multitudes, displayed in newspapers, are so many beacons continually burning to turn others from the rock on which they have been shipwrecked. What more powerful dissuasive from suspicion, jealousy, and anger, than the story of one friend murdered by another in a duel? What caution more likely to be effective against gambling and prodigacy, than the mournful relation of an execution, or the fate of a desparing suicide? What finer lecture on the necessity of economy, than the auction of estates, houses, and furniture? Only take a newspaper, and consider it well, pay for it, and it will instruct thee."

☞ The San Francisco Alta says that the cod fisheries of the North Pacific have already assumed such importance as to warrant the conclusion that they are to be ranked among the prominent sources of national wealth hereafter.

THE CONDITION OF MEXICO.

By a late correspondence from the city of Mexico, we are given an impartial statement of the existing condition of Mexico:

The Imperial Government occupies, either entirely or partially, all the States into which Mexico is divided, and exercises its power in nearly all of them. But it cannot be said that the Government of the Empire rules in peace, inasmuch as many of the States contain hostile forces more or less numerous. These forces are called guerrillas, as none of them deserve the name of an army, or even of a division. It is not true, however, that they are all bandits, as some of the Imperialists term them. There are some who uphold their cause in good faith, and reflect honor upon it.

The forces never offer battle to the Imperial troops, but surprise small detachments and badly guarded points whenever they can do so without any great risk, and then make off to their inaccessible retreats with their spoils.

The complete pacification of the country must of necessity take a long while, and it will be the work of time rather than the result of deeds of arms. The financial question is one that causes the Imperial Government considerable anxiety, and the friends of the Empire are alarmed seeing that the amount of the two loans already raised in France has been spent; that there is no hope of raising the third, and that no resources of any other character have been created to cover the expenditure for the coming fiscal year, which is estimated at thirty millions of dollars. There everybody knows that public opinion in the United States is hostile to the Emperor of Mexico, and that the Americans cannot endure the existence of a monarchy on their borders.

These men thoroughly understand the displeasure of the American people at the sight of the French flag in Mexico. For this reason general satisfaction was felt upon learning the rumors of an agreement between the United States and France with a view to the withdrawal of the French upon the condition that the Government at Washington should recognize the Empire, or at least take no action against it. Mexico looks to the United States as the quarter from whence her ruin or her happiness must come. The American Republic is like the old Roman Republic, whose friendship was sought by kings and nations, who thus either lived or disappeared in accordance with the decision of the capitol.

The withdrawal of the French will gratify the whole world, and the Emperor Maximilian will be the first to rejoice at it, for he well knows that he cannot be a sovereign in the full sense of the title until the French leave. With his natural independence of character, he is by no means pleased to have a French rod hold over him, and he has shown, on more than one occasion, how galling the protectorate is to him.

TREASURY AGENTS.

In a late political lecture at Brooklyn, Mr. Henry Ward Beecher had the following to say about Treasury Agents:

"I should be sorry to see any more Government agents spreading out through the land. If the President would call home every Treasury agent that is disgracing the North, and the Government, and humanity, and alienating the South, I for one should be glad. Here and there are no doubt men that stand above bribery and suspicion of corruption, noble men and true; but all through the South, taking them comprehensively, they are as locusts eating up the land. They are predatory nuisances, and degrade the North, from which they come, and the Government under which they serve." The reverend lecturer then concluded with an eloquent appeal for the restoration of peace between North and South, and for a Union connected not only by right and might, but also by mutual brotherhood and love.

Mr. Beecher never uttered truer words than these. These agents, (with only a few honorable exceptions,) with their armies of spies, informers and detectives, have been a horrid nightmare upon the breasts of this people since they laid down their arms, and have done more to breed distrust of the integrity of the Government, and alienation from it, than all other causes combined.

The government of the bayonet—martial law—is a hard thing to be borne by men and women borne and bred in an atmosphere of freedom. The Freedmen's Bureau could not but be greatly distasteful to a people in these trying circumstances of the South. But neither, nor both of them together, have produced disgust and distrust in a degree comparable to that wrought by the cotton agency. Just imagine a man sitting in his office in Mobile or New Orleans, and after all the "so-called" Government cotton had been fairly collected, dispatching his spies to every nook and corner of the interior to nose out imaginary Government cotton, his olfactories stimulated by a contract to give him one-fourth of the game he should nag. Backed by military power—at least so the unhappy cotton owners feel and believe—these spies go out with the power as well as the spirit of piratical cruisers. With a roving commission, they are not over nice in their requirement of evidence. A word of suspicion, a breath from an enemy, is enough to induce a seizure of any man's cotton, and the best and largest lots are in the greatest danger. Once seized, the planter never gets a release except at the expense of a fourth or a half. He is fortunate if he does not lose the whole. Nobody believes that the Government derives a dollar of the profit from the transaction. In truth, we doubt if the whole cotton collecting business has not been a losing one, pecuniarily, to the Government. We hazarded the opinion, a month after it was established, that it wouldn't pay expenses, and we believe the winding up will sustain the prejudgment. But had it placed millions in the public coffers, they never could have compensated a wise and just Government for the flood gates of demoralization and corruption which this wretched system has opened upon the land. Cotton stealing got to be a mania under the influence of its teachings and practices. It was stolen by boat loads and plantation lots by big thieves, and by locks and pounds rifled from the bales by little boys, white and black. For a time, the Mayor's Court of the city was thronged by negroes, who lived by picking from bales on the wharves and in the warehouses. The very guards, civil or military, set to watch cotton, caught the infection, and every finger and palm in the land seemed to itch to handle the fleecy staple. Cotton stealing became a fashion, inaugurated by the system itself, and immensely aggravated by the abuses of its agents and their paid spies and detectives. If, to-day, President Johnson were to leave it to us to say which grievance we would first have removed from the South—martial law, the Freedmen's Bureau, or the Cotton Bureau—we should hold up both hands in favor of the latter.—Mobile Adv. and Reg., 7th inst.

FROM WASHINGTON.—It is rumored that two Southerners, Mr. Reverdy Johnson and Senator Cowan, of Pennsylvania, will have seats in the President's soon-to-be-organized Cabinet. Mr. Seward, of course, will retain the Premiership.

There need be no fears that the Freedmen's Bureau bill will be passed by the Senate in any other shape. It is known that five of the thirty Senators who voted against sustaining the veto would have voted with the Democrats, if their votes had been necessary to sustain the veto. The principles embodied in the bill are killed, and they can never be revived or moulded into laws by the present Congress.

The Radicals like this veto so well that they are preparing for another. The negro suffrage bill, passed by the House sometime ago, has been reported in the Senate without amendment, and the Radicals intend to urge its immediate passage. The Radicals may pass as many bills of this kind as they please, but the President will veto them as fast as they are laid before him.

At the instigation of the Radicals, the flags on the negro school houses were draped in crape, as the symbol of mourning over the defeat of the Freedmen's Bureau bill—a piece of impertinent malice that none but the meanest negro-worshipers would ever have been guilty of.

A PERILOUS ADVENTURE.—On Saturday last David Stewart and son, while hunting about five miles northeast of Uniontown, Pa., found a huge bear in a very snug retreat in the mountain rocks. Mr. Stewart, with reckless boldness, crawled twice into the mouth of its den and shot it each time with a single-barreled pistol. After the second shot the bear came out and ran about a half a mile and fell, when it was secured by Mr. Stewart. It was supposed to weigh about 350 pounds.

DR. BARNES AND THE SOUTH.

The following extract from a discourse which Rev. Albert Barnes, D. D., of Philadelphia, delivered to his people on last Thanksgiving day, is so truthful and so timely, that it deserves wide publicity—especially in consideration of the source from which it comes:

I hesitate not to say that, on the whole, the conduct of the South in the feelings evinced on the termination of the conflict has been such as to demand the confidence of the North and to secure the admiration of mankind. The surrender of armed forces was so complete and entire; the cessation of hostilities was so immediate and universal; the acknowledgment that they had been overcome was so prompt, frank and manly; the readiness to return to the Union has been so general and apparently so sincere; the recognition of the fact that slavery is extinct forever has been so wisely admitted as a fact, and as are the consequences involved and as is the change in their habits; the readiness to come under the arrangements for collecting the revenue has been so prompt; the disposition to resume commercial intercourse with the great cities of the North has been so marked; and the willingness to come into the great arrangements of the Nation for perpetrating freedom has been so general that we see in this, I think, the return of the feelings of the best days of the Republic. There are exceptions—individual—but there has never been a civil war closed where there was less lingering animosity, or more willingness to unite again under the same Government. Can we forget, when we think of what is in the Southern bosom still, that long-cherished opinions, feelings and customs do not soon change among a people? Can we forget how long after the wars of the "Roses," and after the civil wars that resulted in the establishment of the "Commonwealth" in England on the cessation of the forms of war, the feelings that had been engendered lingered in the bosoms of Englishmen? Can we forget how long after the revolution, the banishment of James, and the accession of William and Mary, love for the "Pretender" lingered in the hearts of a portion of that nation? how firm was the conviction that he was the rightful heir to the crown? how strong the hope that he would yet come to the throne? Shall we blame our Southern brethren if some similar feelings linger in their bosoms?"

INHUMAN TREATMENT OF A SERVANT GIRL.

A short time ago, at Sherborne, Frederick Thomas Gumb and Anna Maria Gumb, his wife, were charged before the county magistrates with having neglected to supply proper food to Emily Fox, a servant, whereby her life was endangered. They were further charged with violently assaulting her. The case excited considerable interest, and the court was crowded. Mr. E. Gulson, Poor-law Commissioner, watched the case on behalf of the Poor-law Board. Mr. Watts, of Yeovil, defended the prisoners. Emily Fox, who was first sworn, presented a ghastly appearance. Her face was much disfigured, and she appeared almost a skeleton. She had to be supported by the nurse the whole time of the inquiry. She deposed that she left the Sherborne Union eighteen months since to live as servant with Mr. and Mrs. Gumb. She was 14 years of age last October. She looked after the children, and sometimes did a little washing. From the first she had to live on cold cabbage and potatoes, which were cooked in sufficient quantity to last three or four days; and other times she had water broth—bread soaked in water—given her. For dinner she had cold cabbage and potatoes, and now and then meat for dinner. She was, she said, made to sleep in a room up stairs, on a straw mattress, without any blanket, even in winter, and only a sheet and counterpane. The potatoes and cabbage given to her were never washed before being cooked. Witness then stated that she had frequently been beaten by her mistress with a ground ash stick. She was once stricken by her across the face, and afterwards her mistress said that she had broken the bridge of her nose. She had struck her in the mouth and loosened her teeth; and on one occasion, after knocking her down, she kicked her in the face. On one occasion, while she was trying to carry a boiler to Mr. Willmott's, Mrs. Gumb struck her with a stick across the left ear. Her ear was cut, and her mistress sewed it up with a needle and cotton, causing her great pain. She had often struck her on the head, and one night broke her head open with a stick, and then put on a piece of white sticking-plaster. Witness never complained to any one, and never went into the town alone; but she once or twice told Mr. Gumb that she had not enough food; and during the whole time she never went to church or chapel. She received blows and kicks at different times from her mistress, who sometimes struck her when Mr. Gumb was at home, and he grumbled at her for doing so. Dr. Highmore attended her about three months since her sickness. Mr. and Mrs. Gumb generally had fried bacon for breakfast, and meat and vegetables for dinner. Mr. Coran, member of the Sherborne Union, was examined, and gave evidence strongly confirmatory of the statement of the poor girl as to the ill-treatment she had received and the shocking condition she was in when brought back to the Union. On Christmas eve Mrs. Gumb called at the Union and said that Fox was coming back, as her husband would not allow her to stay another night in the house. When she came back he could not recognize her: her face was covered with bruises. Dr. Williams, medical officer of the Union, deposed to being called to attend Emily Fox on Christmas eve, and minutely described the deplorable state in which he found her; she was speechless, pulseless and as cold as death; she was also unable to swallow, and could only with difficulty be revived by stimulants. He made entries of the case, calling the attention of the Board of Guardians to it, and detailing the bodily injuries the girl had received. She had been under treatment ever since, and was now gaining flesh. Elizabeth Fowler, the nurse, was examined: She stated that there were bruises all over the body of the girl. Mrs. Watts reserved his defence, and the prisoners were committed for trial at the assizes. Bail in £400 was accepted.—London Telegraph.

SINGULAR ACCIDENT.—During the severe storm on Wednesday last, a gentleman and lady residing in the vicinity of Decatur, on their way home from a visit to the West, mistaking the smooth surface of Clear Lake for a prairie, drove into it with a pair of horses attached to a wagon. The old ice, which had settled with the receding of the water, lay several feet below the new ice which had formed upon the water over the old ice. The horses soon broke through the new ice and found a footing on the old ice, which gradually shelved downwards towards the centre of the lake. Before they were able to retrieve the mistake, the horses reached a depth of water reaching to the lady's waist as she stood up in the wagon. The gentleman being unable to turn his horses, and in doing so slid under the newly formed ice, and after almost superhuman efforts broke through it, and finally succeeded in reaching the Lake House, so much exhausted as to be unable to speak, but after about fifteen minutes was able to make known the perilous situation of his wife. Several persons immediately repaired to the lake, but during the absence of the gentleman the horses had become detached from the wagon and were drowned. The lady, after remaining in the carriage for near two hours, with water reaching to her waist, was finally rescued and taken to the Lake House, and by kind treatment soon recovered from the effects of her dangerous and terrible exposure.—Springfield Journal.

THE SMALL POX.—This terrible disease has made its appearance in our town—in fact it is also in two or three localities in the country around. So far we have heard of no fatal cases, but presume there will be no lack of such if the disease become general among the freedmen, as it bids fair to do. Two white families in town have it, and one on Grand river; how many of our colored population have it we cannot say, but believe it originated among them, and is scattered about town and country. These miserable creatures, not having old master's hospital to go to, no friends to help them—not even the Freedmen's Bureau, and they will not help each other, through their naturally useless habits, are fast disappearing before the ravages of this direful malady.—Plaquemine South, 3d.

PROCLAMATION OF QUARANTINE.

VERY STRICT AND HAS IMMEDIATE EFFECT.

CIVIL AND MILITARY ORDERS.

The following important order has been promulgated. Danger was apprehended from the infected West India Islands, but this regulation does away with all cause for alarm:

HEADQUARTERS DEP'T OF LOUISIANA,
NEW ORLEANS, LA., March 7, 1866.

General Orders, No. 21.

1. Under instructions from the Headquarters of the Armies of the United States, to establish, in connection with the proper civil authorities, "a rigid quarantine upon all travel with the West India Islands" the proclamation of His Excellency, the Governor of Louisiana, is published herewith, and the following directions are given for the information and government of the officers of this command:

1. The Quarantine will take effect at once, and will apply to all vessels, cargoes and passengers coming directly or indirectly from a port of any one of the West India Islands, or of the adjacent coasts of Mexico or Central America.

2. The duration of the Quarantine will not be less than ten days, and may be for such longer period as may be considered necessary by the Board of Health; and neither vessels, cargoes, nor passengers will be permitted to leave the station at which they are quarantined and proceed into the interior until permitted by the health officers at such stations.

3. This Quarantine will be applied and made effective upon all rivers, canals, bayous, inlets, or other water approaches from the Gulf, and upon all rail, and common roads, or other communications, leading from the coast into the interior of the State.

4. It is made the duty of all officers stationed at or in the vicinity of any quarantine station now, or that may hereafter be, established, to take such measures as may be necessary to give prompt and complete effect to the quarantine or health regulations that have been or may be prescribed.

5. If there should be an insufficiency of hospital accommodations at any quarantine station, the Quartermaster's and Medical Departments will make arrangements for supplying the deficiency by tents and hospital equipage.

II. The Commanding Officers of all Military Posts will enforce an efficient sanitary police within their respective commands, and in cities and towns where troops may be stationed, the Commanding Officers, in connection with the civil authorities, will adopt proper sanitary measures, and cause them to be efficiently carried out.

By order of Maj. Gen. E. R. S. CANBY.
WICKHAM HOFFMAN,
Actiag Assistant Adjutant General.

Proclamation of Quarantine on all Vessels arriving from the West India Islands and the adjacent coasts of Mexico and Central America.

The places which are hereby declared infected, as aforesaid, are the following: Havana, Matanzas, Trinidad, Cardenas, St. Iago, and all other ports in the Island of Cuba; Kingston, Port Royal, Montego Bay, and all other ports in the Island of Jamaica; Jacmel, Port au Prince, and all other ports in the Island of Hayti; the Islands of Trinidad, St. Thomas, Martinique, Guadaloupe, Antigua, Barbadoes, all West India Islands, and the adjacent coasts of Mexico and Central America.

Given under my hand and seal of State, at the city of New Orleans, this seventh day of March, A. D. 1866, and of the Independence of the United States the ninetieth.

SMALL-POX—AN ANTIDOTE AND CURE.

As small-pox is becoming epidemic in many parts of the country, the press should assist in extending the subjoined recommendation. The fly-trap and pitcher plant grows abundantly, and can be found extensively in South Carolina. It can be used as a tincture or in decoction, as is suggested below. It can also be obtained at all drug stores. If we have really an antidote to this dreadful scourge and loathsome disease in an innocent plant, which grows all around us, there is no better time than the present to establish its efficacy, and extend its usefulness:

To the Editor of the Evening Mail,
London, England:

Sir—* * Some time ago, seeing a paper written by Assistant Surgeon Miles, of the Royal Artillery, on the efficacy of the North American plant called the saracenia purpurea, or pitcher plant, in the treatment of small-pox among the Indians, my colleague (Mr. Agnis) and myself have given this remedy—which has been imported into this country by Dr. Miles—a fair trial, and I am happy to say the eleven cases in our hands have recovered under its peculiar influence. This remedy I consider a boon to the public, for this reason: It is so easily managed—any person can make a decoction or infusion of the root like tea.

An ounce of the root is sliced, and infused in a quart of water, and allowed to simmer down to a pint, and given in two tablespoonful doses every four hours, while the patient is well nourished with beef tea and arrow-root. Four of the cases in my hospital have been severe confluent cases; ("confluent" means where the head, face and neck are swollen into a misshapen mass, and the pustules thickly running into each other.) They have, throughout the disease, all been perfectly sensible, have been free from pain, and have never felt weak. The effect of this medicine, which I have carefully watched, seemed to arrest the development of the pustules, killing, as it were, the virus from within, thereby changing the character of the disease, and doing away with the cause of pitting, (if I may so express myself to the unlitiated,) and thus avoiding the necessity of gutta-percha and India-rubber applications, or of opening the pustules. In my opinion, all anticipations of disfigurement from pitting may now be calmed, if this medicine is given from the commencement of the disease.

Before leaving this subject, I may here caution the public that the useful part of the plant is its root, as recommended by Dr. Miles. With the usual kindness of Dr. Gibson, the Director General, I have been amply supplied with it for the use of my regiment. So much am I impressed with the efficacy of it in small-pox, over the old mode of treatment, that I hope to hear of it in every country gentleman's medicine chest, and before long, that we shall see no more faces, as described by Dickens, like the interior surface of sliced muffins.

I am, sirs, yours respectfully,
COSMO G. LOGIE,

THE FRENCH SENATE ON THE MEXICAN QUESTION.—We find in a telegram to the London Times the following passage in the reply of the French Senate to the Emperor's address. It will be noticed that it speaks in very respectful but unmistakably energetic language as to the course of France in Mexico, which course is to be that only dictated by her views, interest and dignity:

Your Majesty informs us that the memorable expedition to Mexico approaches its termination. This is announcing to satisfied France that the protection of her commerce is assured in a vast and wealthy market now restored to security. As regards the United States, if, from misconception, the presence of the French flag in America appeared to them less opportune than at a previous and most illustrious period of their history, the firm tone of the communications made by your Majesty's Government has demonstrated that haughty and menacing language will not decide us to withdraw. France is accustomed to move only at her time, but she nevertheless wishes to remember the ancient friendship between herself and the United States. What your Majesty asked of the United States is neutrality and observance of international law.

DREADFUL OCCURRENCE IN BALTIMORE.—The Baltimore Sun says:

One of the most dreadful calamities that has occurred in this city for many years took place at an early hour on Saturday morning. The three-story building on the north-west corner of Fayette and Ann streets was the scene of the heartrending spectacle. The third story was occupied by Mr. Henry Hanna, Sr., and was divided into three apartments, in which were sleeping, at the time of the accident, Mr. Hanna, his son Henry and his wife and infant, and two sisters of Mrs. Hanna, named Anna and Lina Highland, aged 18 and 10 years, residents of Frostburg, Washington county, who only a few days previous had arrived in the city on a visit to their sister. These parties on the third story all met an untimely end by burning or suffocation, though one of them, the younger Hanna, was taken from the building alive, but having been horribly burned, lingered in intense agony until an early hour yesterday morning, when death put an end to his sufferings.

The fire and suffocation were occasioned by a box containing matter for the manufacture of fire works.

A LITTLE BOY LOCKED IN A TRUNK.—An accident of a novel character happened a few days since to a little boy, four years old, son of one of our citizens, which should be a warning to children who play hide and seek. Three or four children, white and black, were playing "hide" in a room where there was a large empty trunk. The top fell down, and, having a spring lock, caught the little fellow fast and tight. The children got frightened and gave the alarm. Both mother and father were absent. A negro woman, who displayed great presence of mind, on hearing the fact got an axe and burst the trunk open. The little boy was rescued in a suffocated state. A minute's more confinement would have caused his death.—Milledgsville (Ga.) Union.

CHARLESTON.—We are gratified to observe indications of the rebuilding of the burnt district. In several places laborers are employed removing the brick and rubbish, preparatory to laying the foundation for stores and dwellings. The rebuilding of the burnt district is inseparably allied with the future prosperity of Charleston. We have looked upon ruin long enough. It is time to change the view. Within the past three months over one hundred buildings have sprung up on a single street in Richmond. Earnestness and wisdom is exhibited in that enterprise we must admit. Well, why can we not have the same thing here? We can if we choose. There is nothing to prevent it if the property holders are in favor of the movement. So long as these men refuse themselves to build and will not sell the land to others who would build, just so long shall we be in a cloud.—Charleston Courier.

A FABLE.—Two swans and a turtle wanted to migrate from a water-tank, but the turtle said he did not know how to go. So the swans told him to take hold of a stick with his mouth, and they would carry him between them; but they charged him not to talk on the way. As they were flying with him over a village, the people saw them, and laughed. The turtle hearing the noise, forgot the charge, and asked what it was; whereupon having opened his mouth to talk, down he dropped, and was killed.

So it will be with all who do not mind good advice.

RAFFLING OFF A BABY.—The Dubuque (Iowa) Express says that a woman recently came to the Minnesota House in Duuleith, with a young child, and after stopping a day or two, suddenly left minus the baby, and did not return. The landlord happened to go over to Dubuque, and mentioned the circumstance to a couple of friends, married but childless; one of them proposed to adopt the little one as his own. The other immediately made the same proposition, when a dispute arose as to which of the would-be parents should have the infantile waif.

Finally an appeal was made to the dice-box. Quite a number of people gathered around the table, interested spectators of the singular contest, and the winner, named Kelser, was greeted with a shout of applause. The child is a pretty girl three weeks old, and her new found parents are brimming over with happiness.

FEES OF A PARIS PHYSICIAN.—A Paris letter says that when the inventory of Dr. Joubert de Lamballe's property was taken, the inventory maker found an immense box filled with a multitude of little paper packets, each containing the fees offered the celebrated surgeon by his office patients; the sums of money contributed varied from 20f. to 100f. It took two days to unfold them; they contained 7000 silver franc pieces and $50,000 in gold; there were, besides, $50,000 in bank notes, and $200,000 in French Three's. No kindred of Dr. Lamballe have been discovered, except some very distant relations—poor creatures who earn hardly their daily bread as journeymen bricklayers. "We heap up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them."

THE LAST THING THAT DIES IN MAN.—Hope is the last thing that dies in man; and though it be exceedingly deceitful, yet it is of this good use to us, that while we are travelling through this life, it conducts us through an easier and more pleasant path to our journey's end.

Financial and Commercial.

MONETARY.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE,
NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, MARCH 9, 1866.

The most noticeable feature in the financial movement to-day was a decline of ½@1 per cent. in rates of gold, and of 1@2 per cent. in rates of foreign exchange. The gold market opened inactive, at yesterday's closing quotations, but soon rallied, and some sales were effected at a decided advance. Dispatches from New York, however, received during the morning, quoted a decline in that market of 1½ per cent. on previous quotations, which caused rates here to react to the extent of fully ½@1 per cent. against holders. A moderate business transpired, nevertheless, but the principal movement was at reduced figures, as will be seen by referring to the subjoined statement of the operations for the day, viz: $20,000 and $25,000 at 131½; $10,000, $12,000 and $15,000 at 131¼; $3000, $10,000 and $18,000 at 131; $10,000, $20,000 and $25,000 at 130½; $2500 and $20,000 at 130¾; and $10,000 and $15,000 at 130. Sales of silver have been restricted to driblets, of which we take no report. The closing quotations this evening are, for gold 129@130, and for silver 127@128 for American coin, and 129@130 for Mexican dollars.

Foreign exchange has declined fully 1@1½ ₱ cent. to-day, owing to the heavy reduction in rates of gold at the North, and to unfavorable private advices of movements in the New York market. A moderate amount of sales transpired notwithstanding, but the tendency of the market after the receipt of the Northern advices was steadily and uniformly in favor of buyers. The sales, so far as reported, comprised £1000 and £15,000 at 142⅞, £7000 at 141½@142⅞, £17,000 at 141@142½, £4000 at 142½@142¾, £3000 at 142, £7500 at 141@141½, £3000 at 141, and £5000 and £6000 at 140. Sales of francs included 25,000f. and 100,000f. at 3.95f., 40,000f. and 30,000f. at 3.93¾f., 800 000f. at 3.93¼@4.00f., and 60,000f. and 100,000f. at 4.00f. It is hardly necessary to add that the highest prices were paid during the early part of the day.

Domestic exchange has exhibited no variation of any kind since our last. The supply upon the market was of a restricted character throughout, and the demand was but moderately active at best from the opening to the close of business. Most of the banks checked at ½@1 ₱ cent. premium, but one or two of them adhered strictly to the outside figure. The purchases out of doors included $15,000, $40,000, $60,000 and $130,000 bank sight at par; $12,000, $60,000 and $72,000 do. at 1-16 ₱ cent. premium; $40,000 and $60,000 at par to ⅛ ₱ cent. discount; and $25,000 commercial at ¼ ₱ cent. discount; $20,000 one day's sight at par; $18,000 ten days' at ⅛; $20,000 twenty days' at ⅛, and $65,000 thirty days' at do.; and $10,000 sixty days' at ⅛ ₱ cent. discount. We now quote New York bank sight at ⅛@¼ ₱ cent. premium, and endoor sight at ¼ ₱ cent. discount to par; five to ten days' sight, ⅛@⅜ ₱ cent.; fifteen to twenty days', ⅜@½ ₱ cent. discount; thirty days' at ½@⅝ ₱ cent. discount, and sixty days at ⅝@¾ ₱ cent. discount.

STOCKS AND BONDS—There has been a little more inquiry noticeable to-day for a few favorite securities, but all other classes have been wholly neglected. Offerings exhibited no marked variation of any kind, and the annexed statement comprises the whole of the operations for the day, viz: 150 shares Gaslight Company at 153½, 100 do. at 154½, and 50 do. at 155; 31, 50 and 100 do. City Railroad Company at 195, including dividend, and 15 do. at 194, with the same privilege; also 5 and 26 do. at prices that have been withheld, 24 do. Bank of America at 119, and 50 do. Opelousas Railroad stock at 5½.

UNCURRENT BANK NOTES—There is an evident tendency to still higher rates noticeable in the movement of the issues of the banks in liquidation, despite the fact that prices of some descriptions have already closely approximated their original value. Offerings show a steady decrease, and the movement to-day included $100 Bank of Louisiana at 58c., $20,000 do. at 58½c., and $350 do. at 57c.; $500 Louisiana State Bank at 75½c., $2000 at 76½c., and $200 at 77c.; $300 Merchants' Bank at 80¼c.; $800 Bank of New Orleans at 92c.; and $200 Crescent and $200 Union Bank at the same figures. We still quote Union, Crescent and Bank of New Orleans at 84@84c.; Merchants' Bank at 77@82c.; Louisiana State Bank at 73@78c., and Bank of Louisiana at 55@60c. ₱ dollar.

COMMERCIAL.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE,
FRIDAY, March 9, 1866.

COTTON—The market opened this morning with an improved inquiry, which was soon checked, however, by the receipt of later advices from Europe and New York of a rather discouraging character. Most factors refused to uncover their samples throughout the day, and those who were compelled to sell had to submit to still lower figures. The transactions for the day have been restricted to 1056 bales, which were taken by seven buyers, mostly in small lots. During the morning previous quotations were uniformly paid, but subsequently the market became unsettled, and prices towards the close were of too irregular a character to obtain reliable figures, and we therefore omit the rates, as they could only mislead the casual reader. There was no movement of any importance carried through after the receipt of the regular evening dispatches, and the previous operations were generally effected within the limits of yesterday's quotations, which we repeat merely for reference, viz: ordinary, 35@37c.; good ordinary, 39@40c.; low middling, 41@42c.; and middling, 44@45c.

SUGAR AND MOLASSES—The receipts from the interior disclose a still further falling off, and the total since our last has been restricted to 30 hhds. of the former and 67 bbls. of the latter. The demand continues very light, however, and sales to-day have been confined to 25 hhds. of sugar and to 150 bbls. of molasses. The supply in first hands is but little better than nominal, and the transactions to-day have been effected at our last quotations, viz: 12¼@13½c. for common to low fair sugar, 14½@14¾c. for good fair to fully fair do., 15¼@16¼c. for prime to choice, 10½c. for yellow clarified, and 17c ₱ ℔ for white do.; and for molasses 40@82c. ₱ gallon, according to quality. Prime Louisiana, slightly fermenting, sold to-day at 70c. ₱ gallon, and there is no choice molasses in the market. 900 hhds. Cuba molasses have been taken at 82c. ₱ gallon.

WESTERN PRODUCE—The receipts from above show a steady increase, and buyers are holding back in anticipation of lower prices. The present supply is by no means heavy, however, and the operations for the day will be found accurately set forth in the following statements, viz:

FLOUR—With a very restricted demand, we have only to report sales since our last of 1800 bbls., of which 200 unbranded at $8 25; 300 superfine at $8 50@8 75; 300 low extra at $10 50; 500 extra on private terms; and 400 choice at $12 75. There is a little better feeling noticeable in the market, and the higher grades are firmly held, but all descriptions below superfine are languid, and show a decline of fully $1

LETTER FROM DR. SUMMERS.

Messrs. Editors—Our opening services on last Sunday were very interesting to me. I baptized a student of the ministry, a son of a valued friend in Tuscaloosa, who, I trust, will make a useful member of the church. At the same time I received, by certificate, another student, whom I baptized eighteen years ago, giving him the name of his grandfather, my late and excellent friend, Christian Keener, of Baltimore. The father of young Christian professed faith in Christ when he was stationed in Baltimore, nearly thirty years ago. "Instead of the fathers, shall come the children."

What we want now, above all things, is godly seed. Why is it that so few of our children are pious? Have we discharged our duty to them? Is there not something radically defective in our domestic and church training? I do not judge—I only inquire.

The first term of the present session of the Southern University has just closed.—The examinations lasted a week and a half. They were unusually rigid, and very satisfactory. The young men study well and successfully. Some complain that the faculty are too severe in their tests; that the exact too much, and the like; but the grade of scholarship in our country has been too much lowered, and examinations have been too much like shams. The faculty are determined to sanction none of this. They intend that a diploma received from this institution shall mean something, and be worth having. And they are right.

We have been favored with a visit of Rev. Professor Larrabee, of Columbus, Ga. He gave us a discourse on the Essentials of Religion. It was truly an excellent performance—eloquent, chaste, original in an extraordinary degree; in a most fine illustration of his beautiful style. The Professor would have the finest music that our means and taste will allow—the best music that organ and well-trained voices can discourse; the most perfect psaltus that we can offer to God; and all connected with and hallowed by the spirit of a pure, fervent, seraphic devotion. I think that would not be so bad, after all. I am not sure but that Jehovah himself would prefer it to such scandalous caricatures of religious worship so frequently offered to him in the wretched and filthy stables, that, by a shocking misnomer, are called churches! I have long been of the opinion that God has a controversy with us for our delinquencies in this matter. We take no pains to have our church edifices properly constructed and kept in order.—We go to no labor and expense to keep up the psalmody of the church, as if hymns were sing themselves, or as if the congregation of people could sing them unless they were led and assisted. Our parsonages, too often—but that is a delicate point, and I pass it.

Depend upon it, there must be a wider-spread and thorough reform in our premises, and the sooner we get to it the better.

Professor Larrabee has a great educational enterprise in hand. He proposes to take some dozen or more boys with him to Europe; first to France, then Germany, then Italy, etc., then England; staying a month at each place, studying at the great institutions, visiting notable places, and the like. In this way, he thinks, the most thorough education can be secured. He is quite bent on the project, and expects to carry it upon the present year.

We are, perhaps, aware, that the Rev. Robert M. and Mrs. Saunders, formerly of Tuscaloosa, and now of Columbus, Ga., are taking a company of young ladies to Berlin, for a similar purpose. Mr. Saunders does not propose so extensive a tour as Mr. Larrabee. If our respected friends succeed upon these experiments, I shall rejoice with them success. I am informed the expenses of this movement will not be so much by a great deal, as may be generally supposed.

Since I last wrote to you I have received a number of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, so that I have the satisfaction of knowing that it is alive from the dead. Judging from the specimen I have received, I should judge there will be less trouble to fill columns than its subscription books—one excellent sheet. You ought to have at least six thousand subscribers by the first of April. There is a most appalling lack of religious knowledge in our country; our people are perishing for lack of knowledge—the Church is famishing on account of it. The community scarcely knows that the Church is alive—that its institutions are rising up from the ruins and desolations of war. I sometimes feel as if we had lost an entire generation. Our old members are dispirited and desponding; many of them are asking, "Is there a Lord among us or not?" The pronouncing many of them—are also discouraged. They get a very meagre support—they are afraid to hear that their families will starve. Hence they are going into other churches. This, of course, has a damaging effect upon the Church. In time, these we especially need in church paper ought to be in every family; but how to get it there, is the question; I wish some of your sagacious and liberal men, who can devise wise and liberal things, would take this matter into consideration, and see if a church paper cannot be placed gratuitously in every family that will be willing to pay the postage.

As there has been a good deal of dancing in our community during the winter, a friend suggested to me the other day, that there would be less of it now, that Lent was begun. This would seem to reflect on our Roman and Anglican friends, as no others among us observe the Quadragesimal Fast—there being no Apostolic authority for it. Whether or not the Lents that are kept by those Christians who claim dancing privileges at other seasons, do them much good, is a question that I shall not discuss. I have feared, that to escape the superstitions which characterize some religionists, in regard to fasting, we, as a people, have gone to the other extreme, so that many of us never fast at all. The early Methodists were almost ascetic in this matter. Thus that eccentric philosopher, Abraham Tucker, speaks of "the tedious attendances and self-denials of the Methodists;" and in a flippant style, which he knew so well how to employ upon an occasion, says, "Now did Whitfield and Wesley endeavor to stop me, bellowing out their exhortations to abstinence, self-denial and mortification, possibly I might fret a good deal, and the uneasiness of wanting my dinner urge me to exert all my might in brushing by them. But by good luck they do not honor me with their acquaintance, nor hear I any of their revelations commanding me to austerities." Very good; but the Saviour on the Mount, and other discourses of our Lord, might teach you that self-denial, including even fasting, may not be amiss if you really wish to destroy "the works of the flesh," and to develop "the fruit of the Spirit." I have just room to express the hope, that the day set apart for fasting and prayer for the Divine blessing on our General Conference, will be sacredly observed.

A Matter of Two Thousand Dollars.

The occupation of the Parsonage belonging to the M. E. Church South, in Baton Rouge, by a minister of Bishop Ames's appointment, entailed the loss of it to the Church, and consequently to the amount paid on it, fifteen hundred dollars, and five hundred dollars expended in repairs. The property was sold under mortgage, under the apprehension that the Church North had appropriated it without incurring the responsibility of the balance due.

Among the many rich Centenary offerings which the Northern Methodists are preparing to make, will it occur to any one of the many conscientious members of that Church to make restitution of two thousand dollars to the Church in Baton Rouge, and thus cancel a debt more sacred and binding on them than any other the Centenary orators will be able to enforce? Thoughtfully considered, would it not be much more appropriate and Christian to give that direction to the Centenary gift than to expend it upon a missionary, whose very presence would repel the people from the Gospel he brings, while the memory of this wrong remains? This appeal may provoke a smile from those who regard honesty only as a question of policy, or those who are doubtful if a strict sense of justice coincides with the practical creed of the M. E. Church. These opinions are unworthy of any one, and may not be imputed to a body of Christians occupying a position so eminent before the world.

Bishop Ames himself cannot afford to remain in debt to Southern politeness and Christian courtesy, now that the opportunity is afforded to return the compliment in a corresponding measure of justice.—He once expressed himself highly gratified with the attentions paid him in this city by the Methodists and their friends, and the unqualified respect shown him as a distinguished minister of his Church. He was exceedingly happy in his exposition of the Gospel with which he favored the congregation of Southern Methodists, who were more than pleased to invite him to preach during his visit; and particularly forcible was he in his illustration of the principle of justice, which it is a pleasure to recur to, even after the lapse of several years.

Sad as are the Methodists here, on account of the loss of a property on which they had set their heart, and which had been acquired by the patient and constant labor of many years, wrought out by the ladies, solely, still it would be somewhat refreshing to them to witness the exercise of justice by one who preached it so ably.

Many strange things have happened under the sun, and incredulous as most people are, there is a degree of faith which may be rewarded by the amount claimed. Is it not written, "Ask and ye shall receive"? We have asked—who will pay it?

CHINESE PERSECUTION.—Recent advices from China state that a Christian village near Pekin had been burnt and its Bishop assassinated.

THE PULPIT OF MONTGOMERY.

SERMON PREACHED BY REV. DR. H. N. MCTYEIRE, OF THE M. E. CHURCH FEB. 14th, 1866.

"The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children forever, that we may do all the words of this law." Deut. 29, 29.

There is a fascination in "secret things." They pique human curiosity; they challenge, defy, elude and mock human understandings. If earthly matters, this is well enough; it leads to the extension of knowledge. In heavenly, the reverent mind is checked when inquiry would extend beyond prescribed limits, for here knowledge is not so much the result of research as of revelation. Thou dost not inquire wisely, beyond what is written.

Yet vain man would be wise, and push his science into the most solemn and hidden of all subjects—the nature, the ways, the attributes of God. "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? Deeper than hell; what canst thou know?" This question of Zophar, the friend of Job, may be answered by David—"Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it."

This interdict on the knowledge of God objectively considered, this limit of range, irritates our depravity. Forbidden fruit is pleasant.—The thing that may not be done, is the very thing. What is locked up is desired above all, and men are found picking at that lock.

"Secret things" must be, in connection with a revelation from God to man. If my Bible were as shallow and unsuggestive as a horn book, it would lack essential evidence of its origin. And why?

The conditions of teaching are, that certain glimpses of higher truths pass before us, while information concerning lower ones is being conveyed; vague, shadowy outlines of vaster thoughts and systems and beings. By every comprehensive and well instructed mind, the simplest, primary fact is held and viewed in connection with other facts. Everything is widely related. It is so in natural philosophy, in mental and moral. The task and business of the teacher is to confine instruction to the lesson and to the learner's capacity; not to indulge in expatiations or follow the tempting associations of ideas that would lead grandly abroad. This would make instruction limitless:—or rather, would totally defeat it, by overwhelming and distracting the mind in its rudimental efforts. Specific truth must be presented; the margin must be narrow, the horizon confined, as compared with the whole system of truth.

Herein is the explanation of that anomaly, that very learned men are generally the poorest teachers of A. B. C. Dr. McTyeire illustrated, by the case of a linguist, master of half a dozen languages, living and dead, under whom a child could not learn English grammar.

The Teacher sent from God set us an example of the true philosophy. The Bible is on that plan. It does not overwhelm and bewilder with impertinencies. When his conduct was enigmatical, Jesus deferred explanation instead of entering into it—"What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter." In concluding his personal ministry, he said to his disciples—"I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now."

Nevertheless, a live mind is more or less attracted by the truths that lie outside and beyond its immediate lesson. When the Infinite teaches the finite; when spiritual things are conveyed to earthly beings, there must be, here and there, hints and suggestions that have no present solution. Parts and glimpses of truths are brought incidentally to view that were never intended to be fully revealed. They cover the borders of the illuminated page, vanishing away into darkness. They are "secret things." These partial views may strain it and even break it. They may seem inconsistent with what has been clearly revealed. But let us remember that we "know only in part." If we knew all or even more—our difficulties would not exist.

"Mysteries" and "secret things" are not synonomous. It was Paul's, and it is every preacher's business, to "make known the mysteries of the gospel." How God can be just and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus; how mercy and truth are met together, righteousness and peace have kissed each other on Calvary. "Mysteries" are doctrines not taught by reason. They are unknown until revealed. But the "secret things" are unknowable. The Lord has reserved them. They belong to Him. They form no part of his purposed communications.

The angels themselves submit to "secret things." Their adoring wonder was kindled, as they beheld the eternal purpose of God in our redemption, passing through the various stages of its unfolding. It was hid in God, as St. Paul says, "to the intent that now, unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the Church, the manifold wisdom of God." The Church is honored to become, by its character and history, an instructor and revealer to celestial hierarchies, in the fuller knowledge of God.

Prophets submitted to "secret things"—uttering words, the ultimate bearing of which they comprehended not. Before their far-seeing eyes flitted visions vast and vague. The apostle Peter describes their case—"Of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophecied of the grace that should come unto you: searching what or what manner of time the spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow: unto whom it was revealed that not unto themselves but unto us they did minister the things which are now reported unto you by them that have preached the gospel which the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; which things the angels desire to look into."

If angels and prophets submit to have their vision bounded by a horizon of "secret things," cannot we? The grand processes and evolutions of the divine plans are going on. Some of these things may be cleared up, if God will, in this life; some, in the life to come; and others, never.

Let us specify a few of the "secret things" with which men are fain to meddle, and to puzzle their puny brains, and to speculate.

The nature of God affords fruitful themes. Not content with a First Cause, they would intrude into the chambers of the eternal, self-existent God. They ask, how He came to be? And how, He could be from everlasting? A drop of water presumptuously striving to ingulf the ocean!

The Trinity in Unity. Here human wisdom is gravelled. If you are offended at "secret things," offences must needs come. There is one only living and true God, eternal in existence, infinite in attributes: the Holy Scriptures cannot be mistaken in this. They show also, with equal clearness that the one God exists in three persons the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one God, the same in substance, equal in power and glory. Three persons in one Godhead. This doctrine, the distinct personality and deity of Father Son and Holy Ghost, is called the Trinity. Offensive as it may be to proud human reason, that would explore the unsearchable and comprehend the incomprehensible, this doctrine is the basis of the christian religion. The apostles, disciples and early christians regarded idolatry as exceeding sinful, and yet they worshipped the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, sometimes joining them together, as in benedictions and baptism, and often addressing them separately. You say, Explain this: how can one God exist in three persons. The Bible does not reveal the how; but only that it is.—The doctrine is not offered to our intellects to be comprehended, but to our faith to be received. I will not relieve you, by analogies: as that a certain useful substance can exist in three forms, water, ice, steam—liquid, solid, and aerial: as that fire contains three distinct properties—light, heat and electricity. Away with all these devices to pare down the Almighty, who fills heaven and earth, until he can be included within the narrow field of our vision. Human analogies offer no criterion and afford no light. Because three cannot exist in one man, shall we therefore aver that they cannot exist in one God? Because man cannot be omnipresent, must we reject the omnipresence of God? Comparisons are inconclusive, unless the things compared are alike. It is safe to say that there are qualities and modes and attributes of God that have not yet been revealed to us. We should never have known of the Trinity, but that by the distribution of the Divine offices in redemption, this sublime and glorious truth comes into view. It is no concession to curiousity, but incidental to the development of the plan of salvation. Perhaps if our minds and conditions were raised above what they are, and God should manifest Himself more abundantly, even we might comprehend the Trinity. At present, we cannot disprove it; it is not contrary to our reason, tho' above it.

The Divine sovereignty is a stumbling block. God rules the world; He governs it not merely by general laws, but direct volition. A general providence necessitates a particular providence. As a mass is made up of atoms, so is a general providence of particulars. He that drowned Pharoah's host, watches the sparrow's fall and numbers the haire of our heads. "He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of earth, and none can stay his hand or say unto Him, what doest thou?"

If this irresistible and unchallenged power rules and reigns—where is room for as man's free agency? Are we accountable moral agents, under such a government? No doubt of it.—Open the Bible anywhere and you will find God commanding, rebuking, exhorting and approving men as those who have their destinies in their own hands, for time and eternity. And your own consciousness agrees thereunto. You cannot restrain prayer, neglect duty and drift upon destruction, excused by the plea of a controlling, thwarting, annulling power over you. Because God works in us to will and to do, is a reason not for our neglecting, but working out our own salvation, with fear and trembling.

The foreknowledge of God some men have a great deal to do with. They seem to know all about it. If God foreknows all events—as he must, being omniscient—they must take place. If He foreknows that I am to be lost—the event must answer accordingly; lost I shall be. If He foreknows my salvation—saved I shall be, whether concurring, co-operating with Him or not. Why give myself any concern? I cannot avert the curse or secure the blessing. There is no working against God's foreknowledge.

Take care how you play with edged tools.—What can you say of foreknowledge? As well ask the blind about colors the deaf about sounds. It is not your sort of knowledge. You know events past and present—but you know nothing absolutely in the future. You can not tell what a day, an hour, a minute may bring forth. You may guess, forecast and predict, with more or less probability; but you can't foreknow. An unexpected cause may interpose and disappoint the most confident expectation. You do not know that your uplifted arm will be brought down; like the sacrilegious king's, it may be palsied and stayed.

That you will speak a meditated word, or breathe out the air this moment inspired, you do not know—for not until it has actually transpired, does an event pass into knowledge with you. You speculate on Divine foreknowledge, and are ready to hazard your salvation upon such conclusions. It is allowable to reason from things known to things unknown; but not to reason from your ignorance. You lay your premises in "secret things," and draw your conclusions in the face of revealed things. If God has not explained himself to you, he has explained you to yourself. He addresses you, rewards and punishes you, as a free agent.

Your will is free and you know it; and fate has no existence. As you sow, you shall reap, and your sowing depends upon a volition which is your own and uncontrolled.

You know events past—you know events present. Has your knowledge any causal connection with them? A man commits murder in your sight. You know it.—Does your knowledge influence him so as to destroy or lessen his responsibility? Now if past knowledge or present in one being does not affect moral responsibility in another, may it not be that foreknowledge has no such effect? This belongs to God only—and He can so manage a nicely balanced moral government that his prescience shall not impinge upon, nor in any way interfere with the free agency of his creatures.

At this point in the discourse was illustrated the consistency of men upon this subject. Meets a real fatalist, a Hard Shell, who not only believes that God foreknows, things because they will come to pass: but that they will come to pass, because He foreknows them. The man don't pray or go to Church—says there is no working against Divine foreknowledge. What is to be, will be. It was foreknown from eternity whether he was to be saved or damned, and so it must be. The time and the manner of his leaving the world were fixed before he came into it, and change is impossible. Prayer is an absurdity. This man is a farmer. He is in his field, burning logs and mellowing the soil with his plow. "Does not God's foreknowledge take in all things temporal as well as spiritual?" Of course. "Then he foreknows whether or not you will make a good crop. If a good crop—so it must be; this field will be covered with corn, whether you turn a clod or not. If He foreknows a failure, then all you can do will not avail anything—The only response was a jerk at the line and a word to the horse, and on he went. He knew that means must be used to obtain ends; that idleness brought want, and the diligent hand was filled; and he suffered none of these "secret things" to interfere with his practice. Like many others, he had one rule for temporals and another for spirituals; the former was honest, the latter was dishonest; mere trifling; mockery that cannot be called solemn, it is so transparent; a mere pretext for neglecting revealed duties by pleading "secret things."

A notable specimen of reasoning from ignorance is given by the Evangelists. The Sadducees, who denied the resurrection, came to Jesus with their unanswerable objection. What though Job, David and Daniel declared it—they had an objection and it was a poser.—"Master," said they—"Moses said if a man die having no children, his brother shall marry his wife and raise up seed unto his brother. Now, there were of us seven brethren; and the first, after he had married a wife, died, and having no issue left his wife unto his brother. Likewise the second also, and the third, unto the seventh. And last of all the woman died also. Therefore, in the resurrection, whose wife shall she be of the seven? for they all had her?"—Can you not imagine the malignant leer of infidelity as that case was put? For a moment infidelity was triumphant. The identical, personal, bodily resurrection involves too much confusion; it will be impossible to settle the claims and relations of the future life; therefore the doctrine must be false. "Jesus answered and said unto them, Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures nor and the power of God. For in the resurrection, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven."

The bottom fell out of their argument. They had proceeded and built up their specious objection upon the supposition that marriage was an institution of the resurrection state. They had reasoned from their ignorance. All objections to plain duties and doctrines, being of the same kind, await the same fate. A ray of light, a touch divine will cut the sophistry and dissolve the doubt, and the revealed truth will stand forth clear and consistent with the whole system of which it forms a part.

When the conscience is ill at ease concerning the neglect of revealed things, there is a refuge in secret ones. "What good will it do me to belong to the Church?" says one. "Will that save me? Can't I get to heaven out of the Church?" And in the quo modo and the rationale they try to lose their convictions or find excuse for delay. Turn to God's word and see that the Church was established by Him;—his house, his body; and that all who are trying to save their souls and keep his commandments count it both duty and privilege to enter into its covenant and come under its discipline.

"Baptism," says another, "why insist on that? What virtue is there in water, more or less, applied,—in the name of the Trinity?" I end the matter, by quoting the words of Jesus—"Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

The Lord's supper is slighted. A voluntary humility, a plea of unworthiness suffices; an undefined awe of eating and drinking condemnation, and being guilty of the blood commemorated. Let such consider it not only in the light of privilege, but of duty. "Do this," said our Master. Do not lose sight of the commandment under the mystery. We owe it to Him, who died for us to honor the eucharist. We owe it to Christian fellowship; we owe to the world to erect this monument continually in their view and show forth the Lord's death till he come.

If he does not take you into all his counsel, does this absolve you from obedience? You may wind yourself into dark labrynthe, and manage to get up doubts and bolster yourself with nice casuistries,—but the day cometh that shall sweep away the refuge of lies.

Observe there is exclusiveness in this claim: "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God." Therefore, they do not belong to us. The effort to intrude into them is not only vain; it is distracting; it leads away from plain duties. I repeat, there is a fascination about "secret things;" and it is indulged at the expense of mind and heart. Hence Dr. South was wont to remark, on the numerous expounders of the seals and visions of Revelation, that he never knew a man to undertake that task but it either found him cracked or left him so.

The impertinent curiosity of his hearers was ever manifesting itself by abrupt intrusions upon the teachings of our Lord. "Then said one unto him, Lord are there few that be saved?" The reply of Jesus conveyed at once practical instruction and pungent rebuke—"Strive to enter in at the strait gate." Whether few or many be saved, labor to be one of that number. This only is of consequence to you.

The living carnality of his disciples evinced itself to the last by this pragmatic prying into the future, "And as he sat upon the Mount of Olives, his disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end of the world." The answer left them still in ignorance of secret things. "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no not the angels of heaven, but my Father only;"

Among the last scenes, Peter fresh from the denial and pardon of his Master, asked concerning a fellow apostle—"Lord and what shall this man do?" The temper that patronises the fortune teller and necromancer was in that. "Jesus saith unto him, if I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou, me."

Just before His ascension, pursued by the same idle questioning, "He said unto them, it is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power."

The Apostle of the Gentiles, had, more than once, to come to the relief of his disciples who were shaken in mind and troubled "as that the day of Christ is at hand." Let us be more anxious to be ready for Him, than to set Him a time. This one thing know, for it is among the things revealed. He will come, and at such an hour as ye think not.

"But those things which are revealed belong unto us and our children forever, that we may do all the words of this law." This is the end of the revelation, obedience. The road to heaven is plain, if you are resolved to walk in it. The waylaring men though fools, shall not err therein.

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." You understand that; it is very plain.

"Seek ye the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon Him while he is near. Let the wicked forsake his way and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and unto our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

The golden gate of the Gospel opens wide and free to you in invitation: "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Away with debate, doubts, delays; it is time for action. Cast away your fond excuses and take up your Cross and follow Jesus. If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them. AMEN.

REVOLUTION AND PROGRESS.

"Prove all things and hold fast that which is good." So said a very learned and wise man who was a great iconoclast and paid little attention to notions because they were old and had the sanction of sages. He had no respect for Homer as a theologian, for Hesiod as a cosmogonist, or for Aristotle as a teacher of Ethics. He exploited away tho' the Acropolis should crumble, tho' the Phanteon should perish. That was none of his business. Let Jupiter and Mars look to that.

Outside of all technicalities and evasive shifts, thousands are rising up who imitate him by at least this much—recklessness in the pursuit of truth. Card castles will be kicked over; even Westminster Abbey and the Lateran may have holes dug through their sacred sides into their more sacred crypts; the blessed Bambines of His Holiness may prove to be very indifferent blocks of wood clothed in paste and filagree; Creeds and Confessions and ecclesiastical contrivances generally may have to be revised and worked over, being found to be the productions of unwisdom; then will come a look back of astonished and silent shame at Salem witch craft, and other crafts as potent and poisonous; then a stern, unbribable inquest over the partially paralyzed body of Truth, will be held to know why is she thus crippled and stupefied. The Temples and Holy places where men worship will be searched with a lighted candle and swept with a new broom. Men will be astonished to find how fragmentary and unjointable are their sacred images—here a head, there a torso, with nothing to match—composite all, like the King of Babylon's dream-image, and all standing on clay.

The world is democratizing steadily, even including Japan. It will go on until the kingdoms of this world shall become the Confederate States of Truth. It can't go back. The reaction of '48 did not arrest the spread of truth. The roots only grappled stronger in the human heart, because of the storms and tossings of tyranny. The Imperial coup d'etat of 1852 left France freer than under the Republic of Ledru Rollin. The same event consolidated Italy into a free monarchy, and sent a fatal arrow through the chain armour of Austria, and will give Mexico a government, if canting demagogues will hold their peace.

The world moves, sometimes jostled a little on its axis by the draft of the sun; sometimes unsettled a little in its orbit by the explosion of a thousand cubic miles of molten granite, sent hurtling through that eternal mortar, Hecla. Moral explosions too there are. Luther let off a mine that lifted half of Europe and sent a wave across the Atlantic, which broke in light and liberty over this waiting continent. Hampden and his cousin Cromwell blew up the divine right of Kings and all its appendant parasites. Jefferson and Henry, working in the same line, unearthed certain political truths, which the dust and debris of 500 years had partially concealed—truths which took shape at Runymede.

So Copernicus dismantled the orrery of Ptolemy and relegated the Planets to their orbits, causing a great change in the text books of Astronomy. So Bacon, in Physics and Metaphysics, dethroned Aristotle as the Czar of Philosophy—and that, after an incumbency of 2000 years.

So Garrison and Yancey exploded Slavery, tho' hooped and banded by and with the sanctions of Law and Gospel—blew it up, and the fragments are still falling, and with it many impossibilities and indispensables and principials—gone—out of life into archæology and pha'sontology—soon to be a study for some Cuvier in his investigations in the comparative anatomy of Society.

Thus explosion has followed explosion in Religion, in Politics, in Science and in Sociology, scattering prejudices—annihilating them; and this shall go on until Truth shall reign supreme and undisputed. It must be so, for She is the daughter of the voice of God, the utterance of his very essence. And downward shall her power and influence spread, from the resplendent heights of Mt. Tabor's revelations to the lowest plane of domestic duty and privilege, moulding and pervading all relations.

When shall these things be? Not in my time, certainly. It is none of my business. It is all that I can do, day by day, to be honest and true—not to allow the despotism, of Conformity to drive me back from the freedom of Dissent; not to allow selfish and indolent human nature to compromise my good sense and integrity.

I will not make this article more prolix by applying the arguments and illustrations. "Clear your mind of cant." Impossible with some people. They live in an atmosphere of fog and smoke and petulance; and still, with watery eyes, they protest that their vision is as clear as an angel's. How these northers clear the sky!

SAND PAPER TONGUE.—When I was a boy, says one, I and a number of my playmates had rambled through the woods till, quite forgetting the fadleg light, we found ourselves far from home. Indeed we had lost our way. It did so happen that we were nearer home than we had thought; but how to get to it, was the question. By the edge of the field we saw a man coming along, and we ran to ask him to tell us. Whether he was in trouble or not, I do not know, but he gave us some very sharp answers. Just then there came along another man, a near neighbor, with a merry smile on his face.

"Jim," said he, "a man's tongue is like that of a cat. It is either a piece of velvet or a piece of paper, just as he likes to use it; and I declare you always use your tongue like sand-paper. Try the velvet, man; try the velvet principle."

Children, have you never seen a boy or girl with a sand-paper tongue? You can tell sand-paper from any other, even if you shut your eyes. By rubbing your hand over it, you will find it to be very rough.

This is just what we mean by a sand-paper tongue—one that utters rough words, which hurt the poor heart just as the flesh is hurt by sand-paper, when it is rubbed by it. Every time you speak a rough word to your mother, you are scraping her heart with a sand-paper tongue. And remember that a sand paper tongue will make the heart bleed just as quick as a piece of sand-paper will bring the blood by rubbing the flesh with it. Have any of you, children, made your parents' hearts bleed by rough words?

It is possible to tell sand-paper without touching it. If you hear anybody scraping it on the wall, or rubbing it on the table, you can always tell it by the sound. When it sounds very harshly, you know it is sand-paper. It is just so with these sand-paper tongues—you can always tell them by their sound.

"What did you do that for, you good for nothing little thing?" said Mary Rough to her little sister Hattie, when she stumbled and broke off one of the feet of Mary's doll.

"I've a great mind to slap you down—you're all the time breaking something of mine."

Children, can't you tell what kind of tongue it was that spoke so harshly to little Hattie? Can't you tell a cracked bell when you hear it? Well, surely you can tell as easily what kind of tongue Mary Rough had by the sound it sent to her poor little sister's ears.

If you will take a piece of sand-paper and rub it for some time on a plank, it will become less and less rough, until finally it will hardly be rough at all. But the more a sand-paper tongue is used, the rougher and rougher it gets. Well, then, boys and girls, the best way is to "try the velvet principle," that is, use soft words; speak kindly to each other. Strive, by all means, not to carry a sand-paper tongue in your mouth, when a velvet one would be so much more useful and becoming.—Rich. Christian Advocate.

TEARS IN A BOTTLE.—I wonder how many of my little friends would like to have their tears preserved in a bottle—tears of anger and spite, tears of pride and naughtiness, that well up sometimes from every human heart, and flow freely from the eyes. What reproof and shame would they bring to us—these bitter, bitter tears—if we could look upon them in our after moments, when the passions that caused them were quiet!

What the sweet Psalmist David meant, when he said unto God, "Put my tears into thy bottle," were the tears of penitence for all his wanderings from the right way; tears of sorrow for his many sins, and tears of anguish for his offences against the pure and holy One. Such tears as these our heavenly Father will always have in remembrance. He will treasure them up as the signs of a real grief. Perhaps you do not know where the shepherd-king borrowed this strange figure; it was from the Greeks and Romans, who used to put the tears which were shed for any person in small vials, and offer them on the tombs of the deceased.

I think it would be very nice if our tears of penitence could be placed upon the graves of our sins! I should like to put away down into a deep tomb all my naughty thoughts, and words, and deeds, and then shed such tears of sorrow over them that Jesus would treasure them in his bottle as proofs of my sincere repentance. Should not you?

Little children, let us not shed any more tears of anger, and hatred, and pride and malice. These Satan cherishes; but let us henceforth shed only such sweet tears of penitence for sin as God puts into his bottle.—Child at Home.

THE CHILDREN—BLESS THEIR DEAR HEARTS.—A little two-year old girl fell the other day, and striking her head, cried at the top of her voice. In the midst of her tears she chanced to see from the window a poor old horse, with drooping head. Instantly checking her sobs, she asked him, in the kindest tones, "What's the matter, hossy? Bump 'oo head?"

Wealth is a rank soil, in which unless carefully managed, the weeds will thickly spring up, overtop the plants, choke the grain.

SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS.

A DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.

The Louisiana Conference, at its recent session, appointed the last Friday in March to be observed as a day of Fasting and Prayer, that public services be held in our churches, and that the blessings of God be especially invoked upon the General Conference. Other Conferences may have taken similar action. We remind our people of the appointment, and hope that the day will be generally observed. Such a fast is usually appointed by every Conference, under ordinary circumstances, that the divine blessing may rest upon the Church and Ministry; but the approaching session of the General Conference is a reason for observing the day with more than usual solemnity and devotion.

Eight years have elapsed since this highest tribunal of our church has met. We have come through a severe and protracted ordeal of war. The publishing interests and educational institutions of the Church have suffered damage, and must be set up and organized anew. The Episcopacy is to be strengthened by the election of more Bishops, and many questions of the highest moment to the ministry and laity will be discussed and acted upon.

Besides, we have come to a period in our history when the fullest consecration is demanded. "A great door and effectual is opened unto us, and there are many adversaries." All piety and devotion are needed now. As Southern Methodists, every man is required to be at his post. We must lay our all upon the altar, and present ourselves as living sacrifices, if we would meet the great responsibility. There needs to be firmness of purpose, hard work, generous giving, and fervent, importunate prayer.

"It is God that giveth the increase." Instrumentally, legislation and wise Conference measures can do much, but to devise and execute wisely, there is need of spiritual and heavenly guidance.

And, after all, the power and efficiency of the Church lies more in the measure of the Holy Ghost within her, than in anything else.—It is "by my Spirit," saith the Lord. A Pentecostal baptism upon the Church will do more for us than any amount of ecclesiastical legislation. To this condition of success our thoughts should be directed, even to the effusion of the Spirit upon our Zion. No matter how judicious our legislation, or how perfect our organization, there may be death without any lesion of the vital organs. Functional derangement, with life, is better than a dead perfection.

The Holy Ghost lives only in the individual heart. He is in the Church collectively not otherwise than as he exerts his saving and sanctifying offices in each believing soul. He does not inhabit mere ecclesiastical machinery, nor is his residence in the ablutions and wafers of the Sacraments. He is not inherent in consecrated architecture, nor latent in the forms of worship. If the Spirit be in the Church at all, He is in the believer's heart. It is prayer in the Holy Ghost, as the utterance of these hearts, that brings in the power of God. It is through such hearts that "He maketh intercession for us, with groanings which cannot be uttered."

Great occasion as there is to seek the special effusion of the Spirit, we have every reason to expect it in answer to prayer. The devout have stood "before the Lord on the Mount;" awed by the tornado, the earthquake, and the fire. These have passed, doing their providential work, and preparing the way for "the still small voice," which is the ordinary sequel of these displays of the majesty and power of God. Not immediately was God in them in the blessed ministrations of the Spirit. The voice of the Spirit comes after. Under serener skies, in the hush and stillness of comparative repose, with the wrecks of the storm around us, that voice whispers to the conscience. Prayer, always effective, will be more than ever effectual now. It is the hour of God's mercy, and the set time to favor Zion. The Church has reason to be expectant, and to wait for the power from on high. "The promise of the Father" is set before us to quicken our aspirations and to strengthen our faith. The tongue of fire is the permanent gift of the Spirit to God's ministers. This, above all, is our pressing want.—Without this the most elaborate legislation will effect nothing.—With it, the work of the Lord will move forward, though there be no legislation whatever.

Before this blessing can be fully felt, there must be consecration of all, ministers and people, to God's work. It is a mockery to fast and pray while we continue to "rob God." Bring in all the tithes and offerings without blemish, and the windows of heaven shall be opened. Let us put ourselves in sympathy with Christ in the work of redemption; with his mind and heart, in his sacrifices, his compassion for the lost, and his love for a ruined world. Let us seek to imbue our minds with the spirit of Gethsemane and of Calvary. A consecrated Church and Ministry shall then fast and pray to some purpose. There will be life from the dead; spiritual revivals will refresh the heritage of God, and the spirit of love, wisdom and a sound mind will rest upon our assembled ministers.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

A letter from the worthy President, the Rev. Charles B. Stuart, advises us of the prosperous and flourishing condition of this excellent and well-known institution.—Seventy-six pupils have entered since the fall, and more than sixty are now in attendance.

This is a Methodist School. We wish there were a score like it in the South-west. Do our people intend to stand by their own schools, or build up those of the Catholics? It is high time we should have this question distinctly put, and as plainly answered. A Methodist never deals a severer blow to our Church than when he sends a noble youth or fair maiden, his own son or daughter, to be educated by the followers of Loyola.—How cruel is that worldliness which forces a tender child to pass through the fires of a Jesuit school "to acquire Music and French!" Music and French are taught at all our Colleges with success; and what is of far more moment than merely technical knowledge, Moral and Mental Philosophy, History and the Evidences of Christianity; and whatever else the experience of the past has proved available for expanding the mind in the direction of independent thought and investigation. It is only necessary to look around to see that the controlling minds of the country have been raised in Protestant, not in Catholic schools. Chief Justice Taney is the one distinguished exception. The art of stultifying the intellect, while affording it a good deal of mere knowledge, within certain limits, has been brought to perfection by the Jesuits. To verify this, let those who admire any and everything that is old, respectable and unknown, mark the young people who come directly under their observation, who have gone through and "finished" at one of these schools, and see how superficial, and how dull they are, how little of independent thought, and how much sentimentality they have.

Are you a Methodist? Then you can find at Mansfield, at Woodville, at Summerfield, at Centenary, at Greensboro, at Brookhaven, at Baton Rouge, Methodist Schools and Colleges, good ones, as good as any other denomination can present, or have presented, for the education of youth.

See the advertisement of this Female College in another column.

MEMBERSHIP ON PROBATION.

Our custom of receiving members upon probation for six months is productive, it seems to me, of several serious evils.

1. It has given rise to a slovenly manner of receiving members. A person comes forward in the congregation, upon invitation, gives the preacher his hand, his name is taken, and that is the last he hears of it for six months—perhaps forever. For at the end of six months he may be out of place, or the preacher may be negligent, or for some cause the matter is given the go-by, and his name simply stands on the class-book as it was first placed there.—Probably the act of union with the church has not been consummated by the regular forms of reception into full connection in the case of one-half of the members of the church. I have known many preachers, and at least one Bishop, who were never received into full connection in the regular way.

There is nothing in all this to make the new member feel that the church regards his uniting himself with it as an occasion of any moment whatever. He gives his hand to the preacher, and that is the last of it. And the act itself may have been the result of a momentary impulse. In most cases, the step is taken in the midst of high revival excitement. The feeling that prompts to it may be, in many cases, of a mere sympathetic character. There is often, I fear, no counting of the cost, no solemn estimate of the responsibilities assumed. There is nothing in the mere act of giving one's hand to the preacher, to bring about such deliberation as ought to characterize our consecration to God and His church. Getting members into the church is a sort of rallying business. A rousing exhortation is delivered, a song is sung, "the door is opened," and that is all of it.

In uniting with the church, a man ought to be thrown strongly upon his individual consciousness. He ought to realize the magnitude of the occasion. He ought to be made to feel that all the church hails his advent with profound rejoicing, and that he is performing, in the language of Dr. J. B. Walker, "the grandest act of his life." And all this might be secured by some solemn, deliberate, impressive form of reception.

2. In the midst of our active American life, it is impossible to fasten upon all the probationers at the end of six months. I once conducted a revival in a Western city, in the month of January, in which I received seventy or eighty probationers.—In midsummer, when they ought to have been received into full communion, I could collect but little over one-third of the number. Some families were off traveling, some young men were out of town on business agencies, some were spending the summer with friends in the country, and some, who had only been spending the winter in the city, had returned to their homes. Now, it requires no little persistency and painstaking on the part of the preacher to follow up every individual and take him, when he may be caught, into full fellowship. It is seldom done. In fact it is almost impracticable to do it. I have known preachers to obviate the difficulty by reading out all the names at the end of the six months, and declaring them in full connection, whether they were present or not. In this case the terms of the Disciplinary rule are violated, and the moral effect of the occasion is lost to the absentee. This manner of proceeding is loose and altogether unsatisfactory. But the fault is in the system. No amount of pastoral diligence can overcome the difficulty. The interval between the initiative act and its consummation is too great.

3. The opportunity of making the most of the impressible state of the young convert is lost. The time for producing the full effect of solemn forms is within a few weeks of one's overtures for membership. This is certainly true as a general rule. Taken at the right time, the church may impress her covenant upon the new member so deeply, that its solemn obligations will never lose their effect upon his heart. They will be held in sacred keeping by a memory charged with that responsibility in the midst of solemnities that engrave them, too deep for erasure, upon the sensitive tablets awaiting their reception. No solicitation of evil companions, no urgency of excited appetite, no clamor of importunate temptation can eradicate the sense of them from his mind. No lapse of years or accumulation of cares can wear it out. The impression is inwrought into the very substance of his being, and becomes part of his inalienable consciousness. Its power to restrain him from backsliding must be incalculable. But if a few months be allowed to pass, and the mind of the neophyte permitted to lapse into a less impressible state, the full effect of these influences can never again be secured. Our probationary term is long enough for this result.

4. Persons joining on probation often undervalue their relation to the church, and this fact is chargeable upon the probationary system. I expect many warm-hearted Methodists to object to this statement; but I beg their attention to what I have to say in vindication of it. I suffer no one to love the Methodist Church more than I do. In spite of some defects in the detail of her polity, she is to me the best of churches. I owe my salvation, under God, to her agencies. I have faith in her—faith that the vital power that is in her, will cast off all the incidental evils of her organization and accomplish that great destiny which her early history promises.—One of those defects is that which I have just now mentioned.

I have known some persons to join on probation for the reason that it was, after all, not really joining the church at all.—And many of the preachers encourage this thing. I have heard men, when inviting members, offer it as an inducement, that it was only for six months' trial, and that at any time during that period they could withdraw without blame. The consequence is that many offer themselves whose minds are not half made up to consecrate themselves to the service of God. They are merely experimenting. They will try the service of God a little while, and if the experiment should not turn out to their mind, they bring themselves under no obligation to persevere. Alas, too often, when temptation comes, having no root in themselves, not so much as that of a settled purpose, they fall away. This is merely trifling with holy things! For this reason, more, perhaps, than any other, the country swarms with backsliders from our church. And these backsliders are in a most deplorable, many of them in a hopeless condition; for I hold it to be a settled fact, confirmed by all observation, that a man's character is essentially damaged by tampering with religion. Mere adventurers and experimentors in religion are much the worse for it when they go back to the world. The sense of inviolability in religious obligations is gone, and with it the basis of substantial christian character. The solemnities of the faith have lost their power by being trifled with. It becomes almost impossible to make a thorough-going, devout Christian of such a man.

The high excitement of revival occasions aggravates the evil. A large class of persons participate in the excitement, who yet cling tenaceously to the world, and do not fully submit themselves to the work of the Spirit. There is a fierce conflict between the promptings of conscience and the love of the world. In this condition the man's only hope is in settled, decisive action. He must take no half measures. He must make God his portion, and the church his home. But a fatal opportunity of compromise offers. The preacher invites him to join on trial—only on trial, and suggests that after trying it awhile, if he does not like the church, he can "quit off" at any time. Such a compromise can scarcely have any other than a fatal result. A latent clinging to sin is at the bottom of it, so that it cannot ultimate in genuine conversion. The man soon goes back to his own place, and is ever after more impervious to christian influences than he was before. If the church itself had not betrayed him into this compromise, he might have acted with decision, and become a true child of God.

It may be replied that this is the abuse of the system, and not chargeable upon the system itself. If it is, it seems to me to be an abuse growing so naturally out of it, as to be an inevitable result. The true idea, no doubt is, that the church tries the man during this period of probation, to see if he may be a fit person for membership. But the other side of the case, that the man tries the church, as well, is so natural, that it has entered into the standing vocabulary of many of the preachers. The consequences are what I have already set forth.

5. Probationary connection with the church is a sort of equivocal thing, at best, and there are many persons who, this day, do not know whether to regard themselves as members of the church or not.—Their probation has expired, and no notice has been taken of the fact, and they are altogether uncertain as to what their standing is. Some, at last, take it for granted, inasmuch as their probation has run out, and they have never been received, that their connection with the church is at an end. Others, from a feeling of uncertainty, fall into indifference. Others, again, hold on firmly to the church, and make good members. You may say, that if they are uncertain about their connection with the church, they ought to go to the preacher and settle the matter. No doubt that would be better, but is it natural that they should? In joining the church, they feel that they have done their part; now it is the business of the church, if it cares anything about them, to proceed to receive them by the prescribed form. This is the natural view, and not one in twenty will look at it in any other light. I have met with many persons in this condition, that did not know how to regard their relation to the church.

It is the most inevitable sequence of this, that such connection with the church should come to be considered as of little value. The church does not seem to care much about it, and the individual soon comes to be equally indifferent. Nothing else could be expected. Ecclesiastical obligations are held very light.

6. From all this it has come to pass, that our church has come to be sadly demoralized, in reference to the value and importance of membership. The line not being well drawn in practice, between probation and membership proper, membership itself has come to be very loosely regarded. Men get, both into and out of the church with too little ado. And while in the church, they fail to realize that their place among the people of God is of higher consequence than any worldly good whatever. Wealth, power, personal honor, are nothing compared to it. And yet how cheap a thing it is with many now in our church. Upon the slightest provocation they will withdraw from it without understanding that there is any solemn significance in the act. All results from the loose, slovenly manner in which they have been received into the church.

The concomitant of this is the careless manner in which members are allowed to slide out of the church. The disgrace of expulsion is avoided by quiet withdrawal. The gaps are down on all sides, and people range in and out at pleasure. The sacredness of the enclosure is lost; it is a mere common.

This may be a somewhat hyperbolic statement of the facts, but we all know there is too much truth in it. I know that in some communions the mere church idea swallows up everything else. It supplants spirituality, and deifies forms. But we have fallen into the opposite extreme.—With us the church idea is too low. There is high dignity, and grandeur and value in the outward church. Its sacraments perform an important office in the process of man's salvation. Let them not be held a common thing.

I would suggest some such change as the following in our manner of receiving members:

Upon a person offering himself for membership, let the preacher appoint a private conference with him. In this private conference let the nature and obligations of church membership be pointed out clearly with solemn prayer, by the pastor. Then at an early day, within two or three weeks at most, let him be received, by a suitable formula, to be prepared by authority of the General Conference, on Sunday, in presence of the congregation. It would also be an excellent plan to have a book prepared especially for the use of candidates for membership in the church.

We might not, in this way, take in quite as many during one revival, but at the end of the year we would find as many, and they better members; and then we would not be pained by the sight of so many backsliders.

All this is submitted to the good sense of the Methodist public. M.

THE LORD GOD A SUN.

The following beautiful extract is taken from the address of Prof. Green:

And what enlargement and expansion is given to scriptural figures drawn from natural objects, by gaining a fuller knowledge of those objects themselves. "The Lord God is a sun," conveys a striking and impressive truth, when we think of the sun only in his obvious character as a source of light and heat. But new energy is given to this magnificent emblem when we learn from astronomy that he is a grand centre of attraction, and when we, in addition, take in that sublime generalization that the sun is the ultimate source of every form of power existing in the world. The wind wafts the commerce of every nation over the mighty deep, but the heat of the sun has rarified the air, and set that wind in motion. The descending stream yields a power which grinds your grain, turns your spindles, works your looms, drives your forges; but it is because the sun gathered up the vapor from the ocean, which fell upon the hills, and is finding its way back to the source whence it came. The expansive energy of steam propels your engines, but the force with which it operates is locked up in the coal, the remains of extinct forests, stored among your hills, or is derived from the wood that abounds in your forests, which now crown and beautify their summits. Both these primeval and these existing forests drew their subsistence from the sun; it is the chemical force resident in his rays which disengaged their carbon from the atmosphere, and laid it up as a source of power for future use. The animal exerts a force by muscular contraction; he draws it from the vegetable on which he feeds, the vegetable derives it from the sun, whose rays determine its growth. Every time you lift your arms, every time you take a step, you are drawing on the power the sun has given you. When you stop into the railway carriage, it is sun-power that hurries you along. When gentle breezes fan your languid cheek, and when the resistless tornado levels cities in its fury, they are the servants of the sun. What an emblem of Him in whom we live, and move and have our being!

OBITUARIES.

Mr. RILEY M. BOWMAN, son of the late Isa Bowman, departed this life on the 9th of August, 1865, at the residence of Mrs. Bowman.

Inexorable Death, not satiated with the harvest he has been gathering for several years in the field, and the hospital and the camp, continually invading the quiet sanctuary of homes, however great or humble, and tearing away from them our ornaments, our consolations and our supports. We have here the old story, which never loses its sadness by time, nor its painfulness by repetition—an honest and noble man, a kind neighbor, a generous friend, a good citizen, snatched away from the hearts that loved him to the invisible. Another grave upon earth—another jewel in heaven. I'm going to meet.

Mr. Bowman was sick less than three days. He had lost much of his interest in earth before his last illness, as if his spirit was being quietly weaned away from the world in time, to prepare it for the nobler issues of eternity. His thoughts were turned heavenward, and the want of his heart was the Christian's noblest aspiration—prayer. Just before he became speechless, he raised his hand to his head and exclaimed, "Saviour I be with me unto the end." We feel that his prayer was heard.

His simple grave may be consecrated with rural flowers and woodland birds and the tears of sympathizing friends; but no wonder ever slept under gilded monument. The world may indeed forget him, but his name is recorded in the Book of Life.

Of typhoid pneumonia, contracted from exposures, departed this life on the 13th of February, 1866, at fifteen minutes after 11 o'clock, at Point Oak Dale, in the parish of Tensas, Louisiana, MARY BOWMAN, DICKSON, the only daughter of Mrs. Mary E. Bowman, in the 19th year of her age. All that is mortal lies beneath the sod. Her spirit, like pure spirits of Christ hath taken to himself, and left her friends in mourning; yet not as they who mourn without comfort.

Naught can fill the void created in our hearts by the death of her, "whom to know was to love." We mourn the loss of her beautiful form, of her happy, cheerful society, of the light of her beautiful eyes, now closed in the sleep of death—of her soft, loved voice, now hushed in the silence of the tomb. The fair and mere sleeper on the green mound by the river—one more bright angel in the heavenly throng. Our loss is her gain—yes, her infinite gain, for her deathbed was the scene of her Christian's triumph, and she softly sank to rest in the arms of Jesus.

About one hour before her pure spirit took its flight to the bright celestial realms, and while the chill of the dread conqueror, and while her weeping friends around her, to each she gave a parting word. "Mother, dear mother, we shall meet in my loving home; two mothers now, one on earth, the other in heaven, I'm going to meet. Sister Fannie; sister Lizzie, meet me in my new home. No place like home, home. Oh mother, I see heaven." To the question, "Do you see the angels," her lips answered not, but the rapture of the heavenly scene beamed in her eyes, glowed in her face, far above the fear of the death-shadow; a halo of light, far deeper than words could do. For all she had words of fond parting! borne by angel hands, she winged her way to the paradise of God, to nestle forever more in the bosom of a loving Saviour.

Such a triumphant deathbed I have seldom witnessed; such fond, deep trust in precious promises of God's holy word. Blessed when she walked through the valley of the shadow of death, thy rod and thy staff did comfort her.

INDIAN FIGHT IN FISH CREEK VALLEY.

The Humboldt Register, of Jan. 29, gives the following account of a late fight with Indians:

One of the best fights yet recorded since the Indians on our northern border commenced hostilities, was that made near the confluence of Queen's river and Fish creek, last week.

The Indians had become so daring and troublesome of late, that communication between Dun Glen and Camp McDermot was dangerous. Capt. G. D. Conrad determined on a raid against the marauders. All preparations made, the command set out from Dun Glen on the morning of the 8th, headed for Queen's river. The entire command consisted of fifty-six persons.

After extraordinary suffering from the cold, and a long march of three days, they at length came upon the Indians, and immediately the fight began in all its fury. The Indians had the advantage of the ground. The field fought over was about five miles square, and a large portion of it was very much cut up with gullies and ravines, and here also a great quantity of Spanish broom. The Indians could not have selected a field better adapted to their style of warfare. The Indians discovered the three columns coming dashing down on them, when about a mile distant, and then they could be distinctly seen preparing for battle—dividing off into squads of four and six, and selecting their places for combat, where it would be most difficult to maneuvre cavalry. Each warrior had from fifty to seventy-five poisoned arrows, giving each squad from two hundred and fifty to three hundred and fifty shots. The moment before the battle commenced, owing to the extreme cold, a dense cloud of frost commenced flying, so thick that a horseman could not be distinctly seen over one hundred yards.

This gave the Indians a great advantage, as it compelled the soldiers to fight at short range, so that the bow and arrow could be used, and it also increased the chances of escape for the Indians. Had the frost commenced flying earlier, no doubt many of them would have escaped. The plan of battle was such that the right and left columns flanked the Indians, and soon surrounded them. They fought with desperation. In no instance did a warrior lay down his arms till he laid down his life. They managed their arrows between their fingers in such a manner that they could shoot them very rapidly, and charged with as much bravery as any soldiers in the world. The excitement was intense. Soldiers, citizens and the savages, charging and yelling; each straining all his powers to destroy the other; the wild, ringing war-whoop, the rapid firing of eighty disciplined men, the thunder of a cavalry charge, altogether created a scene that beggars description.

The battle continued in full force for two and a half hours, when the conflict was reduced to two points, at which several warriors had selected deep, short gullies, and were making what they knew to be their last fight. * * * * * *

The battle, with the exception of a few straggling shots, was over. The Indians had fought with a heroism that astonished every one who had witnessed it. They made no effort to surrender; uttered no sound but yells of defiance; and continued to fire their poisonous arrows until they were so weak that they could throw them but a few feet; and some of them, dying, would shoot an arrow straight up into the air, in hope that the deadly missile would fall on the hated and victorious foe. At the close of the battle thirty-five dead Indians lay on the field, with their bows and quivers still clutched in their hands. All of them were large, powerful men—a picked company of braves prepared for battle. But five squaws were in the hand, and they were acting in the capacity of a pack train. Two of them were killed in battle by mistake; the other three were furnished with some provisions, and unmolested.

Scouting parties made the entire circuit of the field, and found that no living thing had escaped, as the snow was three inches deep, and there were no tracks leading from the camp.

On the Union side seven were wounded. The Indian camps were all destroyed, the wounded all cared for, and the command marched to Fish creek, where water could be obtained, and camped, the train having arrived there before them.

THE FOOD OF THE CHINESE.—The Chinese, at Fuhchau, live principally on rice, fish and vegetables. They never use bread at their meals, as people do in western lands. Wheat flour is used in making various kinds of luncheon and cakes. The most common meats are pork, the flesh of the mountain goat, the flesh of the domesticated buffalo and water ox, and the cow; ducks, chickens, geese, and fish from salt and fresh water. There is never any veal or mutton in the market. They never salt down beef or pork. Dunchau bacon and hams are celebrated in Eastern and Southern Asia. It is considered a hardship and a mark of exclusive poverty to eat potatoes, except as a luncheon. Immense quantities of the sweet potato are grated into coarse slips and dried in the sun, to use as food among the poor in case rice cannot be procured. This dried potato is called potato-rice. Oysters abound in the winter, and are very cheap—the usual price of clear oysters being between five and six cents per pound. Shrimps, crabs and clams are plentiful. Little wild game can be obtained at any season of the year. In the winter, pheasants in small numbers are brought from the country to sell, having been shot or entrapped upon the hills.

The Chinese at their meals usually have several dishes, fish, etc., prepared, besides a large quantity of boiled or steamed rice put in a vessel by itself. Each person helps himself to the rice, putting some, by means of a ladle or spoon, into a bowl. The bowl, held in the left hand, is brought near the chin, whence, by the use of chop-sticks, taken between the thumb, fore and middle fingers, the rice is shovelled or pushed into the mouth from time to time. Whenever any vegetable or fish, etc., is desired, a morsel is taken, by a dexterous use of the chop-sticks, from the common dish which contains the article, and conveyed to the mouth. The chop-sticks are not used separately, one in each hand, as many suppose. The earthen spoon is sometimes used to dip out the gravy or liquor from the dish of vegetables or fish, but knives and forks are never used at meal times.

The common beverage of the Chinese is a weak decoction of black tea. According to common fame, they never use green tea. At Fuhchau, the use of cold water as a drink is regarded by the natives as decidedly unhealthy, and most would prefer to thirst for a long time rather than drink it, though they might venture to rinse their mouth or wet their lips with water. A drink of hot or warm water would be greatly preferred to a drink of cold water. The poorest of the poor must have their tea, regarding it not so much a luxury as a necessity. They never use milk or sugar, but always take it clear, and, if convenient, as hot as they can drink it. They prepare it, not by steeping, but by pouring boiling water, or water which has boiled, upon the tea, letting it stand a few minutes, usually covered over. It is considered essential, on receiving a call from a friend or stranger, to offer him some hot tea as soon after he enters as possible, and usually he is also invited to smoke a whiff of tobacco. Unless the tea should be forthcoming, the host would be regarded as destitute of good manners and unaccustomed to the usages of polite society.

JEFF. DAVIS—His Expressions on National Salutes, the Veto, Etc.—"I see the Government naval steamer Conemaugh, on the anniversary of Washington's birthday, fired a gun for all the States, North and South," remarked Jeff. Davis afterwards to the officer of the day. "It is strange the administration," he continued, "did not issue an order to ignore the States of the Confederacy." These two remarks of the ex-pedan august ruler of the Confederacy, though of no special importance, show this much, at least, that his once busy brain is still keenly alert to note passing events and make his comments upon them. In his further observation, I understand, he gave credit to President Johnson for his recognition of the late rebellious States, of whom, from first to last, he has always spoken in terms of the highest praise. I am informed that since he has been most plainly outspoken in commendation of the President's veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill.

AN INTERESTING DISCOVERY.

Mr. Francis H. Stabler, of this city, after a long and patient series of experiments, has finally succeeded in discovering a process whereby oysters, meats and fruits may be preserved in a fresh state for an indefinite period and in any climate. A patent has been obtained, and an incorporated company is already in process of organization, under the style of "The Food Preserving Company," for the purpose of bringing this discovery into general use among the many business firms who are engaged in putting up hermetically sealed oysters, meats, fruits and vegetables, for home consumption and for exportation. The new method of preserving these articles in a fresh state, and without the application of heat, has already been subjected to the severest tests which are known to chemists as productive of rapid decomposition, and it has withstood them all—the articles treated turning out as fresh as if they had been sealed up the day before.

The importance of this discovery consists in its apparently perfect adaptation of the means to the end sought to be attained, and in the economy and simplicity of the progress itself. So far as we have witnessed the operations in question, and partaken of the food thus preserved, we have no hesitation in saying that the one is easy of management, there being no intricacy about it; while the meat, after being kept some six weeks at a temperature of from 90 to 100 degrees, was perfectly sweet and palatable, though less juicy than a steak taken immediately from a butcher's block and cooked. The oysters, which had passed through the same ordeal, and which, for the sake of comparison, were placed along side of a dozen "bivalves" newly taken from the shell, stood the test so remarkably well that it was difficult to discover any difference in flavor between them. We are told that the same process, with slight variation, can be applied to the preservation of fresh fruits.

The modus operandi is easily described. The meats and oysters are first sprinkled with a small quantity of salt to draw out the superfluous moister, a few minutes sufficing with respect to the oysters, and twenty-four hours with fresh meats. They are then put into tin cans of any portable size, and these cans, when filled, are put into an air-tight box. The lid is then fastened down, the air exhausted from the box, and carbonic acid gas forced in until it fills up the vacuum. This gas, which is rather heavier than common air, floats on the top of the canned oysters and meats, and effectually preserves them from deterioration. The gas, moreover, is perfectly harmless, and, as the initiated well know, is the same that gives piquancy to effervescing soda water, and that sparkles in and foams over the glass that is newly filled with champagne. As soon as the gas has been forced into the cans, the lid of the box is removed, and the cans taken out and sealed up in the usual way. In the management of fresh fruit, sugar is substituted for the salt used in the preservation of oysters and meats, and this is the whole of the process.

If subsequent trials on a larger scale should confirm the correctness of the theory upon which this new process of preserving food in a perfectly fresh state is based, it is destined to create an entire revolution in the pickling trade, and to enlarge to an enormous extent its operations. The demand for fresh meat in England has been so great that it has led to the introduction of the sun-dried meats of South America; but, cheap as these are, they are so vapid, tough and tasteless as to be only fit for soups, and are rejected by all except the very poorest classes of the population. If, however, the meats put up by Mr. Stabler's process can be brought into general use abroad, a heavy demand would at once spring up for the cattle of Texas and the South American pampas, where they can be bought at this time, by the herd, at a price not exceeding six dollars per head in Texas, and for even a smaller sum in South America.—Baltimore Gazette.

A FEARFUL RAILROAD RIDE.

A passenger sends to the St. Louis Republican the following brief but thrilling account of a merciful escape from a terrible fate, on the Pacific Railroad:

The down train from Kansas City did not arrive at Jefferson City until ten o'clock on Wednesday night, and the sickness of a member of my family compelled me to leave there, that fearful cold night, for St. Louis. The train consisted of six cars, all well filled with passengers, among whom were two newly-married couples, who started off from points above, when the knots were tied, on matrimonial excursions. Nothing worthy of note occurred until we had reached within about four miles of Hermann, which we did between twelve and one o'clock on Thursday, and about that time an accident occurred, the recollection of which will, the longest day I live, be indelibly impressed on my memory.

The thermometer must have been several degrees below zero, the passengers were crowded around the stove, some lying down endeavoring to sleep, others standing holding their feet to get warmed, and others who could not get near the fires in consequence of there being no available space for them to creep in, were stamping on the floor, endeavoring by that means to keep the blood in circulation, and cause some degree of warmth to pervade the inferior members, when all in a second, and before any one on board had time to make an exclamation, the cars commenced jumping to such a fearful pitch that the fires in the stoves were knocked about the floor, the lamps were all blown out, and several of the passengers who had been standing around the fires were either tumbled on to those who occupied seats in their immediate vicinity, or compelled to hold on with hands and feet to the nearest benches within reach.

The scene could not have lasted over ten minutes, but to the unfortunate passengers in the cars it was ten of the most terrifically momentous minutes that the human mind could comprehend. The lady passengers (and there were quite a number on board,) sat in their seats with their hands holding on to the benches before them, and their faces presenting the most fearful picture of horror and despair. When the locomotive was got under control, and came to a standstill, the passengers ran to the doors and looked out; and, merciful Heavens! what a sight was presented to the eye?

The train had been running on the verge of a precipice some thirty or forty feet in depth, at the bottom of which was the Missouri river, hearing on its bosom ponderous flakes of ice; nothing to be seen but snow; the wind blowing a penetrating breeze from the north, and the hindermost car careened considerably to the river side, and completely off the track.

The three foremost cars had, through the most providential coincidence, jumped on to the track, and the circumstance was, no doubt, the saving of the lives of all on board, as, had the train kept on even one minute more, it would almost inevitably have gone down the precipice into the river, and all should have perished.

It was some moments after the stoppage of the locomotive before any one on board could speak, and it was only by degrees, and after they felt assured that the train was not yet in motion, that conversation ensued. After a delay of about half an hour, the train again moved, minus the two above-named cars, and in a short time we arrived at Hermann.

THE PRESIDENT AND MASSACHUSETTS.—Massachusetts, through the action of her Legislature, has cast an open affront and indignity upon the Chief Magistrate of the Republic. The following resolution was lately offered in the Lower House:

Resolved, That the recent public attack upon one of the honored and beloved Senators of Massachusetts, by the President of the United States, in a public speech, in the city of Washington, is an insult to the Commonwealth, as unjust as it was undignified and disgraceful, and calls for the indignant rebuke of every patriotic citizen of that State, to whose sons the country is so largely indebted for the salvation of the National Capital, when those, who heard and applauded the attack, were traitorously plotting to plant the standard of treason upon its walls, and to destroy the Constitution and Government.

When such a sentiment exists between a State Government and the Federal Executive, we can hardly boast that harmony prevails in our political system. But Massachusetts being the common scold of the household, must be permitted, we suppose, to rail as much as she pleases.—New York News.

☞ A man named Myers, of Houston, Texas, the Telegraph says, has killed in his life (he is 50 years old) 15,000 deer. His average for many years past has been 670 per year.

MARCH OF CHOLERA.

The doubts which we expressed, in speaking of the Medical Congress at Constantinople, of the sincerity of the Emperor Napoleon, in proposing a meeting of physicians on the cause and treatment of cholera, are confirmed in reference to the history of this fearful epidemic. The stress laid on the occurrence of the disease among the pilgrims to Mecca, would be more forcible if the disease had set on other occasions had its origin in other places, and been developed by other causes. It will doubtless prove interesting to our readers to note its march, and, in doing so, we make large use of the "Report of the College of Physicians, of Philadelphia, in 1832," written by Dr. John Bell, in reply to a request for information on the subject, by the Board of Health. It is distinctly affirmed in the Bengal medical reports that the disease appeared in the Nuddeah and Mymensing districts in May, 1817; raged extensively in June, and, in July, reached Dacca. Before the end of November, few towns or villages, in an area of several thousand miles, escaped an attack. In this month, the grand army was first assailed by this new enemy at Mundelah. Along the whole extent of the Delta of the Ganges, and especially in the tracts bordering on the bloody and Jellingly rivers, the map of population was sensibly diminished by the pestilence. Delhi, the ancient capital of Hindostan, on the western bank of the Jumna, was attacked in June, 1818. After 1817, Calcutta was for a succession of years a regular sufferer from cholera. The same remark applies to Bombay, and, with the exception of two years, to Madras. The disease made its first appearance in the former of these two cities in September, 1818, and in the latter in October, 1818, a little more than one year after it broke out in Calcutta. In less than two years it had embraced a space from the most northern parts of Hindostan to Ceylon, and from the ladies on the west to China on the east. In 1820, cholera showed itself in Cochin China, Tonquin and the Philippine Islands, and at the conclusion of the year was in Canton and the southern parts of China Proper. Pekin, the capital, was assailed in 1821, and also in 1823 and in subsequent years. In Chinese Tartary the disease appeared at two different times, with a considerable period intervening. In July, 1821, the island of Java, and in 1823 the Molucca Islands, were visited by the disease. Persia was subjected to its ravages five different times from 1821 to 1830. In 1822 it was raging in Mesopotamia and Syria, and showed itself at Tiberias, in Judea, in 1824. In September, 1823, the disease appeared in Astracan, at the mouth of the Volga, on the northern shore of the Caspian sea. But it soon subsided here, and did not break out again in any part of the Russian Empire until the close of the year 1829, when the town of Orenburg was attacked. On the last of July, 1830, it again appeared in Astracan, in which city and province the mortality was this time excessive. Near the close of September, of the same year, it was announced as prevailing at Moscow; and at Mecca, in May, 1831; and in June, of the same year, at Archangel and St. Petersburg. It August it had spread to Cairo and Alexandria, in Egypt. Hungary was the theatre of its fearful operations in this year; also, in Berlin and other parts of Prussia it appeared in August; in Vienna it appeared in September; and in Hamburg in October, 1831.

The first place attacked by the cholera in England was Sunderland, a seaport town in the county of Durham. The disease appeared in August, 1831, but excited no alarm until the latter part of the year, soon after which it was in Edinburgh, Glasgow and other towns in Scotland. It appeared in London in February, 1832, and in the spring of the same year in Dublin, Belfast, Cork and other places in Ireland. It struck at once at Paris in April of that year, leaving untouched until afterwards all other parts of France. In June it was ravaging Montreal and Quebec, and by July had, in one leap, lighted on New York city. It invaded Philadelphia and Baltimore in August and Cincinnati and New Orleans in October, 1832—thus taking up twelve years in its march from India to the New World.—Philadelphia Ledger.

THE PROFESSION OF WOMEN.

The delicate constitution and failing health of young girls, the sickness and sufferings of mothers and housekeepers, the miserable quality of seamstresses, the despair of thousands who vainly strive for an honest living, and the awful increase of those who live by vice, are more and more pressed upon public attention. What is the cause of all this? The chief cause is that woman is not trained for her profession, while that profession is socially disgraced. Women are not trained to be housekeepers, nor to be wives, nor to be mothers, nor to be nurses of young children, nor to be nurses of the sick, nor to be seamstresses or domestics. And yet what trade or profession of men involves more difficult and complicated duties than that of a housekeeper?

When parents are poor, the daughters are forced into considerable practical training for future duties, though many a mother fails to the loss of health that her daughters may have all their time for study and school. In the more wealthy classes, the young girl is subjected to a constant stimulus of the brain, involving certain debility of nerves and muscles. While woman's proper business is thus disgraced and avoided, all the excitements of praise, honor, competition and emolument, are given to hook-learning and accomplishments. The little girl who used to be rewarded at school for sewing neatly, and praised when she had made a whole shirt for her father, now is rewarded and praised only for geography, grammar and arithmetic.

The young woman in the next higher school goes on to geometry, algebra and winds up, if able to afford it, with French, music and drawing. Twenty other branches are added to these, not one of them including any practical training for any one woman's distinctive duties. The result is, that in the wealthy classes, a woman no more thinks of earning her living in her true and proper profession, than her brothers do of securing theirs by burglary or piracy. This feeling in the more wealthy classes descends to those less favored by fortune.

THE STATE PRISONERS.

How much longer are the distinguished gentlemen now held as prisoners of State, to be kept in suspense as to their fate? When and how are they to be tried? What disposition is to be made of them? Does not humanity plead for them? Does not justice demand their trial or their release? Does not the genius of our institutions forbid their longer detention as convicts without conviction?

It is time that these questions, so deeply affecting the character of the Government, were decided. For nearly a twelvemonth has Mr. Jefferson Davis been incarcerated in one of the strongholds of the Federal Government, anxiously awaiting a trial, which, though often promised, is ever postponed. Separated from family and friends, this great man has looked vainly, from day to day, for the mandate which would unbar his prison doors, and bid him come forth and defend those political principles of which—although the sincerest of believers—he was but the chosen expunent. What has been gained by this delay? Mr. Davis is neither forgotten nor forsaken. From the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same, petitions are offered for his release. Does not a neglect of the demands of justice but embitter those, who not asking more, cannot be content with less? The footprints of the political prisoners are stains upon the National escutcheon. To some they seem to "appeal from tyranny to God;" and he who suffers "for tenets he would not forsake," becomes "grand of persecution's rage," and will eventually conquer by the martyrdom.

The release of the prisoners of State would do more to restore public confidence and disarm resentment than any political measure which could be adopted. If the doors of their prisons were now thrown open, we believe there is not one who would seek to avoid the issue of a trial whenever his presence might be required. We are convinced that Mr. Davis is most anxious to have tested, in his own person, the questions involved, and would, under no circumstances, avoid the test. Mr. Stephens has been set at liberty. Who will pretend that his release has tended to aught but the growth of "Union sentiments?" So would it be with others. Remove the causes of complaint, and murmurs will cease.

It is said that Admiral Semmes is soon to be released; the Government having decided that his parole protects him from arrest. Why should he be detained an hour longer, if this is the decision; and why should he be an exception! Let this rule be general, why will not the President move boldly onward in the course he has entered upon? Let him be deaf to the clamors of the bloodthirsty Radicals, and restore at once all political prisoners to communion with their families and friends. Their simple parole will insure their attendance for trial whenever it may be required.—New York News, 7th inst.

A MARVELLOUS CAVE STORY.—Skeleton of a Giant Thirty-eight Feet High, with Teeth Ten Inches Long.—A St. Joseph, Mo., correspondent of the St. Louis Republican says that a wonderful cave has been found in the bluffs about a mile above St. Joseph, which has been explored by some of the leading citizens of that place.

Provided with all things necessary, they entered the cavern about 10 A. M. and were gone until 4 P. M., when they returned expressing the greatest wonder, and relating marvels too strange almost for credence. Before proceeding very far they came to a vast and splendid chamber, whose ceilings and sides were adorned with various stalactites of every form and hue, and transparent in their brightness. Fish and beasts and human forms were represented by this brilliant accretion, and massive curtains of it, brilliant in hue, were pendant from the ceiling and hung heavily around the walls. Passing through this vast chamber, they found themselves in a sort of grotto, whose sides were formed of chrystal columns and whose arched ceiling resembled a gorgeous bow of diamonds. Emerging thence, they beheld another hall vaster than the first one and far more gorgeous in all its appointments. Here were niches, columns, recesses, fountains, all arranged as if by the hand of some great artist; and what was stranger still, a sort of low melody seemed to fill all the space. The last thing attributed to the murmur of a chrystal streamlet, which leaped from a portion of the wall and ran into a recess over glittering pebbles. On one side was a raised platform of pure white marble, extending the entire length of the room; and on this platform they discovered a human skeleton of gigantic size and in excellent preservation. Its length, from head to feet, was 38 feet 6 inches. They could not measure the circumference of the head, but it was immense—they should imagine about six feet. Two of the teeth were dislocated, and these they brought to town, and I have seen them. They are now on the counter of the office of the Pacific Hotel, for general inspection. One of them is ten inches in circumference, and the other about six. It is almost impossible to imagine an animal large enough to use such masticators.

THE TRIAL OF ADMIRAL SEMMES.—A letter has been received in this city, from a gentleman in Washington, which states that there is no truth in the report that a naval court had been ordered for the trial of Mr. Semmes, now confined at the Washington Navy Yard. It is the intention of the Government to have that gentleman tried, but there are so many important points involved in the specifications against him, that the authorities are unwilling to take any steps in the matter without giving all the most careful consideration. The charges and specifications, on which it is proposed to try Mr. Semmes, are now held under advisement by the Attorney General; and it is intimated that a conviction on them "would establish a precedent which might operate to the detriment of the country in future wars. It is not unlikely that this hesitation to bring on the trial has been induced by the very able argument which the prisoner submitted to the President a short time since. This document, which has been published, is regarded by many as one of the clearest and most logical legal papers ever prepared. It is not generally known, perhaps, that the Admiral is a thorough-bred lawyer, and that during a brief career as a member of the bar in Alabama he acquired much distinction for professional learning and forensic eloquence. His frequent appearance as Judge Advocate before naval courts-martial prior to his retirement from the United States service, and his assignment to the command of the first Confederate man-of-war, the Sumter, attest his remarkable familiarity also with naval jurisprudence and international law.—Savannah Herald.

☞ The suit of James Hickman, of Huntsville, Ala., against W. B. Bate, late Major General of the Confederate army, for damages set at $25,000, on account of arrest at Huntsville, Ala., under orders from Gen. Bragg, in December, 1862, is now pending in the courts at Nashville. The circumstances of his arrest are substantially these: Hickman, alleged to be a blockade runner, in violation of the Commander-in-Chief of the Confederate army of Tennessee, was arrested on the information of citizens of his own town. He was tried on this charge and acquitted. Subsequently, he was again arrested, on a presentation of a Huntsville grand jury, for treason to the Confederate States. Gen. Bate prosecuted the case, and ex-Confederate Secretary of War, L. Pope Walker, defended. At the close of the revolutionary struggle, Hickman sued out an attachment on the property of Gen. Bate, to cover $25,000 worth of damages. This case is a peculiar one, involving many nice points of law, and will most probably be taken before the Supreme Court for final decision. It would be singularly strange if Gen. Bate, being a paroled soldier, is to suffer damages for carrying out an order from his superior, Gen. Bragg, when the same parole protects the originator of the order.—Memphis Avalanche.

THE TEXAS CONVENTION.—The Texas Convention is now in session, and we may learn by telegraph at any moment that she has come into the Union on the same terms as all the Southern States. Texas is the last of the erring sisters to be heard from, and when she makes her peace the proper time will have arrived for President Johnson to issue a proclamation declaring the Union restored. Mr. Seward said in his speech on the 22d ult. that the President could do so at any time. With the action of the Texas Convention the opportunity will come. All the States will then be reconstructed within themselves, and Mr. Johnson can with good grace proclaim the Union fully restored, and wash his hands of the whole affair, leaving the odium upon the Radical Congress of preventing its complete reconstruction. The President has done his work well so far in the direction of peace, unity and a restored industry. Congress has done the work of Satan in keeping the country revolutionized, distracted, and, as far as the South is concerned, impoverished.—N. Y. Herald, 7th inst.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF DICKENS.—A London correspondent of the New York Tribune gives the following description of Charles Dickens, who was 54 years of age on the 7th ult.:

He is on the short side of middle height; his hair and beard almost or quite gray—the latter worn after the French or American fashion, with shaven cheeks; the former brought forward and, I should think, elaborately oiled. His eyes are dark, handsome and vivacious, the lines below and about them deeply defined; the eyebrows appeared thick and arched on semi-circularity, though this might be from his mobility of features in reading. His nose is of no particular recognized order, odd and full at the nostrils, the humorous line running from them to the corners of the mouth very marked and noticeable. His complexion is not very clear, and reddish about the rather sunken cheeks. He dresses in good taste, quietly, with dainty linen.

KEEP HORSES' FEET AND LEGS IN ORDER.—If I were asked to account for my horses' legs and feet being in better order than those of my neighbor, I should attribute it to the four following circumstances: First, they are all shod with a few nails, so pinced in the shoe as to permit the foot to expand every time they move; second, that they all live in boxes instead of stalls, and can move whenever they please; third, they spend two hours daily, walking exercise when they are not at work; and fourth, that I have not a headstall or track chain in my stalls. These four circumstances comprehend the whole mystery of keeping horses' legs fine, and their feet in sound working condition up to old age.

A SMART LAD.—A lad from the country was recently taken into a gentleman's family. One evening after having been called up into the drawing-room, he came down into the kitchen laughing immoderately. "What is the matter?" cried the cook. "Why," said he, "there are twelve on 'em up there, who could not snuff the candle, and they had to ring for I to do it."

A GOVERNMENT TROUBLE.

It is but a few months since the British elections were held, and the Government triumphed to such an extent that it was supposed that nothing could shake the hold of the party in power. But Parliament was scarcely got into session before a cause, which is not political, which was unlooked for, which no statesman could foretell, and which none knew how to deal with, has caused suffering and discontent throughout the kingdom—which, for want of any other scapegoat, is threatened to be turned against the Government. The ravages of the cattle disease are carrying ruin and misery throughout England. Up to the beginning of February there had been 120,740 cases of this disease reported to Government, and doubtless there were many instances in which no report was made. Of the large number of cattle attacked with this pestilence, but very few have recovered. Science seems to be unable to deal with it, and all the remedies and preventatives yet tried seem to be unavailing. The terror has been so great, that large numbers of cattle not affected with the disease, have been slaughtered and hurried off to the market, where the price of beef has risen to the rate of sixty-two cents per pound, in gold. The English farmers are generally tenantry, who own no land, who have to pay high rents, and whose only wealth is in flocks and herds, and the crops which they cultivate. What a fire would be to a merchant or manufacturer who has no insurance, the cattle disease is to them. Many of them have been reduced to poverty and oppressed by high rents and heavy taxes. It is no wonder that some of them have become insane. Their troubles seem to have deprived them of reason. They blame the Government for the calamity, alleging that proper means have not been taken to guard against the introduction of the murrain, or to prevent its spreading, and to cure it. And yet it seems unjust to blame the authorities for this misfortune. Veterinary science seems to be powerless either to ward against the disease or to remedy it. The idea that the malady was the small-pox, and might be disarmed of its terrors by vaccination, has been proved upon trial to be incorrect. The cattle still die, and against the ravages of the scourge England seems to be helpless. The same misfortune is bearing against Scotland, and on the Continent, in Belgium and Germany. The people of the latter countries, however, seem to be more sensible than the English; they submit to the visitation, which is mysterious and dreadful, and they do not suppose that the remedy is to be gained by a change of rulers. The matter is one in which rich and poor are alike interested, and no class would be so foolish and inhuman as to care not for the distresses of others, which must also in a certain degree affect themselves.

A STRANGE SPECIMEN OF HUMANITY.

Twelve years ago a family named Sawyer, living in the town of Westbrook, were surprised to find that a very superior new milch cow, carefully kept in their stables, was "drying up." This continued until Mrs. Sawyer discovered, some time after, the prints of human fingers in the soap grease barrel in the stable. Communicating this discovery to her husband, he procured help from the neighbors and a thorough search of the stable followed. An examination of the hay-mow disclosed a small hole, which, being followed up by pitching away the hay, led to a sort of den-like place in the interior of the mow. Here was found a strange being, a man apparently of about 24 years, half clothed in rags, shockingly filthy, and having no feet. One foot was missing just above the ankle; the other was gone a little higher up, the stump terminating in an oblong way, and in a manner showing that it was not the work of a surgeon nor had it received the attention of a surgeon when lost. His face and head were of average intelligence, but not a word could he get from him. He had lived there a number of weeks, subsisting on the milk of the cow and the grease. He was turned over to the town authorities and placed in the poor-house, where he now is and has been for the past twelve years.

All attempts to solve the mystery concerning this strange being have proved futile. No one has been found yet who ever saw or heard of him, and during the whole twelve years he has never uttered a word. Various expedients have been tried to loose his tongue. On one occasion he was given a bottle containing a pint of whisky. He seemed to understand exactly what it was, for he placed it to his lips and drank the whole at a draught, but it had no perceptible effect upon him. In manner, habits, etc., he is like a wild beast. In the summer he is kept in a sort of a wooden, cage-like structure in the yard. He is very shy of strangers, and will hide his head in his blankets when they approach. His quarters are comfortable, and it is impossible to give him better, for sanitary reasons.

Where the creature came from is certainly a mysterious matter. He could not have walked from a distance, as he crawls upon his knees very slowly. The only theory attempted is this: A few weeks before the man was discovered, the steamer Sarah Sands arrived at this port from Liverpool with a large number of emigrants. It is conjectured that this being might have been a burden to some one over the water. Mr. Sawyer (since deceased) hauled aload home from the steamer's wharf at that time, and it is reasoned that the man might have been clandestinely added to his load, and from thence have crept into his stable.—Portland (Me.) Argus.

AN EXTRACT FOR YOUNG MEN.—Show a manly forgetfulness of self in the work of life, or rather, a true spirit of self-devotement. This is perfectly consistent with the highest self-respect, for it is the very best and most honorable thing we can do with ourselves. We are placed in this world not merely to live, but to live to some good purpose. He whose great concern is to take care of his own precious self, who will not on any account incur risk to life, or health, or reputation, will be likely to accomplish very little good. "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it." All honor to the noble youth who can stand up among jeering companions, and frankly say, "I must be excused, for I know it will grieve my mother," or, "I must not do this, for it is not right." Always have the courage to do right, to speak and act according to your honest convictions of truth and duty, whatever others may think of you.

Let your thoughts be engaged upon the thing you wish to accomplish, and not upon yourself. What can the speaker do who comes before his audience with his mind full, not of his subject but of himself, thinking all the time of the appearance he is making? If you have really anything important to say to your fellow-men, for their benefit, they will listen to you with attention. But few care to listen to a speaker whose chief aim is manifestly is to make an exhibition of himself for his own credit. We employ a doctor to cure us, a lawyer to gain our cause; and he best establishes his own reputation who so entirely forgets himself as to direct the whole force of his mind to the accomplishment of the object in hand.

GREAT FLOOD AT OIL CITY—DAMAGE FROM THE WATER AND ICE.—The ice on Oil Creek, Pa., gave way on Saturday last, with a tremendous crash, sweeping before it derricks, engine houses, workshops, and everything upon the banks. The floating mass of ice gorged about twenty rods above the bridge, and thus afforded the inhabitants of the shanties along the creek below the bridge sufficient time to move their furniture and goods. The bridge over the creek was swept away, together with three or four houses at the east end. The eastern part of the town was completely inundated, the water in the lower parts being from six to eight feet deep. The river was full of floating oil barges which had broken loose at various points above, and the destruction of property was fearful. The damage at Petroleum Centre is reported to have been very heavy.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

ALL FOR TWO CENTS.—The Treasury Department, in settling a balance of two cents due to Erastus Foote, sent a draft to him worded and numbered as follows:

"Draft 2950 on Treasury warrant, Treasury of the United States, No. 1954, Washington, January 8, 1866. At sight, pay to Erastus Foote, Collector and Disbursing Agent, or order, two cents, F. E. Spinner, Treasurer of the United States. Recorded January 8, 1866. S. B. Colby, Register of the Treasury, Assistant Treasury United States, Boston, Massachusetts." On this important document there were seven signatures, and all for two cents. The gentleman who owned the draft was offered a dollar for it this morning, but said he would not sell it for five dollars.—Boston Traveller.

COMMENCEMENT EXERCISES AT THE UNIVERSITY OF LOUISIANA.

DR. WARREN STONE'S ADDRESS TO THE STUDENTS.

The medical department of the above University held its annual commencement exercises Thursday, in the College building, on Common street. A large number of visitors were present, including a good proportion of the loveliest of the fair sex.

At 12 o'clock, Dr. Richardson, Dean of the Faculty, announced that the President of the University, Dr. Thomas Hunt, would take the chair. He then read the following list of graduates, whom the Faculty recommended as worthy of the degree of Doctor of Medicine:

Solomon C. Martin, Miss; Isaac L. Van Zandt, Texas; Orange H. Spence, Miss; Miss A. Rowan, Miss; Frederick V. Hopkins, La; Wm. B. Romer, Ala; Franklin D. Mabry, Miss; Chas. C. Baker, Texas; Robt. J. Dorr, Miss; S. L. Henry, Va; R. P. Thomas, La; P. W. Coleman, Miss; Wm. G. Westmore, La; Thos. J. Aby, La; Thos. H. Wickliffe, Ky; C. C. Walker, Texas; Sidney M. Abbey, Miss; Frank McLean, Miss; Marion A. Baldwin, Ga; Jno. B. Drake, Miss; Joseph H. McCormick, La; Andrew P. Harris, Miss; Jas. T. Alford, Miss; Saml. Walker, Ga; Daul. B. Mcinnis, Miss; Jno. S. Compton, La; Chas. H. Lee, Miss; Chas. E. Kenson, La; Penn Crain, La; Jules Font, La; Chas. Whelan, Ala; Jno. E. Hardy, ——; Chas. E. Franklin, Ala; Rufus A. Watkins, Texas; Eliab Fox, Miss.

The gentlemen named rose to their feet as their names were called; and while thus standing, the President conferred upon them the degree in a solemn and impressive manner.

Dr. Stone then delivered to the graduates the valedictory on the part of the Faculty. He apologized for not having a well and carefully written address to deliver on the occasion, but his time was so completely occupied with the duties of his profession, that he had not the hours to spare necessary for such a task. But he would make some practical remarks that might be useful to them. He reminded them that their studies, so far from being ended, now that they were about to leave the college, were but just begun. They must seek to make their own all that they had learned from others. Enter energetically upon the practice of medicine—seek out patients, and regard every case as a matter of special study. Practice among the poor—the reward therefor will come some day; it will be as bread cast upon the waters; its present benefits will be in the sweet consciousness of doing good and at the same time acquiring reputation and skill. Give most earnest attention to understand the history of each case—watch it in its progress and carefully study what are the proper remedies and how to apply them. It is only by constant exercise in this way that the knowledge already acquired can be retained and increased. For instance, in auscultation, it is only by practice that the ear can acquire that acuteness which distinguishes the skillful from the unskillful physician. This acuteness of ear enables the physician to detect disease in its incipiency, and by applying some simple remedy, arrest its progress; whereas, had the disease continued in the system undiscovered but two or three days longer, the consequences would have been serious; complications would have arisen, and the power of the physician to control its progress perhaps entirely lost. In pneumonia this is especially the case.

Be faithful to duty. Remember that while dereliction in this respect is reprehensible in commercial life as well as in the profession of medicine, the one involves the loss of dollars only, but the other often the loss of life. The physician who fails to do all that he can do for the patient under his care, should not be held guiltless of the consequences. The pursuit of medicine is a noble one, having for its chief object the amelioration of suffering, the promotion of health, and the prolongation of life. To accomplish such ends, the practitioner should improve every moment of his time—not so much in reading, though that is important, but in close observation; this will most certainly lead to success. The best read physicians are by no means the most successful. Two or three good Reviews will supply all the current professional knowledge needed, with, of course, the purchasing of an occasional standard work for purposes of reference. Let the mind dwell on the cases in hand, and be sure to observe everything having a bearing thereon. Be not anxious to acquire more theoretic knowledge than there is opportunity to apply; seize and fix in your mind that which is most essential. Memory is not a gift—it is a faculty to be cultivated by use, and its activity or dullness depends on its use or disuse. Let all the facts acquired by study and observation be frequently turned over in the mind that they may be fixed and retained; for, in the practice of medicine, cases of emergency frequently spring up which need the instant application of that skill and knowledge which should be already acquired. In matters relating to surgery this is especially important.

Physicians have it in their power to do much good by instructing the people with regard to the preservation of health, counselling them in matters of air, exercise and diet. Many diseases may be warded off from communities in this way. If those inheriting consumptive constitutions were properly attended to from early years by wisely regulating their food, and exercise, and occupation, he was satisfied that that fell destroyer of the loveliest and brightest of our race would be effectually driven from the land. The regulation of diet needed much attention. He believed that there was really more suffering among our Southern people from eating too little than eating too much, especially among young ladies. Much of their debility was owing to this cause. He urged the necessity of disciplining the weak and feeble to eat nourishing animal food. There were cases, of course, where low diet was essential, as in those of full habit, whose digestive organs make blood too fast; but these are exceptions. Upon the subject of quackery, the Doctor warned the graduates to abolish it in their practice; to have no mystery or secrets about their treatment of patients. It was his practice, generally, to tell the patient plainly of his condition, how he would treat the case, and what medicines he was giving. Never prescribe till the case in hand is fully understood. Be not anxious to heap up prescriptions in order to make a presentable bill to your patients; be as ready to charge for an opinion given as for dirty drugs. He himself once charged a man a double fee for an opinion, to whom he had not given any physic. It was in this way: the man consulted him with regard to his health; his advice to the man was, "take no medicine whatever;" he was not satisfied with this simple advice, and an explanation had to be given in order to convince him; and for this additional trouble he charged the double fee. The Doctor concluded by expressing the gratification of the Faculty at the diligence and worthiness of the graduates while they had been students of the College.

Dr. Thomas Aby was then called upon to deliver the valedictory on the part of the graduating class; and for half an hour he held in thrall the attention of the audience with a most eloquent address, remarkable alike for its fine rhetoric, its high-toned sentiments and its practical good sense. But for the limit we are obliged to observe in our report, because of the press of other matter in our columns to day, we would be pleased to publish a synopsis of this young gentleman's very excellent address.

This ended the exercises of the commencement.

SAND IN COTTON.—A Louisville paper says: "Five bales of cotton were opened on the premises of the Suffolk Manufacturing Company in this city yesterday, the bales containing nine hundred and eighty-seven pounds of sand. Each bale had a bag of sand in the centre, extending near the end. Two of them had two bags in each one. There were 216 pounds of sand in one bale. The amount found in the five bales, at 47c. per pound, would cost $463 89—a high price for this commodity. This sand must have been put in when baled on the plantation, before being pressed."

MEXICO IN CONGRESS.

Congress has admitted and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs a resolution that the Government shall guarantee the principal and interest of a Mexican loan of fifty millions; that it shall assume before the world the position of financial sponsor to the sister Republic. The introduction and reference of this resolution puts the Mexican question in a practical shape in the hands of an appropriate committee. It will give that committee an opportunity to make one of the most significant reports of the session, and it will afford the occasion for Congress to fully lay before the world the views of the American people—the real position of the country on this great topic.

It is for all reasons desirable that this should be done. France has declared her position, and given the world without what her peculiar interpretations of international comity. She has had nearly a monopoly of this positive utterance, and the consequence is that while the world has heard all her justification of her acts and understands her clearly, it does not understand us so well. Even in the French Government, there seems to be a very vague and indefinite notion of our ideas on this subject. The press here has spoken freely, and the people have been heard through the resolution in all their platforms, but the official declaration has not been sufficiently distinct, except in one instance, when the last Congress declared that this Government never would acknowledge the empire. The House Committee of Foreign Affairs should therefore handle the subject strongly, and put before the world in positive terms, the view that the American people take of the whole history of this establishment of a hostile monarchy at our doors. It is time, now that the whole history of this movement is known, to declare ourselves openly in relation to it, lest by silence we may encourage our enemies with the notion that we are disposed to overlook any point in their iniquitous scheme.

Whatever Congress may do with the resolution as it stands, its admission seems to indicate a disposition to adopt some positive measure on this subject. If we help Mexico by the guarantee of her loan, and especially if we do this in consideration of any remission of duties in our favor, or of a cession of territory, it will be a cheap way in which to accomplish the purpose. And we may do this, and a great deal more than this, without any complication of our European relations; for certainly if France may cross the Atlantic to sustain Maximilian, and expect us not to take offence, we may assist in a way quite as practical, without giving her any cause of complaint. If Congress shall make such a declaration, the Mexican question will require no other solution.—New York Herald, 7th inst.

THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN CONFEDERATION.

The project of uniting all the British North American Provinces in one grand confederation, which was agitated last year, and fell through by the opposition of the Lower Provinces, is revived with the prospect of early success. At a banquet which took place a day or two since in Cornwall, Upper Canada, where the principal Canadian Ministers were present and made speeches, this subject was put forward in a tone of confident prediction, as if no doubt was entertained of an immediate favorable result. The influence of the Imperial Government has been brought to bear on the Lower Provinces, and it is expected that the union will be consummated at an early day.

One of the most powerful causes of the new impetus given to this project, is the failure to procure the renewal or extension of the reciprocity treaty. The geographical position of the upper provinces, which stretch along behind a belt of our States interposed between them and the ocean, renders intercourse with us, and transit for their products through our territory, a commercial necessity. If they cannot obtain it by treaty, there is a strong temptation to acquire its advantages by annexation. The confederation is one of the means of counterveiling this tendency. If consummated, it will foster National spirit, and the pride of independence; for nobody supposes that so populous and extensive a country, united under one Government, can long remain a dependency of a foreign crown. Great Britain thinks the United States are already too large and powerful for the general balance of power. She would, under any circumstances, object to our further growth by annexation. She has much stronger objections to our enlargement at her expense. She has no expectation of holding Canada permanently; she regards it as certain that her North American colonies will be ultimately annexed to the United States, or ultimately independent. She can concede their independence without loss of prestige; and, by that means, establish an allied nation as a partial counterpoise to the United States. This, at present, is the leading object of her American policy. She is doing all in her power to favor a spirit of self-importance, and to promote the desire of independence in her North American possessions. She encourages them to exercise some of the highest functions of sovereign nations. Her ministers and agents are allowed to go to Washington and negotiate directly for reciprocity, without any appearance of responsibility except to the colonial Government. In all matters of domestic legislation she leaves them perfectly free. By the projected union, their thoughts will be strongly turned towards independence; and she can easily direct their national aspirations toward a throne, to be filled by one of the sons of Victoria.

If there are germs of an annexation party in the Upper Provinces, there are none in the Lower. But if Canada should be annexed, the feeble Lower Provinces could not expect long to escape absorption by so powerful a neighbor. When the United States should come to own the territory on both sides of the St. Lawrence, they would naturally covet the Provinces that guard the entrance to its mouth and lie on the gulf into which it empties. In view of the danger of ultimate annexation, resulting from the loss of the reciprocity treaty, a successful appeal can be made to the loyalty and British feeling of the Lower Provinces in favor of the confederation; and we shall probably witness, this spring, the completion of an arrangement fraught with important consequences in the future history of this continent.—N. Y. World, 7th inst.

GOSSIP FROM RUSSIA.—The Emperor of Russia has issued a decree intended to strengthen the Russian element in the Western Provinces of the Empire, where the Poles have hitherto been in the ascendant, but where they are now forbidden to acquire landed property, except by inheritance. It was reported to the Emperor of a special commission that in these nine provinces the inhabitants are principally Little Russians, White Russians and Lithuanian-Samogitians but that the minority being composed principally of landed proprietors, gives a Polish character to the country, and prevents the remainder of the population from deriving any benefit from the numerous reforms introduced by the imperial Government.

The possession of nearly all the landed property by a class which forms a close corporation in reality excludes the Russians from these provinces; and the commission was of opinion that the Government should have recourse to a measure which, by preventing individuals of Polish origin from purchasing property in this part of the country, would deprive this class of the possibility of gaining additional strength. Hence this ukase.

The new press-law of Russia has given an impetus to periodical publications, and several new ones are advertised, the most promising being the Moscow Gazette, a political journal, which will appear in the ancient capital; and a review, to be called the Europeen Messenger, which will be edited by two of the most distinguished professors of the University of St. Petersburg. The Journal de St. Petersburg will, for the future, run alone, and assume the responsibility of its own actions.

☞ Stephen Girard, than whom no shrewder business man ever lived, used to say: "I have always considered advertising liberally and long to be the great medium of success in business, and the prelude to wealth. And I have made an invariable rule, too, to advertise in the dullest times as well as the busiest, long experience having taught me that money thus spent is well laid out; as by keeping my business continually before the public, it has secured me many sales that I would otherwise have lost."

☞ George W. Smythe, member of the Texas Convention, from Jasper, and Col. J. W. Dancy, an old and respectable citizen of Fayette, died recently in that State.

THE COMING PROCLAMATION.

It is stated that the President has prepared a proclamation declaratory of the restoration of peace, and the right of the Southern States and people to representation in the National Legislature. Mr. Johnson could not select a better time than the present to issue a proclamation. The people expect it, demand it; it will be hailed with acclamations by the masses everywhere, except to those New England districts where the popular mind has been completely perverted by the teachings of fanaticism. The Radicals are losing heart. They would not rail so violently against the President if they did not feel his power and fear it. They are conscious that the verdict of the people is against them, and that the supremacy that they gained from the opportunities offered by civil strife is vanishing from their grasp. The fever is over, the passions engendered by war are subsiding, the multitudes are yielding to the influence of reason, and appreciate the policy that is due to the emergencies of the hour. The incendiary appeals of demagogues fall, if not unheeded, at least impatiently, on the public ear. All men who reflect calmly upon the situation acknowledge the wisdom and statesmanship of the Executive action, and the country is ready to support its Chief Magistrate in the consummation of his plan of reconstruction.

Such being the popular sentiment, let Mr. Johnson take advantage of it to push the political war with vigor. The bluster of the Radicals betrays their weakness. They require the stimulants of noisy wrath to sustain them from drooping at the very crisis of the conflict. They exhibit all the symptoms of desperation, and, after the first ebullition of their frenzy, will come their exhaustion, their hopelessness and complete discomfiture. The President can gain nothing, may lose much, by temporizing. His enemies do not spare him; let him not spare them. He has to deal with fanatics who will use every weapon within their reach to annoy, to weaken and to crush him. But, supported by the popular will, he wields an influence that can put down all opposition. He has taken up the gauntlet; now let him call to his aid all the decision and energy of his character, and push the battle to an end.—N. Y. News, 3d inst.

STRANGE DISCOVERIES.

The Shasta (California) Courier has a long article about two Portuguese arriving in town from a prospective tour, bringing rich specimens with them. The direction they had been is indicated west by south of Shasta, where they had seen much snow, many deer, bear and other game. They made a discovery of a vast cave, and endeavored to penetrate it with pitch pine torches, but their light gave out before they had discovered its extent. The marks of various kinds of animals were distinctly seen as far as they went, and, being enough to find a termination, returned to make preparations on a larger scale. On the second attempt at exploration, the Courier says:

"Arrived back at the point from which they had started, they determined to pack a small mule they had with them with blankets, a little provisions and a great deal of pitch pine, and, fully arming themselves, again started. Thus equipped, they resumed their search more leisurely and with renewed confidence, and were soon beyond the point of their former exploration and at least a mile on their subterranean travels.

"Close examination of the trail they were on, satisfied them that the place had been travelled by Indians, and hence they came to the conclusion that there might be an outlet somewhere in advance of them. Soon their progress became more difficult, the passage narrowing in some places so as to make it difficult to squeeze the little mule through, and then it would open out on a scale so grand, that their lights failed to reveal anything but walls of darkness. As yet, no living thing had presented itself to disturb the monotony or the darkness, and the poor fellows began to think that they might be on the route to the lower regions. Soon, however, on turning an angle in the trail, a glimpse of daylight was had, and after a few minutes, a scene burst upon them such as to strike with wonder and awe the beholders. Even the mule manifested surprise at the scene presented.

"They stood on the bank of a subterranean stream of great volume and rapidity of current, as wide as the Sacramento—or about 200 feet—and of great depth, apparently. The bank on either side was sloping, and covered with a rank growth of rushes and coarse bunch grass. The scene was lighted up by an aperture in the mountain overhead, seemingly some hundred feet above them, and to the eye apparently no larger than an ordinary mining shaft. The opening at the base seemed from 40 to 60 rods—the whole presenting the appearance of a vast tunnel inverted. Lying about them were the bones of animals that had evidently been killed for food by Indians, the indications of old camp fires being plenty all around. The water was pure and pleasant to the taste, having no unusual flavor.

"Finding no road to travel onward, nor a boat for interoal navigation, they returned to the place from whence they started. On their return they examined more closely the sides, and when they could, the top of this wonderful opening. They found the walls of hard granite, occasionally of a shelly or broken character, but generally so firm as to cause no fears of its falling. They noticed several quartz veins that were cut by the vast tunnel, but saw no great indications of wealth about them. In fact, they say they felt somewhat in a hurry to get away, and did not care to spend the time necessary to minute examination. They will return about the 1st of May, and say that they will take pleasure in showing to the curious the wonders they have discovered."

The location of the above cave, says the Red Bluff Independent, is supposed to be in the vicinity of Yolly Bolly, almost directly west of Red Bluff. At least a cave was discovered in that locality by a hunter last summer, who explored it as far as half a box of matches would carry him. An Indian who accompanied him tried to dissuade him from going near the cave, stating that it led to the everlasting hunting grounds of his tribe, and that if the hunter persisted, he would be a dead man. Another Indian who accompanied the party, but was not present when the hunter explored the entrances to the cave, corroborated the statement of the first, and added that none living had ever entered that cave and come out alive. The revelations made by the Portuguese in the above story will lead many to explore the whole of the Yolly Bolly region next summer.

ARMED BLACKS—DISARMED WHITES.

The information that some ten thousand negro troops are soon to be mustered out of the United States service at Fortress Monroe, has excited much apprehension in the minds of the citizens of Virginia.

The municipal authorities of Petersburg have appointed a committee to wait on Gov. Pierpont, to induce him to apply to the Federal Government for a revocation of the order; or, at least, a modification of it in so far as it permits the colored soldiers to retain their arms when discharged. It is urged, with great reason, that the letting loose of so large a body of armed blacks upon the community can only lead to disorder and violence, riot and bloodshed. The aversion of the negro to labor is well known to those familiar with his character. The life of a soldier is not calculated to overcome his fondness for indolence and ease. In former years, clothed and fed by his master from infancy to age, nursed in sickness, and but a moderate amount of toil exacted when in health, he passed from the comfort of plantation life to the glorious pomp and circumstance of war. Clad with the gorgeous trappings of the Federal soldier, liberally supplied with money and rations, vested with a little brief authority, his passions inflamed and his body pampered, he will turn reluctantly from the pleasures of the camp to the toil of the farm. Absence from the negro quarter and the supervision of the overseer, though exchanged for "equality" with the white man, has not improved his morals nor increased his gentleness. Even when under the restraint of the "articles of war," the licentiousness of the barracks developed his brutal instincts; and discipline failed to suppress their outbreak.

Wherever negro garrisons have been placed since the surrender of the Confederate armies, the zealous efforts of well disposed Federal officers have not always succeeded in checking turbulence and preventing outrages by their troops; as witnessed at Goinmhus, Georgia, and elsewhere. Such are the men who now, as discharged United States soldiers, are to be turned loose, with arms in their hands, upon those whom the malevolent teachings of fanatics have taught the black to consider as his natural enemies who deprived him of liberty, and who now withhold property which is his by conquest, if by no other right. Will the discharged negro soldier go industriously to work to earn in the tollsome pursuits of peace the support which has hitherto been gained so easily? Will not idleness drive him to waot; want to desperation; desperation to violence? The negro will not work when he can steal, and his thieving propensities have had ample scope in the army.

In view of these facts we consider the apprehension of the people of Virginia as not altogether groundless. The massing of dissolute negroes, without restraint, in any section of the country will lead to evil results. We trust that they may be so distributed, that they may be enabled, and if necessary forced, to labor, and thus be a blessing not a scourge to the desolate fields of the South. The whites are without arms, let the blacks be deprived of theirs—this alone will lesson their power and confidence. This is a matter worthy the careful consideration of the President.—New York News, 6th inst.

CHEERING NEWS.

As the subject of the crops in Southern States is a very important one at present, we give our readers all reliable testimony regarding it that comes into our possession. A friend, who is a very practical and observant gentleman, has just returned to this city from a business trip to the North, coming by short stages on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad from Columbus, Ky. This route led him through the most fertile sections of the States of Tennessee and Mississippi, and a small portion of Kentucky and Alabama, and our informant says he has never seen better evidences that a full crop would be made, than were everywhere observable. There seemed to be no lack of labor, and both black and white field-hands were at work with vigor and cheerfulness. After the reports that he had heard and read, he could not fail to be astonished at these cheering signs of social reorganization and honest enterprise.

Our friend was impressed with the same fact that has been so frequently mentioned of late in the Southern agricultural magazines, viz: That a majority of the planters are devoting their energies and the little capital left them by the war, to the almost exclusive cultivation of cotton, thus neglecting to raise corn, hogs and other plantation supplies. We hope that no evil will result from this policy, as many writers on the subject anticipate; but if by any sad mischance the cotton crop should again fail, our planters would be left without means of procuring subsistence for their laborers or stock. It is not too late, however, to attend to this matter yet.

The reports which reach us respecting the crops in Texas are very encouraging, and a contemporary learns that a new source of revenue is developing itself there, the people of the Lone Star State having "struck ile." The springs of petroleum are situated on the Angelina and Neches rivers, in several of the counties of Eastern Texas. They are said to flow freely and the oil is very pure. Northern capitalists have purchased large tracts of the land.

EXTRAORDINARY STORY.

The following statement has been made by Captain Casey, the late commander and only survivor of the crew of the British ship Jane Lenden, laden with timber, from Quebec for Fulmouth, who was rescued from the water-logged ship by the Dutch bark Ida Elizabeth, of Rotterdum, from Batavia for Amsterdam:

"We sailed from Quebec on the 28th of November. Nothing particular occurred until December 20th, in latitude 37 deg. 47 min. At eight A. M. a fresh wind from the southwest, which increased to a gale at noon; the barometer 28 6. The gale increased, and at six P. M. a complete hurricane; all hands at the pumps, the ship straining heavily, and making great quantities of water.

On the 21st still blowing a hurricane, the ship making more water, the pumps not able to keep her free, sea making a fair breach over her, and all hands lashed on the pumps. At noon, a heavy sea struck the ship on the starboard side, smashing three boats and washing them overboard, with all the fresh water and every movable article on deck. Sounded the pumps and found five feet of water in the hold; at the time running with close reefed topsail and reefed foresail before the hurricane. Tried to take the foresail in, but it blew to ribbons; all hands commenced at the pumps again. At 6:30 P. M., in spite of every exertion, the ship was full of water, the sea burying the hull, and all hands obliged to take to the rigging. At midnight the gale abated, the barometer rising fast.

On the 22d, at 10 A. M., the weather being moderate, the crew were able to leave the tops and get on deck, commenced finding provisions, and got bread and butter, potatoes and some turnips into the top. At noon it commenced to blow very hard from the south-west to north—myself again compelled to take to the top. At 6 P. M. the gale increased to a hurricane, causing the sea to rise fearfully, which struck the ship, heaving her on her beam ends with her masts in the water, washing all hands into the water, seventeen in number. Nine of the number at once met a watery grave; myself and the remaining seven, with a hard struggle, regained the wreck. By this time the bowsprit, foremast, and topgallant-masts were carried away with the sea.

The remaining part of the crew got on the ship's side, and there secured themselves as well as they could. In about one hour and twenty minutes, the squall being over, the ship rolled to an upright position, and we again took to the maintop, but to our sorrow found all the provisions we had saved were washed away, the cabin forecastle washed overboard, and nothing left on board in the shape of provisions. At half-past 4 P. M., the whole of the stern frame came out, taking the rudder and stern post with it, the cargo coming out very fast. On the 23d the weather moderated, and nothing particular occurred until the 6th day of January, when one of the crew, named Alfred Bolton, fell from exhaustion, and at nine o'clock the same evening he died, and the next morning we committed his body to the deep, having been fourteen days without food of any description.

On the 7th one more, William Thomas, a native of Wales, died; and in spite of all I could do the men would drink salt water, which drove them mad. On the day after (the 8th) four more died from exhaustion, cold and hunger, leaving me and the carpenter alone. We were so much exhausted that we could not move the bodies into the sea, so we lowered them on the deck of the vessel. On the 10th the carpenter died, I being then the only survivor; and on the next day, as well as I could, I lowered the body on the ship's deck. On the 23d of January I was taken off the wreck, after being there twenty-eight days without food of any description, by the Dutch bark Ida Elizabeth, of Rotterdam, from Batavia for Amersterdam.—Mobile Times, 13th inst.

FOREIGN APPRECIATION OF PRESIDENT JOHNSON.—In the British Parliament, in the course of the debate upon the Queen's speech, the Earl of Derby said:

We must concur in rejoicing that, after years of bloody warfare, sanguinary war has been put an end to in the now reunited States of America. I fully concur with the speech in commending the wise and prudent manner in which, after the war had terminated, the President has sought to repair the ravages of civil war. He seems to seek the best means of restoring the tranquility of the country, and we cannot refrain from hoping that his efforts will be crowned with success. The diminution of the slave trade and the abolition of slavery in America has entailed much misery on the slaves themselves, and they are but very imperfectly prepared to undertake the duties and responsibilities of freedom.

Ex-Senator Wigfall is reported to have escaped from Texas, to his heard of next, no doubt, from the Confederate settlement at Cordava, Mexico.

THE DANGER OF OUR PRESENT POSITION.

Congress is uncertain of its position, its duties, its powers. It is full of a factious, restless, revolutionary spirit. It seems to have thrown away the old Government—to have cut loose from the Constitution. Great wars necessarily suspended the operation of law to a certain extent and justify the use of extreme or doubtful powers: but a wise Legislature would lose no opportunity to relinquish a doubtful position that it had assumed, for the public good, and take once more its natural place in the circle of government. Congress, on the contrary, is determined not to relinquish the position that the war gave it. Its whole struggle is to hold that position, and to prevent, by every means, a return to the harmonious, quiet, natural operation of the old system. Its revolutionary disposition and purpose is most clearly seen in its propositions to change the Constitution of the country. Some thirty or forty amendments are before it which, if adopted, would completely do away with the system under which the United States have been so prosperous, and would change our Government in nearly every feature. Congress assumes that the Constitution is a nullity. It ignores the Constitutional distribution of powers. It has taken the position of the Supreme Court, to interpret the Constitution by party vote. It has made its Central Directory—its Committee of Fifteen—an Executive, to supersede the President. It has threatened to impeach him, also. In all ways it assumes superiority to the law, and is not a Congress under the Constitution, but a faction governing in defiance of that instrument.

It is from this very point in their history that free Governments tumble into despotism. At some weak hour when, for one cause or another, faction prevails and law is superseded, and faction daily grows worse till a political chaos seems imminent, then some strong hand seizes all, and an unscrupulous leader goins the confidence of the people by putting the factions under his foot, and a little later, in virtue of that very confidence, put liberty in the same place. This is the history of a thousand republics taken from that very point in their career at which we now stand in ours. The fall begins when faction supersedes the Government and partisan passion takes the place of law. This was the history of liberty in Rome, in France and in England. Faction made Rome ready for Cæsar, faction in the long Parliament prepared the way for Cromwell, and faction in France made Napoleon inevitable. It is the same series of facts in every case. It is a law of political life, and we will not be exempt from it unless there is something in us different from all other nations. The people are the only hope. They are certainly more intelligent and more free, and their influence is more direct than in other countries. Their intelligence, their patriotism and their freedom is what we must count upon for the hope that the factions will be put down by a power not inimical to freedom, by the voice of the whole people and not by an ambitious leader ready to become a despot.—*N. THE SPIDER-SILK OF AMERICA.—During the summer of 1864 the 55th Massachusetts Colored Volunteers were stationed at Folly Island, S. C. In August, Major Sigourney Wales was detached to command the outposts on the adjoining islands. This duty obliged him to visit all parts of the island, day and night. During his rides he found great numbers of large spiders, whose webs, extending from tree to tree, often measured from six to ten feet, with threads of a silk-like texture, strong, elastic, and of a bright gold color. These webs were a source of annoyance, especially at night, when the most disagreeable sensations were experienced by their tenacity and resistance to repeated attempts to brush them from the person. Speaking of this to the Assistant Surgeon, it led him to mention a curious experiment made by him the year previous, in which he reeled upon a pencil or quill many yards of web from a single insect.

Persons familiar with army life are aware that its leisure hours are many; these Major Wales had employed, at intervals, in carving mementoes, and in this connection it occurred to him that if he could draw this golden thread upon a ring, it would make a curious and valuable souvenir of the war.

Having satisfied himself of the practicability of his design, by securing several of the spiders and reeling their web upon an ebony reeler, he proceeded to carve out of hard rubber a ring, with raised rims on its outer surface; this he secured to a cork, through which a large shawl pin was thrust, forming a wheel and axle, and giving increased velocity.

With a supply of spiders confined in a cigar box he completed this ring, which, when finished, presented two black rims inclosing a band of gold, one-eighth of an inch in width, so much like gold as to be readily mistaken for the true metal.

To facilitate the operation of winding, Major W. manufactured of a tin blacking-box cover, some pieces of cigar box, pins, corks, screws and thread, a machine upon which he also wound a breast-pin and earrings, which, with the ring, comprise a set of ornaments in the possession of a lady in this city.

Assistant Surgeon Wilder used this machine for winding two rings, and the Lieutenant Colonel, with the armorer's drill stock, completed two crosses of rare beauty.

Scientific men who have examined this web pronounce it superior to that of the silk worm, being round and straight, while theirs is flat and curly; in size and strength nearly equal, its indestructibility is proved beyond a doubt by that on the ruler, which, though exposed to rough use for over a twelve-month, retains its color, strength and elasticity.

Major W. has, since his return, perfected drawings of a machine capable of reeling from sixty-four spiders, and completing at once an average sized thread.

The above facts, considered in connection with the declining silk crops of Europe, are important, and we may yet see, among the newly developed resources of this country, the spider silk supplying the deficiency now exciting so much attention throughout Europe.—Transcript.

MONETARY.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, MARCH 16, 1866.

Gold has shown increased firmness to-day, and holders realized an advance of ¼@¾ ₱ cent. on our last quotations, owing to an improvement in the New York market, as advised by telegraph. The movement was of a rather restricted character, however, in view of the heavy supply upon the market; but the demand was limited to a few buyers, and there was less competition noticeable among speculators than for some days past. The sales for the day included the subjoined amounts, viz: $5000, small gold, at 127¼; $2000 and $20,000 at 127¾; $8000 at 128; $5000 and $10,000 at 128½; $2000, $3000, $5000, $10,000, $15,0 0, $20 000, $25,000, $30,000 and $40,000 at 128¼; $35,000, a gold check, sold far currency at 128¾ and $30 000 do. at ¼ ₱ cent. prem. Nothing beyond driblets has transpired in American silver, and operations in foreign specie have been confined to 1200 Mexican dollars on private terms. We now quote gold at 128@128¾. American silver coin at 124@126, and Mexican dollars at 128@129.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE.—There has been a better feeling noticeable in the foreign exchange market to-day, with a slight improvement in rates, and a large number of buyers than heretofore. Offerings were very heavy however, and the following statement comprises the whole of the actual sales so far as particulars were made public, viz.: £3000 and £5000 sold by banks at 139; £40,000 sold by one broker at 135½@139. The inside rate for bill of landing bills and the outside for bank sterling. £13,000 sold by banks at 138¾; £30,000 bought by a bank at 136½@138¾, mostly at 138; £2,00 at 138½; £7500 at 137½@138¼; £11,000 at 136¾137¾; £4000, £10 00 and £5000 at 137; £4000 at 136¾; $8000 at 131; $3000 at 136¼; $500 at 136; $2500 at 136¼ and £ 0.0 and £3500 bill of lading at 135¾. Sales of francs included some small amounts of bank francs at our quotations, and 100,000f. and 300,000f. at 4.12½@, and 50,000f. and 100,000f. at 4.15. ₱ dollar. The closing quotations were for bank sterling 138¾@139; clear bills 136¾@138; bill of lading bills 136@136; bank francs 4.6@4.07½, and outdoor francs 4.10@4.15.

Domestic exchange has been dull and drooping all day, without, however, disclosing any quotable reduction in rates. The market was at no time heavily supplied, but the demand continued restricted, and the movement for the day showed a very heavy reduction on the previous daily average. All of the banks checked at ¼ ₱ cent. discount, and some of them sold round amounts at ¼ ₱ cent. dist., and the purchases by banks and bankers have been confined to the following amounts, viz: $150,000 taken by one bank at 7 18 for sight, ½ for one day sight, ½ for five days' sight, and 1 ₱ cent. dist. for ten days' sight, $25 000 and $160,000 sight at 7-16, $25,000 at ⅜, and $16,000, $20,000, $25,000, $30,000, $50,000 and $50,000 at ½ ₱ cent. dist., $15 000 and $20,000 one day sight at ½ ₱ cent. dist., and $20,000 10 days at 1 ₱ cent. dist. The ruling figures this evening are, for sight ½ ₱ cent. dist. at bank and ⅝@½ ₱ cent. dist. out of doors, five to ten days' sight ½@¾ ₱ cent. dist., fifteen to twenty days' ¾@⅞ ₱ cent. dist., thirty days' ⅞@1 ₱ cent. dist., and sixty days' 1@1¼ ₱ cent. dist.

STOCKS AND BONDS.—There has been some inquiry for favorite classes to-day, but no demand transpired for the general run of securities. Offerings of the former continued very light, and the latter were in abundant supply. The following comprise the whole of the actual sales for the day, viz: 100 shares Jackson Railroad Company at $8½ and 130 do. at $6¾; 29 shares Gas Light Company at 156½, and 4, 20 and 25 do. on private terms; 60 shares Canal Bank at 54; and 50 do. Louisiana State Bank at no price that has been withheld.

UNCURRENT BANK NOTES.—The demand under the above head has been exclusively restricted to the issues of the Louisiana State Bank, since our last. Offerings of this description appeared to be rather heavy, while those of all other classes were but little better than nominal. The transactions for the day comprised $800 Louisiana State Bank, on private terms; $8200 and $10,000 do. at 84½c., and $10,000 do. at 85c. ₱ dollar. Prices of the other issues are too unsettled to give reliable quotations.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, March 16, 1866.

COTTON—The movement in the staple has disclosed an improved feeling to-day. Offerings were somewhat larger than on yesterday, and the demand was steady and at times active throughout the day. Most of the leading buyers were to be seen in the early part of the day examining samples and endeavoring to secure available lists upon desirable terms; but as factors were more stringent in their asking rates, most of the purchasers for domestic markets withdrew at an early hour, and left the principal movement in the hands of foreign buyers. The sales up to meridian were more restricted, however, but the receipt of later private advices from Liverpool by the Hibernian, which came to hand about that hour, and their subsequent confirmation in the press dispatches, as published in the evening papers, tended to impart increased strength to the market as the intelligence from Europe was generally construed as more favorable than had been anticipated. The sales during the latter part of the day, which comprised the principal operations, uniformly tended to yesterday's enhanced quotations, showing, in some cases, an advance of fully ½c. ₱ lb., but the movement was of too irregular a character to justify any alteration of quotations, and we therefore repeat last evening's closing figures, as follows, viz: Ordinary 30@31c., good ordinary 35@36c., low middling 37@38c., and middling 42@43c. The sales for the day comprise 4188 bales, divided among buyers in the following order, viz: 900, 600, 515, 500, 500, 300, 250, 190, 143, 100, 100 and 100 bales. Large purchases have been credited by rumor to some buyers, and in one case a party who had taken but 100 bales, was said to have bought 1200—but we only report actual sales.

SUGAR AND MOLASSES.—The receipts of yesterday were confined to 33 hhds. sugar, and no molasses. The market continues very quiet, and the only sales we heard of were 35 hhds. old crop on private terms, and 18 hhds. low fair at 13½c. ₱ lb. We were unable to hear of a sale of molasses. Cuba sugars and molasses are dull and neglected, purchasers refusing to accede to the pretensions of holders.

WESTERN PRODUCE.—A better feeling seemed to exist throughout this department to-day, and a pretty fair business was carried on, the full particulars of which are appended.

FLOUR.—The transactions to-day embraced about 1700 bbls., including 400 common to four lots at $6 50; 200 fine at $7; 100 do. at $7 25; 100 superfine at $8 25; 150 do. at $8 35; 200 on private terms; 200 good extra at $11 70; 100 on its merits, at $11 25 and 150 choice at $15 ₱ bbl.

CORN.—We noticed sales of some 800 sacks, of which 300 mixed at ——; 100 do. at 71c.; 200, 375 and 150 do. at 72c.; and 1500 prime yellow at 78c. ₱ bushel.

BRAN.—We heard of sales of about 2000 sacks of which 1000, 550, 200 and 200 at $1 50; and 250 at $1 60 ₱ 100 lbs.

GOD IN HISTORY.

The eventful times in which it is our lot to live, the great historic period through which we are passing, naturally calls our attention to the footsteps of Eternal Providence, to observe how God marches towards the consummation of his sublime and beneficent purposes, and how he makes the wrath of man to praise him, and how he educes good out of evil circumstances.

We do not believe that God wills the bloody and violent convulsions, in which bodiless crimes are committed, and cruel wrongs are suffered; but he permits free, but accountable beings thus to act, and holds them responsible, and so overrules in these corruptions as to make the wrath of man to praise him. God hath his way in the whirlwind and storm, and clouds are the dust of his feet.

We live too near the events of to-day, and our passions are too much involved in them, to attempt to read the handwriting on the wall. We will refer to another and historic epoch, from which the clouds of passion and interest have been dispersed, to mark how God makes all things work together for good, and how he reigns in the kingdoms of the children of men. We refer to the Reformation of the sixteenth century.

The reforming attempts of Jerome and Huss were premature, and too much in advance of their age; but when Luther began to expose the superstitions and corruptions of Rome, learning had been revived, printing had begun to multiply books, free inquiry was awakened, and, in short, the European mind was ripe and ready; the process of time had come. The advent of the Reformation was propitious. The goings forth of Providence are also recognized in the so overruling the events of the world as to favor the triumph and permanent success of this grandest revolution on the pages of time.

How at the first view of the "situation" as it then presented itself, it does not appear to have been the most favorable for the success of such a revolution as the Reformation inaugurated. Let us consider the characters and antecedents of the great rulers of the time.

Charles the Fifth was bred a bigoted Romanist. He was the most splendid, powerful and crafty ruler in Christendom. He inherited much of Germany, the kingdom of Naples in Italy, Holland and Spain; all of America, from the Mississippi to Cape Horn. On his coat of arms had the pillars of Hercules, the ancient limits of the world, and for his motto, "plus ultra"—more beyond. With all, this, he added to the imperial crown of the German Empire.

Francis the First of France, and Henry the Eighth of England, two of the most powerful and ambitious monarchs in Europe, (and both of them unmitigated Romanists) were his rivals. Charles, however, was the successful candidate, and on the 28th of June, 1519, was elected Emperor, and became the successor of the Imperial Cesars, just two years after Luther had sounded the tocsin of the Reformation.

This did not seem a propitious time for the movement. But see—the rivalry of Francis and Charles kept them embroiled in wars, so engrossing their attention and forces, that Luther and his movements met comparatively little noticed.

Leo the Tenth was one of the most splendid and scholarly incumbents of the Papal throne, but he was supposed by some to be heretical, and was wholly given to the fine arts, literature and luxury—while his immediate successors were jealous of the power of Charles in Italy, and joined with Francis in his wars against Charles—the princes in the meantime making war on each other; one of whom, Clement VIII, was seized and imprisoned.

These dissensions in Europe tempted Solyman, the Magnificent, Sultan of Turkey, twice during these wars to invade Europe, distracting the attention and delaying the time of Charles. While these political imbroglios were distracting the Imperial, Royal and Ecclesiastical Courts of Europe, Luther and his glorious colaborers, Melancthon and Zwingle, were illustrating the Scriptures, exposing error and superstition, and preaching the glorious Gospel; and the doctrines of the Reformation were spreading in Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, Holland and France.

Look at the situation in England.—Henry the Eighth had been bred an ecclesiastic, was a bigoted Romanist, and had been succeeded by his father, Henry the Seventh, for the Archepiscopal mitre of Canterbury; but the Prince of Wales [illegible] Henry became the Prince and heir apparent of the throne of England. His ambition intensified his bigotry, and [illegible] his interest in ecclesiastical and theological questions. He wrote in defense of the Seven Sacraments, against Luther, and was rewarded by the Pope with the title of "Defender of the Faith." Henry, however, loved his whims and passions more than he loved the Church. He was married to the widow of his brother, and [illegible] of Charles the Fifth. Henry loved Anne, and wished to get rid of his Queen, but because she was the aunt of Charles, the Pope was afraid of the Emperor's displeasure, and would not pronounce the decree of divorce. This determined Henry to break with the Pope and declare himself Head of the Church of England. To this step of violent divorce he was urged by his minister and favorite, Cardinal Wolsey, who hated Charles because he deemed that Charles had not complied with his promise in elevating him to the Popedom, to which high dignity he aspired. In the chagrin of his disappointed ambition, he was anxious to weaken, stab and wound Charles by the divorce and disgrace of his aunt, the Queen of England; thus sacrificing the Pope's supremacy, and the unity of the Roman Church, to gratify his personal spite.

All this ambitious lust and intrigue was overruled of God, made to work his praise, and promote the translation of the Scriptures, the free circulation and searching of the Bible, and the preaching of the glorious Gospel. Out of which has grown the grand missionary movements of modern times, the Bible Societies, and Sunday Schools, and all the illuminating and ameliorating agencies of this onward age, which make it eclipse all the ages of the Past.

This Providential overruling of great historic events should make us wait and hope. God sees the end from the beginning, and doeth all things well. "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice, and the multitudes of the isles thereof be glad."

LETTER FROM DR. SUMMERS.

Messrs. Editors—Our Conference fast, March 2d, was observed, I think, with more than usual solemnity. The officers and students of the Southern University adjourned to the Church at 11 o'clock, where a sermon was preached and devotions performed in keeping with the design of the solemnity.

One point dwelt upon on the occasion was, the importance of reviving the interests of Methodism, improving the economy of the church, and starting it on a higher plane and a more extensive career of usefulness. This was urged on the ground that the Methodist Church is an absolute necessity. We must make the best we can out of it, as we are shut up to it—there is no alternative. We cannot be Calvinists, or imagine that we can believe in Calvinism, or join a Calvinistic Church, with reserves and protests. We cannot be Ana or Anti-Pedobaptists—that is simply out of the question, much as we may love and esteem many of our Baptist friends. We cannot be Protestant Episcopal, because they hold the dogma of Baptismal Regeneration, so-called; it is in their Catechism and Baptismal Offices, not to say that we should not like to restrict our liberty by using nothing but printed forms in our public devotions, much as some of us may admire the sublime prayers of the English liturgy. No; we are Methodists, and we cannot help ourselves. The most of us were "to the manor born;" others of us became Methodists on conviction, and because we could not otherwise have been members of the church at all. Hence we must be excused if we evince some nervousness in regard to Methodism; if we wish to free it from all embarrassments and impediments, that it may have free course, run and be glorified. We rejoice in the prosperity of other churches; we are glad that if they cannot, or think they cannot, be Christians on our platform, they can be on some other. We are friends to all, and enemies to none. But then, we dwell among our own people.

Our attachment to Southern Methodism has greatly increased and intensified since the dark clouds have been gathering around her. We are not so mean as to abandon her now. We are neither to be cajoled, or bribed, or frightened, or driven from her, in this her cloudy and dark day. O no! We are not so simple as to believe that she is moribund, because she has had some pangs and throes; we rather believe that these are the symptoms of a palingenesia, through which she is passing, and we await the result with the patience of hope.

The late adhesion of "the glorious old Baltimore Conference" to our Connexion, is an event of great significance, and full of promise. The members of that body show the soundness of their principles and the purity of their motives, in adopting this course at the present juncture; they leave a dominant, domineering, rich connection, for one ostracised, impoverished, everywhere spoken against. It is very clear that they did not come to us as men of severe principles, unless, indeed, it were to bring us the five barley loaves and two small fishes; we have none to give them, and that they knew full well. I hope there will be no angry controversy with those brethren of the Baltimore Conference who have not yet got ready to unite their fortunes with ours. It is very desirable that all the Methodists in Maryland and Virginia should be under one general government. Why should they not be? And when they all ascertain that we abide by the old landmarks, and that their antecedents would determine connection with us as their normal relation, I cannot but indulge the hope that they will unite themselves with us.

I believe that there are thousands of Methodists in the Northern States who deprecate the proceedings of the present dominant party in the Northern Church; who recognize us as no less entitled to the common family name than any other Methodist connection, and who are desirous of establishing friendly relations, and reciprocating fraternal courtesies with us. I trust that, like the house of David, they will grow stronger and stronger every day, and those of a different complexion, like the house of Saul, weaker and weaker. Let us do nothing to embarrass them, much less to alienate them from us. For my part, I do not want all the Methodists in America to be under one jurisdiction. I am afraid of these mammoth connections. I would much rather have half a dozen than only one. It would be very easy to establish interconnectional relations, even though there might be circumstantial variations.

We are decided Episcopalians, yet we find no difficulty in recognizing the genuine Methodistic character of our British and Canadian brethren, though they are Presbyterian; or oligarchical, in their government, as were our renowned ecclesiastical forefathers, Arminius, Episcopius and the Remonstrants.

Since I began this letter I have received your issue of March 3d, containing an excellent editorial on the "Change of Name." You give cogent reasons, if not satisfactory ones, for the retention of our present style. My views on this subject you may find drawn out at some length in a communication which I forwarded some days since to the Christian Advocate. You will see that I agree with you in several important points.

You seem to like the style, "The Church of England," etc., geographical distinctions. So does the judicious Hooker, as as you may see in his Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, which I have not by me at present. But alas! we cannot say, "The Church of the United States," when there are a hundred sects claiming, and some of them setting up exclusive claims, to be the Church of this country. You say, "St. Paul speaks of the Church of Galatia." Where? Galatia was a province, and the New Testament never, I believe, speaks of the church of a province; it is always the churches of Galatia, etc. So, on the other hand, it is always the church, not the churches, of Coriath, Ephesus, etc. No matter how many congregations there might be in a city, they are all called the church of that city, and are all comprehended, it would seem, under one jurisdiction. But my sheet is full.

The Sea at Sunset, before a Storm.

Placid as an Italian lake,
When the declining sun did take
His farewell kiss,
And lingered on its waters blue,
With crimson lips disparted through
The deep abyss.

And up and round the thunder-clouds,
And clouds white—soft as infant's shrouds,
Felt that long kiss;
And on the sea and round the sky,
And on my soul I know not why,
There fell a bliss.

Storm-clouds were gathering o'er my soul,
Fiend-like, distressful in their roll
Of angry play;
While white clouds, like home memories stood,
Timidly beckoning me to good,
To dawning day.

And as th' ideal loveliness
Of sun and sea in fond caress,
Blest earth and sky,
My soul from out her grief and shame,
Untroubled as those waters, came,
She scarce knew why.

But this she knew, that Christ was near,
Who, chiding back the rebel tear
Said, "Peace, be still."
So she was hushed, and prayed that He
Would moor her on the crystal sea
When pleased his will.

WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE M. E. CHURCH SOUTH.—This Conference closed its session to-day, February 26, 1866, at Greenupsburg, Kentucky, and a more harmonious and interesting session we have never witnessed at any time or place. The citizens entertained the preachers and visitors with a degree of hospitality and interest becoming the occasion, and seem now only to regret its close. I feel greatly indebted to Mr. Winter and his kind lady, whose house has been my home for more than a week.

The renewal of old acquaintances and the revival of former associations among the preachers, after a lapse of six years, is cheering beyond description.

Our Conference at this time numbers fifty-five preachers, the most of whom are ready to go forth with true ministerial zeal in the work assigned; and in this place it would be remiss in us not to say that Bishop Kavanaugh has thrown around us a cord of fraternal affection, by his kindness and care. We have never seen a time when the zeal, energy and vital power of the ministry were more needed than at present.—Richmond Chris. Adv.

REV. E. CARR.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

There is so much of uniformity in the lives and death of good men, that it is common to hear it said, with regard to obituary notices, that they might be stereotyped.—Yet once in a while men are found who differ in so many points of character from the common mass, that special notice may with propriety be taken of them.

Such is the fact with respect to our beloved and now departed friend and brother, ELISHA CARR. He was not like other men. I know of but one man in the whole range of my acquaintance that even reminds me of him; yet he was a man, a minister of the Gospel, and Christian gentleman.

His person first demands our notice, from the fact that we always, when called upon to read an account of an individual with whom we are not personally acquainted, are anxious to know what manner of person they were.

Brother Carr was born in the world about sixty years ago. He grew to be about five feet nine inches high, and to weigh, when in health, about one hundred and fifty pounds. His head, shoulders and breast were disproportionately large, so that, when sitting down, he seemed much larger than he really was. His skin was naturally very fair, but as his life was spent out of doors, he was very much bronzed by the sun, with sandy hair and blue eyes. He never wore his beard, but always went clean shaved. His nose was large, and well-formed, with a wide mouth and full face.

There was in the expression of his eyes something metallic, which was expressive of the true mettle of his nature, and convinced you at once that he was firm, determined, decided, and that he could be trusted; and if he had not been a Christian, there would have been found in his nature something that makes men tyrannical, while there was in the general expression indications of the benevolence of his great heart. Altogether, his appearance was in his favor.

He was, in the main, but little concerned about his person, and cared less about his dress, and was indifferent to both cut and color, and was no stickler with regard to fashion; any old lady in the country could cut a coat to fit; and any kind of bark would dye a color to suit. He was never fully in the fashion, nor wholly out of it; one thing could be said of him with regard to dress, which is, that it was always cheap.

He was not addicted to any kind of self-indulgence. He took no drams; would not smoke or chew tobacco. He engaged in no kind of sports; never hunted, had no use for a gun, and but seldom went a fishing. He once asked me to give him a hook and line, which I did, and years afterwards he took it from his pocket and showed it to me; he had never used it. He was no politician; but seldom attended any public meeting; and when he did go, it was with the view of distributing tracts. He never attended parties or went to see shows, and was uncompromisingly opposed to dancing, and regarded what he called a fiddler as a great sinner, and often in his prayers linked him with thieves and robbers. He was not a man of either leisure or pleasure, but he was emphatically a laborer. He was not what might be called a recluse, but was sufficiently fond of society, and greatly devoted to children. He but seldom talked of himself, and, I think, never, till a few days before his death, told his age, even to his most intimate acquaintances. He read but little except his Bible, the Hymn Book, Discipline and newspapers. Our church papers furnished his general reading, and I never heard him object to a single article found in any of them.

In conversation he was very much addicted to the habit of asking questions, and for what purpose I never knew, for he was no gossip, and was perfectly free from everything like slander, never speaking of any persons unless he had something good to say of them; and, in detailing, was always inclined to throw in qualifications and modifications, so as to guard his statements—the character of his brethren and the honor of the church were always safe in his hands.

His intellect was of a slow, plodding character, while his range of thought was rather limited. Had neither fancy nor poetry, and was poorly gifted in description, and was by no means a sweet singer; so that his resources were very moderate; yet his knowledge of the Scriptures was extensive, and he could give chapter and verse, almost equal to a Concordance. He had also a correct knowledge of the doctrine and discipline of our Church, and wanted no change in either.

He was raised a farmer, and never learned any trade, and was not what the world calls an ingenious man.

With respect to his moral and religious character, he was almost perfect. The path that he marked out for himself was extremely narrow and very straight, always allowing greater latitude to others than to himself. He never attempted to economize in religious matters, or to gain heaven at a low price; and while he would admit that some had received a penny who had labored but one hour, yet he always seemed to think that twelve hours were required of him; neither did he think that it was his special part to do the fine work in his Lord's vineyard, but was ever ready to be a hewer of wood or drawer of water. Neither did he wait for his work to come to him, but always went to it, and was wonderfully gifted in always finding something to do. And notwithstanding he loved to preach, and preached very often, yet it was really a very small part of the labor of this holy man. If subscribers were to be obtained for our periodicals, he was always ready to look them up. If books were to be sold, he came in for his portion. If tracts were to be distributed, all that was necessary was to give them over to Brother Carr, and they would soon find their way to the habitations of the poor, the workhouse, the prisons, the penitentiary, hotels, railroad cars, steamboats, and, in fact, everywhere, even in the halls of legislation.—If the poor were to be looked after, and protected from the frost of winter, the suffering and needy were soon found out and reported. If any were sick within his bounds, he would not be long in finding them out, and he would visit and pray with them, whether asked or not. And there are hundreds of persons in this country that cannot claim the acquaintance of any other minister in the world except Elisha Carr; and who will care for their souls, now that he is gone? And on the Sabbath-day, if there was a Sunday School within his reach, he would be sure to be there, ever ready to lecture, pray, or hear a class, as occasion might require.—If a camp meeting came on in his bounds, he would always make it convenient to go to the neighborhood in advance of the time, to aid in fixing up the tents, seats and shelter, and to encourage the camper, and to see that everything was put in order. A large Bible and Hymn Book must be furnished for the pulpit, suitable accommodation made for the entertainment of the preachers and strangers. And when the sessions of our Conference was coming on, he was always in advance of the balance of the preachers, in order to aid in securing accommodations for all that might attend. And though committees of arrangements might be appointed to make arrangements for our anniversaries, yet Brother Carr generally did a large proportion of the work.

Really I do not see how we are to get on without him! And when attending popular meetings, although you would never miss him from the great congregations, at eleven o'clock on the Sabbath, ready to take any part that might be assigned to him; yet at the heavy, dull hour of three o'clock, you might hear the ring of his voice, preaching to the colored people.—And those who, in an evil hour, had committed some crime, for which they had been immured in prison, this even did not put them beyond the reach of this faithful man of God. Soon he would present himself to the turnkey, with the request to visit and pray with the prisoners, and I think he was never denied the privilege; for somehow, as by universal consent, he was allowed to go just where he pleased, for all believed that his whole object was to do good; and there are hundreds of humble habitations and obscure families in this country in which his tracts are to be found, and where no other minister of the Gospel has ever made his way.—He was for many years connected with my work, and his labors were so abundant in preaching, distributing tracts, catechising the children, attending Sunday Schools, visiting the sick, and preaching and laboring with and for the poor Africans, that I have often felt my sloth reproved, while it really appeared to be his pleasure to do even such work as others would gladly turn over to him.

He had no unproductive capital. He did all the business that his resources would allow. While he appeared fully to understand the character of work suited to his talents, he never sought promotion, or asked for an easy place, or complained of his appointment. He felt himself responsible to God and the Church for every day; and well did he keep his account. Not a day passed but he revised it at its close, and kept a record of every important event. He was a man of system; his appointments never clashed; and when he made an engagement, he was sure to meet it.

His preaching was plain, earnest, and remarkably practical, abounding in Scripture quotation; he seldom quoted from any other book.—His voice was not musical, but full and clear, while his utterance was rather rapid. His prayers were remarkable, for he not only prayed for such blessings as he felt he needed himself, together with the balance of the human family, but he always had some special cases on hand.—His prayers were exceedingly interesting, and often remarkable.—He is almost the only man I ever knew who made it a point to pray the Lord of the harvest to send more laborers into his vineyard. He had heard the call in the days of his youth, and for near forty years had been a constant field-hand; ever ready to lead, plow, or break clods, as occasion required, and felt that there was much yet to be done before the Gospel ministry had completed its work.

He had been from early youth the subject of affliction—being lamed by having the sinews of one of his legs contracted by a burn—and for the last few years his afflictions have greatly increased upon him; but he rose above them, and continued his labors until within two or three weeks of his death. It may be truly said of him that he wore out; no rust ever formed on his sword, nor dust settled upon his parchments. He was never married.

I saw him often during his last illness, and talked with him fully and freely; and it is a most pleasing and delightful reflection, that his Heavenly Father did not suffer the enemy to tempt him for a single moment during his last illness. He had no doubts—no misgivings; his faith failed not, and his trust in God was as true as the needle to the pole. He had no regrets or earth-born wishes. He was the greater portion of his time quoting some precious promise from the word of God; and the promise that was hanging on his lips when utterance failed him was, "There remaineth, therefore, a rest for the people of God." The last word I heard him say was, "Heaven." It was the day previous to his death. I was on my way to my Quarterly Meeting, and did not expect to return for three days. He held my hand, and looking me fully and steadily in the face, said, "Call and see me when you return, if I am alive; and if I am dead, we will meet in heaven.—When I returned, he had left the field of labor; his sickle was resting on its point; he had heard his Master call, Come up higher; the angels of God had met him with the chariots of Israel, and they had passed over the everlasting hills, while multitudes of earthly friends, left behind, were ready to stand up and call him blessed, and lament that there was no one left to take his place.

A. L. P. GREEN.

Nashville, Feb. 4, 1866.

LIBERIA.

We extract an item or two from the Report of the American Colonization Society, which will prove of interest at the present juncture in the history of the colored man.

THE PROSPECT.

The return of peace and the emancipation of the slaves have removed many obstacle to the prosecution of our work, and revived our operations. The indications are that we shall soon have more than ever to do. There are constant inquiries from or in behalf of intelligent and enterprising freedmen in regard to settlement in Liberia. Companies of these people have been formed at Lynchburg and Abingdon, Va., who expect to embark May 1, next, each one hundred and fifty strong. One of the Vice Presidents of the Society, residing in the same State, who, several years since, had nearly all his slaves transferred to Alabama, and in course of training for Africa, they all being now free, wishes us to send fifty, whom he hopes will go. We are informed of numerous disbanded colored soldiers who have expressed a desire to emigrate; and in different portions of the South, the minds of many of the better class of the "freedmen" are tending in the same direction, drawn thither by motives of self-interest; by the hope of lucrative employment on a soil and in a climate more congenial with their habits and physical constitution than this western hemisphere offers; and more especially by the considerations, that there they can enjoy all the rights of citizenship; that color will not there exclude them from the honors and emoluments of office, nor deprive them of the prestige, rights and true dignity of manhood.

INDICATIONS.

The last census tells the indications of the colored man's future in the United States. The increase to this country by foreign immigration alone exceeded the increase of the slaves and free people of color in the same period, nearly four to one—that of the former being 2,707,624, and that of the latter but 796,947.

And the current from abroad is acquiring new volume and momentum. It is believed that the immigration for some years will surpass all precedent. A portion of this human importation, with a larger stream of our own citizens, promises to become laborers in the sunny South, there to compete with the blacks in their old and in new bounds of industry.

While this great increase of population takes place, our territory does not increase. The recent report of the Secretary of the Interior shows, that more than five and a quarter millions of acres of land were disposed of by the Government within the last year and a quarter. From these can be inferred the probabilities of changing the relations of the races by force of numbers, and by ownership of the soil. The white is ever likely to remain the superior race, and consequently the rulers, as it has always had the numbers, intelligence, the prestige and power of mastery, property and political self-government. The weaker will find it to its interest to remove from out of the reach of the stronger.

Repulsions here and attractions there will lead the colored population to seek a nationality of their own, with actual homes, real title to the soil, and active dominion of the country where they may reside. If of the better class, they can rise in Liberia at once to social equality and usefulness. They can enjoy the dignity of true self-respect beyond anything which they can attain in our midst. If of the lower sort, they will have open doors and more inducements to successful activity than they can have here. Whatever their condition in any part of the United States, they will have good reason to be thankful for encouragement and aid in securing an asylum in the Liberian Republic.

A LITTLE AT A TIME.—Dr. Johnson used to say, "He who waits to do a great deal of good at once, will never do any." Grand occasions of life seldom come, are soon gone, and when present, it is only one among thousands who is adequate to the great actions which they demand.

But there are opportunities at our door every day in which the "small sweet charities of life" may occupy us fully. What account can we give of these as they pass by and on to eternity, to lay their record before the great throne? He who flatters himself with air castles, constructed out of magnificent schemes he would accomplish were he endowed with great wealth, or exalted to high station, will soon find them dissolving into thin air, whenever he calls his heart to an account for the right use of that which God has already entrusted to his care. "He that is unfaithful in that which is least, is also unfaithful in much."

Human life is made up of a succession of little things, or such as are commonly, though mistakenly so considered. They mould our character and give complexion to our eternity. Can they be insignificant? How slow are we in learning to do "whatsoever our hand findeth," and and to leave the results, great or small, at the disposal of him who has declared, "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you he shall in no wise lose his reward."

Then, Christian disciple, "in the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand."—"Blessed are they that sow beside all waters." Look around in your neighborhood, in your church, and you can be at no loss for important work to do. Be content to attend to duties as they arise; take them as they are sent by Providence.—Every moment brings its own responsibilities, and man's wisdom in this world of sin, of sorrow and of death, consists in cheerfully using present comforts, and diligently attending to present duties. Let the crumbs, the fragments of time, be gathered up, that nothing be lost. Forget not, that all the world over, great things are made up of a vast multitude of those which are little. Eternity is composed of moments of time, never ceasing. Nothing will more certainly find the slothful at last, or bring them to a more dreadful reckoning, than wasted time.

The Saviour has said, "Narrow is the way that leadeth unto life." He has never told us, however, that it is a thorny road. It is unbelief, and not faith in God, that has represented it as such a road. The cross promises us not sorrow and sighing, but joy unspeakable and full of glory.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE M. E. Church South meets on the FIRST WEDNESDAY, THE FOURTH OF APRIL NEXT, according to the appointment of the Bishops.

Its sessions will be held in the Representatives' Hall, Mechanics' Institute.

General Conference Daily.

The price is to be TWO DOLLARS for the session, not one dollar, as published by some strange mistake in the Watchman and several of our Advocates.

This will afford an excellent medium for a few advertisements.

Delegates to the General Conference,

Upon their arrival in the city, will please call at 112 Camp street, to ascertain the houses which have been assigned them.

A SEPARATED MINISTRY.

The period of the war proved a crucible to the "calling" of the Ministry. Men were driven back to their "nets," as were the Disciples by the stormy events of the crucifixion; some to remain, but others, we trust, only to receive, as those Disciples received, a fresh positive, and yet greater apostleship from the Master. It is true, that even in times of ordinary peace, the wear and tear of itinerancy may be considered an adequate test of a Divine Mission; and a very large proportion of those, who, in their novitiate, respond confidently to the questions of the Bishop, fall off from the ministry in less than ten years. The difficulty of mobilizing a family is apt, eventually, to outweigh an ordinary call. Circuits often, like dilapidated inns, afford very meagre "entertainment for man and beast." Cold welcome, or positive indifference, often greet the "new preachor," and put to the proof the whole purpose of his soul, and sift his profession to the last grain. He cries, "Who is sufficient for these things!" The man who, in the varied renderings which "preaching the Gospel" during a course of years receives under the operation of annual appointments and biennial motion, can feel and say, "none of these things move me," has, it would seem, vindicated his apostleship, and has a right to reckon himself "separated unto the Gospel of God."

Unmitigated itinerancy will, we believe, except in rare cases, work out its own demonstration. But the necessities of the case, and unusual pressure has, in many instances, so modified the conditions of the itinerant life, that it has ceased to be a demonstrative test. Taking occasion from natural care, and it may be, actual want, the preacher determines his home, localizes his family, and revolves rather than itinerates. This in the new States has been a frequent, a useful, and often a necessary phase of itinerating. The possessing a home is not incompatible with earnest devotion to the work of the ministry, and is almost necessitated by the Church, when it fails to provide parsonages, and yet requires of the minister frequent motion. But it is a serious modification. The hardships of the life of a Traveling Preacher are thereby, to a great degree, mitigated. To some men the position has thereby become not undesirable. With time enough at home to cultivate a cereal crop, with a position of respectability which money could not secure, it is no very great sacrifice to follow a profession which yields, though little, yet a sufficiency for clothing and educating a family. A very few hundred dollars, when added to the supplies of food which even a very small farm can afford, constitutes an independency. If it offers no prospect for the accumulation of fortune, yet it presents full as much as most men crave.

It is not going too far to say, that by the accumulations of time men were found in the Methodist Ministry whose hearts were not in the work. The war released their hands by forcing them upon their own resources for a livelihood. It even offered them, by the exemption made in favor of the ministerial class, no mean opportunity to acquire a fortune. Not a few, yielding at once to the pressure and the temptation, launched out into trading, or became involved in the pursuits of agriculture, or succeeded in some familiar handicraft. They found an effectual door open, and entered it. And now that peace has returned, they have not returned, but will probably ever remain as they are, in evidence of the havoc and wreck incident to war. It is well. Storms purify the Church and the atmosphere.

To our mind, to no one cause can a greater amount of that deadness and inefficiency which many affirm of our Church, be traced, than to the dead material which had found its way into the ministry, both local and traveling; which gave no adequate evidence of devotion to God, or a desire to save souls; which subsidized, so far as that could be, the places and the employments of the Church to the low ends of getting a living, or of securing an ex officio consideration; self-seekers, who were incapable of spirituality, zeal, or discipline.

Having said this much, we make a distinct and clear exception in favor of all those persons who have truly felt themselves called to preach, and have been recognized as worthy Ministers of the Gospel, but have, by the extreme parsimony of the church, been forced to assume or continue in the position of a Lay Preacher.

A separated, unsecular ministry, is an essential element of the Christian Church. It is more—it is a part of that living "foundation of apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone." It takes the place of that visible, supernatural, grand machinery of salvation discovered in the imposing forms of "the Mosaic tabernacle—its splendid ornaments—its sacred vessels—its service—the priesthood—the glorious Shekinah—the propitiatory—the Cherubim—all typical of the times, work, and glory of the Messiah, and the Institute of Prophecy more sublime than all these, which attested the abiding verity of Israel's God." All these pledges and types have been redeemed, accomplished and removed. But in the place of them there remains one audible, visible institute—the Christian Ministry. It was reared by the power, prayer and wisdom of Christ himself—in the solitude of the mountain, in the early morning. Of humble and imperfect materials, it was imbued with a principle of invincible life. The Eleven met him by appointment, after the resurrection, in a mountain of Galilee—probably on that very mountain, the very spot where he had first chosen them to be apostles; and there he "Spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in Heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptising them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen." This was the Divine appointment of a sacred and permanent institution—a true and living succession, raised up by Christ to be his great witnessing agent in the world. Selected, chosen, separated men, endued with the special and abiding presence of the Lord Jesus—an undoubted ORDINANCE OF GOD.

Christ required them to abandon their secular occupations. Peter and Andrew were mending their nets when the Saviour called them. James and John, at the same call, "left their father and the ship and followed him." The things to be left constituted then, as since, no small part of the burden of the "call"—"Nets"—"the receipt of custom"—"them which are at home at my house"—"my father" to be buried—"what thou hast sell and give to the poor and follow me"—he that holds this "plough" must drive a straight-forward furrow, or none.—We think that the Holy Spirit, in calling a man to the ministry, works in him to quit every other calling.

The Saviour gave his final impress to this doctrine at the Sea of Tiberias, after his resurrection.—There he found the Disciples back again at their original calling—driven back by want, by the confusion and the defeat through which they had passed. There he appeared—by the same sea, maybe in the same spot where he had first called them to be "fishers of men." And to revive that original call in all its freshness, he again works the same kind of miracle which had accompanied that call. Then, as now, they had "toiled all night and caught nothing." The miracle which followed his command to let down the net revealed to them, through the mists of the early morning, their risen Lord. With what haste must they have dragged the net! The first thing they noticed upon gaining the shore was—a fire of coals! and upon it fish and bread! The Saviour was in no haste; it was at his suggestion that they took time to land the fish and count them, and to mark their size. This finished, then he uttered that wonderful invitation—"Come and dine." ("Was this He who was dead?") More wonderful still, He helped them himself—handed to each of them, first the bread, then the fish. They dined—the seven Disciples; the Saviour entertaining them with the food which he had provided—provided for them without their agency, not using even the fish they had caught. During that dinner He was busy helping, they were silent with awe. Surely no one (but Peter) would wish to interrupt the unutterable emotions of such a fellowship. The invitation—the heaven-provided food—the gracious, wonderful host—the intention of the pre-arranged feast in that place, with that company, at that time, in that resurrection atmosphere of life from the sepulchre, filled each mind and heart. Gradually the great truth broke upon them, which the Saviour so forcibly revealed; that He, their Lord and Friend, would henceforth be their Host, and charge himself with their support. They were to be his guests, to be entertained at his board, to be filled at his hand. "So when they had dined"—not until this resurrection feast was well over—the Lord re-affirmed the apostolic commission, "called" them, by the new force of his own triumphant and perfected nature, to the work of the ministry, to "feed" the Church, fathers and children, the "sheep" and the "lambs" of his flock, to "follow" him—Peter, until death, a violent death, if it must be—John, until extreme age should vanish into Heaven; but in any case to follow him and not their nets.—That he had a surer way of providing for them than they had for themselves.

CENTENARY COLLEGE.

A meeting of the Trustees and Visitors of this Institution met in Jackson on the 14th instant. The Board made arrangements which will result in an entire liquidation of the debts of the College. The Rev. Dr. W. H. Watkins, of the Mississippi Conference, was elected President of the College, and requested to act as agent in securing and collecting its available assets. A gentleman so long and so favorably known throughout Mississippi and Louisiana as the Doctor, will bring to the support of the College a large personal influence. The resignation of President Miller had been in the hands of the Trustees since July. He has been forced by the results of the war to turn from pursuits which were congenial, and to which he has devoted so large a share of his life and energy, to those which only a stern necessity indicated.

During his long connection with the College, his untiring devotion to its interests has commended him to the esteem and respect of its many friends.

There will be another meeting of the Joint Board on the 24TH OF MAY

How to go to New Orleans.

The question of holding the General Conference at New Orleans, you see, is settled.

Now, how to get there best, cheapest, safest, is the next question. On this point we have done the best we could for our brethren.

First. Let every minister have a certificate from a proper officer of the Church, that he is a minister, and goes to New Orleans on Church business. Such a certificate might be supplied here, if necessary.

Second. By river route. The Tyrone, Cumberland and Tennessee leave here for Cairo on Mondays, Wednesdays and Saturdays. Regular packet line—fine boats—all right. They charge you half fare. At Cairo you take the Atlantic and Mississippi packet line, as per arrangement made at St. Louis, at half price. This will cost you, exclusive of possible expences at Cairo, about $25 the passenger,—Preachers' wives taken the same as themselves.

Third. Railroad fare is $40—eating, handling baggage, etc., not included.—Preachers' certificates, as above, pay full fare down, and a free ticket given back—and half fare from Louisville to Nashville.—Christian Advocate.

We add to the above information received through the Southern Christian Advocate:

Delegates who pay full fare going will be returned free. The fare from West Point to Montgomery is $7 00; from Montgomery to Mobile $12 00. Trains daily with the Lake and Gulf steamers to New Orleans. The Lake and Gulf steamers, New Orleans and Mobile Low Pressure Line, will take delegates at half price. The full price is $10.

We insert the following letter from the President of the N. O. & G. N. Railroad:

Office of N. O. J. & G. N. R. R. Company,
NEW ORLEANS, March 20, 1866.

Rev. Messrs. J. C. Keener, and others, Com. of Reception Delegates Methodist Episcopal Church Convention, New Orleans.

Dear Sirs—Your communication of the 19th inst. was duly received, and laid before our Board, with the result as stated in herein enclosed resolution.

Hoping it will prove satisfactory,
I remain, dear sir,
C. C. SHACKLEFORD,
President.

Office N. O. J. & G. N. R. R. Company,
NEW ORLEANS, March 20, 1866.

Resolved, That the Delegates to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, to be held in this city on the 4th April next, be allowed to travel on this road to New Orleans, and return, for the price of one trip.

I certify the foregoing to be a true copy of a resolution adopted by the Board of Directors of the N. O. J. & G. N. R. R. Company, at their meeting held on the 19th March, 1866.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Company, at New Orleans, this 20th day of March, 1866.

R. CHARLES, Secretary.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

LAY EFFICIENCY.

I see that the editor of the St. Louis Advocate denounces pretty severely all such as are agitating questions of change in the polity of our Church. Having already, when I read his article, written several communications advocating certain changes, I was, of course, ready to take the rebuke home. Still I cannot feel very guilty. In fact, I am in lively sympathy with the conservative feeling that is in the church, especially among the older members and ministers. I honor the man that clings tenaciously to "old Methodism." Nothing, save actual necessity, can justify any change. We must never allow ourselves to become the prey of adventurous innovators. This conservatism is a wholesome check upon all thoughtless meddling with venerable usages.

But up to this point I am but little ahead of our brother of the St. Louis Advocate in proposing changes. He announces himself in favor of two changes, notwithstanding his reproof of agitation. And if he will examine himself closely, I am sure he will find himself at heart in favor of one other, at least—the repealing of the "class meeting test." I know he is not in favor of enforcing it, and the fair inference is, that he would really feel relieved if it were obliterated from the statute book of the church. If that be so, he is in favor of three changes, and we are even.

But if I am mistaken in reference to this matter, I have another method of getting even with the brother—whoever he may be—I mean the aforesaid editor. I propose, in one most important particular, that we get back to the old Methodist usage. This one step back, set off against one of my three in advance, leaves two of actual forward movement, and so I shall escape the flagellation of my St. Louis brother, being exactly in his category.

It is a fact well known that the force of early Methodism consisted largely in the activity of the membership. It set everybody to work. They were "all at it and always at it." Activity is always fruitful, and this accounts, in a very large degree, for the wonderful results of the Methodist movement in its earlier stages. Local preachers, exhorters, class leaders, prayer leaders, band leaders, stewards—these were a great army by themselves. Yet they were but the subordinate officers of a mighty host, always in full panoply, and making a constant and vigorous onslaught upon sin. Every one felt that he had something to do, and was ready to do it. Every one felt, in joining the church, that he was consecrating himself to the work of God. The church was the Lord's vineyard, and in it there was work for all. Heads of families all held family prayer. Prayer meetings were not only attended, but every one was ready, when called on, to lead in public prayer. They were ready to converse with their neighbors and friends upon the subject of religion, and to second and help the preacher in all his efforts. "The Lord's people were all prophets." Local preachers and exhorters were busy in the neglected corners of the vineyard. Prayer meetings were conducted in the absence of any preacher. In short, Methodism was a system of lay-operations, to a very large extent. No other church presented such a scene of lay-activity. The personal power of each individual in the church expressed itself in spiritual activities, and the church gathered a great harvest from the industry of her children.

But there has been a reaction. The great majority of our church members seem now to feel that they have nothing whatever to do. The preacher is expected to do every thing that is done in the way of promoting religion. The members have lost all sense of responsibility. The consequence is that in many places the membership is little else than so much dead weight, which hinders rather than helps the advancement of the church.—Certainly it has not come to this extremity in every society, and doubtless in almost every place, some one, or two, or a few of the members contribute somewhat of personal service to the church. But I appeal to the almost universal experience of the preachers for the general truth of what I have stated. Do not the preachers in almost every place feel most painfully the want of active, helpful co-operation on the part of the membership? Revivalists make it their first care to "warm up the church." Until this is done, not a wheel can move.

There is scarcely such a thing as exhorters now in the church. This was formerly a most useful class of men. The local preachers are scarcely felt in the church at present in this country. Many of them scarcely ever preach. I have known many cases in which, from one year's end to another, some of them have scarcely entered a pulpit. I do not now take it upon myself to say who may be to blame for this state of things. I simply state facts, without intending to fix reproach upon any one. The fact is, the position of local preacher is anomalous. It is not officially their duty to preach at any one particular place, and many, from a sense of delicacy, do not offer their services uninvited. But, as I have said, I am dealing now only with the fact. We all know, that in proportion to the number of local preachers, they do very little preaching. Now and then one may be found who is very efficient, but this is the exception to the rule.

This state of things has come up gradually, and has grown upon us until there is but one class of men from whom any thing is expected in the way of spiritual labors—the traveling preachers. It is their business to work for the church, or perhaps even they would form no exception to the general apathy.

Now, it will be very easy for some brother to say I am a croaker, and perhaps some one may imagine that to intimate such a reproach will be a sufficient answer to all that I have written. But I know, and my friends know, that I am not a croaker. I believe I work as cheerfully and hopefully for the church as any one else does, and that I appreciate as highly as others all the signs of God's presence in our midst. Yet I do not choose to close my eyes to facts which militate against our success in the work of God, and call loudly for some remedy. And to these evils I will call attention even at the risk of being branded by some thoughtless brother as a croaker. I know that the earnest-minded men of the church feel the force of the truth, and to them I address myself, not without hope that some good may result. I do believe that this day the pastors of almost all the other churches receive a more general and hearty co-operation, and more efficient help from the private members than those of our own. From starting in the lead in this respect, the Methodists have fallen into the rear. Even in Sabbath School labors we are not pre-eminent.

For hospitality to their preachers, the Methodist people beat the world, and I believe, taking the country over, they are as liberal in supporting the preachers as any other church. But in spiritual labors, alas, we have lost our prestige. To be sure there are a few that the preachers can count on for some help in revival.—But things have come to such a pass that it is difficult to get the singing well maintained even in a revival.

What the cause or causes of this retrogression may be, is a question which I know not whether I can answer. It is doubtless connected either as cause or effect—probably both—with a decline of religious intensity. May it not, however, be traced to some peculiarity of our system?

The special counteracting agency against this tendency to inaction on the part of the membership, furnished by our system, is found in the class meeting rule. But, as I have shown in a previous article, this rule is a failure, and is so because of an incurable want of adaptation as a piece of church machinery. Yet it was the class room, mainly, that supplied the motive power of spiritual activity in our early history. Passing from the condition of societies to that of a church, it was inevitable that we should, in some measure, lose the effect of this agency. Indeed, we shall have to admit, perhaps, that there is no method of importing into the church the full intensity of the Wesleyan societies. Yet we have fallen far below the standard of healthful ecclesiastical vigor. We have relied on the class meeting rule; that has failed us, and nothing supplies its place.

And thus it does seem to me that our system has a direct tendency to remove from the membership all sense of responsibility for the welfare of the church.—The preachers, alone, constitute our ecclesiastical councils, and transact the business of the church. The people have no responsibility there. The Bishop (in popular phrase, the Conference) appoints the preacher to his charge. The people have no responsibility there: Nothing is more natural than that the people should expect the preachers to work out the results after all the planning. From this relation of the preachers and people it results, that in the congregation to which the preacher comes, he is sure to be freely criticised.—In other churches, where the relation between the parties is different, the members are sure to hold up the preacher, even if he is a weak man. If a weak preacher is sent to a Methodist congregation, the people feel aggrieved. Justice is not done them. Their claims are overruled. The Conference has done them wrong. Having had no voice in the Conference from which they receive the pastor, they feel under no obligation to take up for him.—If they happen to get a man that pleases their fancy, all right; but if not, the poor preacher has to struggle against wind and tide.

One more suggestion upon this point.—The preachers do not lay themselves out to set the people to work. And perhaps this may be attributed, in part, to the fact, that the pastoral relation scarcely becomes well established between the preacher and the people of any one place until he is removed from them. By the time he comes to be well acquainted with the social condition of a church, and the adaptation of its members to different forms of church work, he is replaced by a new man, who knows as little as he did at first. The threads of personal influence that he gathered up in the course of one or two years are all dropped, and if the new preacher undertakes to push matters vigorously, he is like to do it awkwardly. He finds friction in the machinery, because he does not understand the social adjustment of the place, nor the personal adaptation of individuals. I am satisfied, that to build up and maintain an efficient system of church operations requires a continuous pastoral relation; for, after all, the pastor must be the centre of ecclesiastical power. The evil that I complain of, then—the want of activity in the laity—seems to grow, in part, out of the imperfection of our pastoral system. Yet, doubtless, we preachers must take much blame upon ourselves in this matter. We have not done what we might. We have not set the young members to work promptly, while they were pliant. We have neglected the prayer meetings. We have not kept up class meetings, even where it has been practicable to do so.

Perhaps something may be done to remedy the evil by Gen. Conference legislation.

Why should we not have lay-representation in all our Conferences? You say our people do not demand it, but are satisfied with the present state of things. That, I think, is true, in the main. At least they are not clamorous for a change. But the question is not whether the people desire representation, but whether good will come of it. Would not the people themselves more closely identified with the interests and operations of the church? The very fact of sending a representative would excite fresh interest in his constituents. And then the whole church would be committed to Conference measures. And the lay representative, a man of intelligence and influence, upon his return home, will have much to say about what was done at Conference. In a word, it will be, not the preachers' Conference alone, but the people's, as well. This, in being in the church, it seems to me, would be a very wholesome one.

There can be no objection to this on original grounds. Nothing in the constitution of the church, as given in the Scriptures, condemns it. It is a question of policy. As such, I see nothing against it—but much in favor.

I would have full lay-representation in the Annual and General Conference—one lay for each clerical member. I would confine their action to any of business. They should have a seat and vote upon all questions equally with the preachers. To restrict them to questions of mere finance is invidious. The church is a kingdom of priests. They may, just so far as responsibility upon him, will be as jealous of the and interests of the church as the Never fear for that. And I would a layman out of each district in the op's council. Then the people directly upon the question of their supply, and in a way that cannot with the efficiency of our system.

This change seems more radical blush than it really is. FAMOUS PEARLS.

The greatest magnitude is attained by pearls of a very irregular shape, aptly termed by the French "Perles baroques.") These malformations were ingeniously utilized by the fanciful taste of the Cinquecento, and, by the addition of the required members in gold enamelled, converted into sea-monsters for pendant ornaments. In the Devonshire Cabinet there is a superb example—a monster pearl of the finest water, but singularly distorted, and now serving for the body of a very graceful mermaid valued at two thousand pounds. Yet more curious is the Londesborough unicorn, composed of two baroques, and mounted by France and Victory embraced. The Romans of the decline distinguished the perfect spherical unio from the perle baroque, always terming the latter margaritum. The Persians make twelve classes of the pearl (Lulu) according to its shape, and as many according to its color.

The Asiatic conquests of Pompey first turned the taste of the Romans after pearls and precious stones. In his triumphal procession were borne thirty-three crowns made out of pearls, a temple of the Muses with a dial on the top; and a figure of the victor himself, formed out of the same precious materials. This last piece of extravagance excites, beyond all reasonable bounds, the wrath of the stoic Pliny, who devotes several lines, chary as he is of space, to the objurgation of such luxury, and interprets the ostentatious exhibition of Pompey's head in this manner as a presage of Divine anger, foreshowing that hereafter the same head, severed from the body, was to be held up as a public spectacle. In this example, adds he, Caligula might find an excuse for wearing slippers made of pearls, or Nero, who formed out of these sceptres for the characters on the stage, and conches for his amours.

Thus it appears, that on their first introduction at Rome, pearls had been employed as materials for art. Not that they engraved in relief or intaglio upon so small and precious a body; the figures above described must have been formed of small pearls strung on wire, or white horse-hair, and thus fastened upon a model in a kind of mosaic, just as the Lamb of the Golden Fleece, or the brooches of seed-pearl are now constructed.

Pliny mentions that he had seen Lollia Paulina, the widow of Caligula, covered head, neck, ears and fingers with strings of pears and emeralds, pinced alternately, to the value of four hundred thousand pounds of our money—plunder collected by her grandfather, Lollius, from all the princes of the East. As he remarks, she thus appeared upon no very grand occasion, but merely at a private dinner party, we are to conclude that this display exhibited but a small portion of her jewelry.

The largest pearl known to the Romans weighed half an ounce and one scruple over (two hundred and sixty grains troy.) This magnitude has seldom been equaled in modern times. Barbot quotes one, belonging to the treasury of the Crown of France, in 1791, weighing one hundred and eight grains, valued at eight thousand pounds. De Boot speaks of one, belonging to Rudolf II., weighing one hundred and eighty grains. Philip II. possessed one as large as a pigeon's egg, of one hundred and thirty-four grains, and worth fifty thousand ducats. This came from the Panama fishery, and was entitled the "La Peregrina." It was pear-shaped—the form in which the greatest bulk seems to be attained by this species. But the largest on record is that, also pear-shaped, brought from India, in 1620, by Gongibus de Calais, and sold to Philip IV., of the weight of four hundred and eighty grains. The merchant, when asked by the King how he could venture to risk all his fortune in one little article, replied: "because he knew there was a King of Spain to buy it of him." This, says Barbot, now belongs to the Russian Princess Yonsoppoff.

Everybody knows the story told by Pliny of Cleopatra, who, to outdo Antony's extravagance, wagered with him that she would spend a sum equivalent to one million pounds upon one dinner. When her lover ridiculed the impossibility, she replied that in nothing coming up to her promise, she replied that it was merely an adjunct to the grand dish; and wearing in her ears the two finest pearls then known, of the value above mentioned. She threw one of them into a vessel of the strongest vinegar set before her, and, as it dissolved immediately, she drank it up. The fellow to it was about to share its fate, when L. Plancus, who had been appointed umpire in the matter, seized it, declaring that Antony had lost. This pearl, on the conquest of Egypt, was sawn in two to make pendants for the ears of the Venus in the Pantheon—the goddess, remarks Pliny, being well satisfied with half of their dinner.

As regards this story, no acid that the stomach could endure is capable of entirely dissolving a pearl, even after long maceration in it. Barbot, on trying the experiment, found that the outer layer was reduced to a jelly, while that beneath was not at all affected. No doubt the wily Queen swallowed the pearl whole in some more agreeable potation than vinegar, secure of its ultimate recovery undamaged, and invented the fiction of its complete and instantaneous dissolution, which, he it observed, rested entirely on her own testimony, in order to win her wager.

The same experiment is recorded to have been tried somewhat before by Clodius, son of Æsopus, the player, who, having discovered that dissolved pearls possessed the most exquisite flavor, did not selfishly confine his knowledge to himself, but gave one apiece to each of his guests to swallow. Powdered pearls were formerly considered as an invaluable medicine in stomach complaints; the benefit they produced must have depended entirely on the imagination of the patient, the substance being a mere antacid, no more efficacious than the powder of the shell.—*Precious Stones and Gems, by C. MEXICO IN THE FRENCH LEGISLATURE.—In the French Corps Legislatiff, on the 19th inst., Count Walewski read from the chair the address in response to the Emperor's speech, which contained the following allusion to the Mexican question: "Our expedition to Mexico is approaching its end. The country has received the assurance of this with satisfaction. We were forced to go to Mexico by the imperative duty of protecting our countrymen against odious violence, and obtaining the redress of our too legitimate grievances. Our soldiers and sailors have worthily fulfilled the task assigned by your Majesty to their devotedness. This expedition attests once more to distant countries the disinterestedness and the power of France. [Applause.] The people of the United States, who know of old the loyalty of our policy and the traditional sympathies which it inspires, has no reason to take umbrage at the presence of our troops on Mexican soil. To make their recall dependent upon any other consideration than our own convenience would be incompatible with our rights and honor. [Loud applause.] Of these, sire, you are the guardian; and the Corps Legislatiff knows that you will watch over them with solicitude worthy of France and of your name."

A CITIZEN SUED BY A NEGRO FOR FOUR HUNDRED DOLLARS.—The case of Stephen Boyd, colored, vs. J. D. Spain came up in the Freedmen's Court yesterday. The plaintiff brought suit for the recovery of $400. It appeared that plaintiff bought of defendant a piece of ground in this city, for which he paid in cash $400, the defendant promising to give him a good title to the same upon the payment by the plaintiff of a further sum in six months. The defendant not having the title in his own name, and being unable to obtain it, the plaintiff sued for the money he had paid. It was decided that the defendant should return the $400 paid to him by Boyd, and $16 interest on the same. Boyd was allowed a reasonable time to remove all improvements made on the lot. Mr. Spain, under the force of circumstances, paid the money claimed, and the case was dismissed.—Nashville Banner, 6th.

BURIAL OF A SLAVE.—While in Virginia, Major Crump had disinterred the body of Daniel, his faithful servant, who followed him through thick and thin, during the war, until he was killed on the 25th of March, last year, near Petersburg. On that day it was erroneously reported to Daniel that his master had been killed on the field, and it was while seeking his body that Daniel was killed. Having an affection for his servant, easily appreciated by all Southern gentlemen, the Major sought and obtained the body under flag of truce, had it buried, and has now brought it home to rest amid the graves of his kindred.—Augusta Transcript.

THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN CONFEDERATION.

The project of uniting all the British North American provinces in one grand confederation, which was agitated last year, and fell through by the opposition of the Lower Provinces, is revived, with the prospect of early success. At a banquet, which took place a day or two since in Cornwall, Upper Canada, where the principal Canadian Ministers were present and made speeches, this subject was put forward in a tone of confident prediction, as if no doubt was entertained of an immediate favorable result. The influence of the Imperial Government has been brought to bear on the Lower Provinces, and it is expected that the union will be consummated at an early day.

One of the most powerful causes of the new impetus given to this project, is the failure to procure the renewal or extension of the reciprocity treaty. The geographical position of the upper provinces, which stretch along behind a belt of our States interposed between them and the ocean, renders intercourse with us, and transit for their products through our territory, a commercial necessity. If they cannot obtain it by treaty, there is a strong temptation to acquire its advantages by annexation. The confederation is one of the means of counteravailing this tendency. If consummated, it will foster National spirit, and the pride of independence; for nobody supposes that so populous and extensive a country, united under one Government, can long remain a dependency to a foreign crown.

Great Britain thinks the United States are already too large and powerful for the general balance of power. She would, under any circumstances, object to our further growth by annexation. She has much stronger objections to our enlargement at her expense. She has no expectation of holding Canada permanently; she regards it as certain that her North American colonies will be ultimately annexed to the United States, or ultimately independent. She can concede their independence without loss of prestige, and by that means establish an allied nation as a partial counterpoise to the United States. This, at present, is the leading object of her American policy.

She is doing all in her power to favor a spirit of self-importance, and to promote the desire of independence in her North American possessions. She encourages them to exercise some of the highest functions of sovereign nations. Her ministers and agents are allowed to go to Washington and negotiate directly for reciprocity, without any appearance of responsibility except to the colonial Government. In all matters of domestic legislation she leaves them perfectly free. By the projected union, their thoughts will be strongly turned towards independence; and she can easily direct their national aspirations towards a throne, to be filled by one of the sons of Victoria.

If there are germs of an annexation party in the Upper Provinces, there are none in the Lower. But if Canada should be annexed, the feeble Lower Provinces could not expect long to escape absorption by so powerful a neighbor. When the United States should come to own the territory on both sides of the St. Lawrence, they would naturally covet the Provinces that gnurd the entrance to its mouth and lie on the gulf into which it empties. In view of the danger of ultimate annexation, resulting from the loss of the reciprocity treaty, a successful appeal can be made to the loyalty and British feeling of the Lower Provinces in favor of the confederation; and we shall probably witness, this spring, the completion of an arrangement fraught with important consequences in the future history of this continent.—*N. DECLINE OF POPULATION IN THE SOUTH.

The Radicals in Congress, with signal inconsistency, while contending for negro suffrage, are opposing the proposition to make the negro population a part of the basis of representation, on the ground that it will give the South too much weight in the National councils.

Senator Doolittle, replying to these arguments, lately undertook to show that such apprehensions were unfounded. He made the following statements:

The destruction of the population, both white and black, within their States during the civil war, has been most enormous. Of the whole population in those States, according to the census of 1860, were 1,600,000 males of 20 years and over. Undoubtedly one-third of that whole white population of male persons over twenty years of age have perished. As to the black population, we have not the specific facts upon which we can make a positive and emphatic calculation; but we have facts stated to us upon the very highest authority. Estimates made by gentlemen who have had the means of knowing, if it is possible for any human being to know, state the actual destruction of the black population since 1865, has been at least twenty-five per cent. of the whole population.

High officers of our army state this, and give as their opinion, without any qualification, that at least twenty-five per cent., one million, out of the four, have perished already. Gov. Alkon, of South Carolina, who was recently in Washington, made a statement upon this subject, and his opinion is entitled to the highest consideration. It is known by all that he was one of the largest slaveholders in the State of South Carolina, if not the largest. He has lived in that section of country during the whole of this civil war, and his means of knowing are very extended. He states most unequivocally that more than a million of the blacks have perished, or more than twenty-five per cent. The Hon. Randall Hunt, of the city of New Orleans—and I refer to him because he is a Union man, and has been as I understand, during the whole of this trouble—who has lived there his whole life, states, also, that beyond question twenty-five per cent. of them have perished. Mr. Doolittle having shown, as he thought, that the representation of the South would not be increased, argued in favor of representation according to the number of voters.—Mobile Adv. and Reg.

HONITON.—There is a little English market town in the county of Devon, situated in the very fertile vale of the Otter. It has about 3500 inhabitants, and is a very favorable specimen of the best country towns of England, and its name is famous throughout the fashionable world in connection with the lace which is made there. Burrit, in his last volume, pleasantly describes the surroundings and process of this manufacture. He was taken to a small cottage, on a back street, where three women were at work on a cement floor. Two of them were sisters, between sixty and seventy years of age, who had wrought on the wedding dresses of three generations of queens—Adelaide, Victoria and Alice. The third was a neighbor who had dropped in with her work, and was plying her needle with her bonnet on. The work requires the nicest judgment and skill with the fingers. It is wrought on round, plump cushions, and, as the figure progresses, it is covered with a piece of oiled silk, so that a very narrow strip is exposed at once to the dust or touch of the hand. By such precaution, the lace is delivered to the sales room as pure and unsullied as the thread when given out. As it is all made by hand, it had to compete with the most elegant designs made by machinery in Nottingham and other places. Although the price paid for it by the wearer seems sinfulcently high, and it still is considered the most perfect and durable article for the bridal dresses of the ladies of the nobility and of the blood royal, yet the profit of the poor needle-women, in 1862-3, was scarcely a penny an hour. "It is a pity," says Mr. Burrit, "when they are so proud to wear it, that the artists who clothe them with such flower-work, should be so poorly paid." Somehow or another, this inequality between the wearer and the maker is the widest and worst in articles of luxury. Diamond-diggers, pearl-divers and cruiae-hunters have always had a harder time of it than even the Honiton lace-workers. The blunt-fingered men who follow the plow and wield the sickle, fare better.

AN OFFICER'S OPINION OF THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Major Henry C. Lawrence, Agent of the Freedmen's Bureau at Fayetteville, North Carolina, writes the following letter, which is published in the Philadelphia Age:

FAYETTEVILLE, N. C., Feb. 14, 1866.

I confess I am tired out and half worn out with the annoyances of my position, and need rest; and am so far from having any sympathy with the views that seem to prevail in Congress, that I am unwilling to be even an humble instrument in aiding to carry them out. Whilst there was, and could be, no law but military law, or rather authority, the Bureau was a necessity to some extent. But to continue it after the States shall have given the blacks their civil rights, seems to be the very reverse of sound policy, considered simply with reference to that. It will engender hatred towards the blacks on the part of the whites as a favored class to whom extra legal protection is given by the Federal Government—hatred towards the Government itself, which, by this system, pronounces the people regardless of justice, and brands courts and bar and juries, in advance, as ready perjurors. It substitutes for men learned in the law, and soon to administer it—for trial by jury and right of appeal—the decision of men who, in many cases, if not most, will know nothing of law, who will often be prejudiced, and some, judging from the past, will be corrupt. It will incite in the blacks, to some extent, a sense of independence of the local laws; sanction their distrust of them, the courts, and people, and certainly cannot tend to educate them in the duties of citizens. Instead of allaying, it will beget jealousy and ill-will between the races to a greater degree than now exists and finally produce the very evils it is intended to guard against. And how such a system can be exercised except as a temporary military necessity in a conquered country, I cannot conceive. It is liable to all our old objections to the "fugitive slave law," and, unlike that, will be in ever present, ever acting evil; and its provisions are very incomplete for the end proposed, unless it is assumed that military authority is to remain paramount. For instance, I can fine a man $50, and imprison him thirty days; but in the case of murder of a black, the district or department military commander must order trial by court-martial. Upon conviction the case may, of course, go to the Secretary of War for review. Such a trial is in progress now at Raleigh. If this system is to be retained after the States shall be reconstructed—whatever that may be—and if this is republicanism or self-government, I shall despair of ever being able to comprehend the first principles of political science. But if a State should establish such a judicial system, I think the Federal Government might well be called upon to enforce its guarantee of republican government to the people of that State. I think it would be a less outrage upon the principles of self-government and upon the Constitution to treat the South as conquered territory, and govern it by our territorial system, than to do what is proposed to be done; and in that case Mr. Sumner might secure juries composed equally of white and black men. I felt ashamed for myself as an American, and for my Government, when, a few days ago, Judge Baxton, of the Supreme Court of this State, called at my office to inquire as to the extent of the jurisdiction he would be permitted to exercise in a term he was about to hold.

THE SOUTH.

We have already mentioned in these columns that the way to open out the South to immigration, was, in our opinion, to divide the large plantations into lots of from twenty-five to fifty acres, and to advertise them for sale, on easy terms. In this market. These lands are now offered in large tracts, that require a small fortune to purchase them; and many who are eager to go South, are deterred by the large amount of capital required.

An instance has lately come to our knowledge that illustrates the fact:

A gentleman in one of the Southern States, resided on a plantation of some three thousand acres. He had built an elegant mansion, substantial and convenient barns, outhouses, gin, mill, and over one hundred comfortable huts for negroes, fine fences, etc., etc. The lands alone, when but little improvement had been made upon them, had cost him some $70,000. At the end of the war but twenty of his hands were left, with a few house servants—some had followed the army, some had gone North, and others were killed. Those who were left were willing to work on his own terms, but embarrassed financially on all sides, he concluded to sell. He offered this whole property for $30,000, and found no purchaser, and when at last, being in ill health, he had nearly given up to despair, a returned soldier offered him $500 in cash, for twenty acres in one corner of the plantation, which was accepted.

This opened the way. He at once divided his ground, except what he concluded to retain around his house, into farm lots, to each of which was added a small wood privilege, and advertised it North. He had a host of buyers, and a prospect of selling his whole place at a fair price, having disposed of over a thousand acres of the arable, and nearly three hundred of the forest land at the average rate of twenty-eight dollars per acre for the former, and thirty dollars for the latter. He intends to work his twenty hands, to whom he lets cabins at a rent payable monthly in work or money, with a privilege of electment in case of default, and to keep part of his reserved land in cultivation. His gin house and machinery will answer for his new neighbors as well as for himself. The new comers are generally industrious and are likely to be valuable citizens, and their settlement has doubled already the value of the unsold land.

This instance will show how speedily the South may be populated, by the best class of settlers. Of course some preliminary expenses are necessary, such as drainage in low lands, buildings for the reception of the immigrants, and also for advertising, but if the settlement is healthy and easy of access, and the land not too dear, there can be no doubt of the success of the plan. The experiment has been tried in New Jersey on a large scale and as it succeeded on a sandy barren soil, why should we doubt the result in the South, when any honest temperate man with a couple of hundred dollars in cash, ought to be enabled at present prices to achieve a desirable position for his family.—Southern Exchange.

MANNERS.—The first requisite to good manners, I am convinced, is ease; and that is never to be obtained by dwelling upon self. Consideration of the feelings of others is true politeness. To give a visitor a smiling welcome, a comfortable chair, seek for a foot-stool, draw down or raise a blind, so that there may be enough, or not too much light, undivided attention given to what they are saying, and if you differ from them a gentle deference of manner is what is required by good breeding. You were thinking of yourself, and that made you embarrassed; you felt you were snubby. My dear, in the morning of the day all that is needed is great neatness, and that I'm sure you have. Your collar and cuffs are faultless; your hair might have been smoother, but you tumbled it, and there's nothing to find fault with in your general appearance. But if you will get into the habit of thinking how you look, you will never be at your ease. And rely upon it, you are wrong in supposing a carriage and fine clothes make people look like ladies. They do nothing of the kind. Being, not seeming, is what you have to aim at. Anything put on is mere affectation, and is soon detected.—English Essay.

MORE COAL BEDS IN VIRGINIA.—We understand that a very fine coal bed, says the Lynchburg News, has been found at the Roanoke Red Sulphur Springs, which belong to our townsman, T. D. Crawford, Esq. The quality of the coal is said to be superior to that obtained from the Montgomery fields, and specimens have been brought to this city which are very highly spoken of by those who have examined them. The vein has been opened, and several thousand bushels of the coal already gotten out, and we suppose it to be Mr. Crawford's intention to engage extensively in mining the fields. The distance from the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad is about eight miles, over a good road; and at present prices, the coal would pay well, even if it had to be wagoned further.

AN ELOQUENT VOICE FROM MASSACHUSETTS.

On the 8th inst., in the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, the Hon. Mr. Spofford, of Newburyport, delivered a speech on "Congressional Usurpation," which breathes throughout the elevated spirit far which the great Daniel Webster and once made the old Bay State famous.

The perration of that admirable discourse is equal in beauty to the best efforts of the greatest orators, and when compared with the trite, wishy-washa dilutions of blood and water of the pompous and empty Sumner and Wilson, renders still more disgusting the pigmy attempts of those small conspirators.

The peroration we republish is in honor of President Johnson, and re-echoes the sentiments of every loyal man:

As in those days of her degeneracy, Nicola Rienzi, a tribune of the people, rose in Rome to become her future deliverer, so here, under our republican institutions, in this the imperial dominion of the New World, there has arisen a man, a tribune of the people also, whose appointed work it is, if the omens and the oracles are not false, to become the deliverer and savior of the American Union. The several instruments of Providence in their respective spheres, for the accomplishment of its beneficent designs, the character of the two historic personages themselves are not dissimilar in many points of view. Of humble ancestry, says the historian, in speaking of Rienzi, he inherited neither dignity or fortune.

The gift of a liberal education, which his parents painfully bestowed, was the cause of his glory and his untimely end. The study of history and of eloquence devated above his equals and contemporaries the genius of the young plebian. He nursed with indefatigable diligence the manuscripts and marbles of antiquity, loved to dispense his knowledge in familiar language, and was often provoked to exclaim, "Were are now these Romans, their virtue, their justice, their power? Why was I not born in these happy times?" Mr. Speaker, does not this brief description illustrate points of character and circumstances of fortune in the life of Andrew Johnson as well as that of the Roman Tribune? He, too, is of humble origin, and had neither title nor fortune for an inheritance. Palsfully as we know, for it is of universal public report, did he acquire that education which has commanded for him a career of distinction in the whole circle of the offices of the Republic; and who will deny that he has been elevated by the improvement of his opportunities in this respect above his equals and contemporaries. He, too, has studied with indefatigable diligence the manuscripts and memorials of his country's history—the Constitution of the United States and the great records of the Fathers, and in familiar language loves to discourse concerning them in the wnks of every day life and with common men. And so, sir, we find in Andrew Johnson, in these moments of the country's convulsion, sentiments of patriotism and devotion to Constitutional Liberty responsive to those which thrilled in the replaby Roman's heart, yearning for the return of the former greatness and glory of his country. So far as these respective traits are concerned there is an analogy full and complete between the two of whom I have been speaking, as there is perfect identity of object in the great work of each of them to do, the rehabitation of a distracted and disordered land. But the parallel can not be extended farther without prejudice to the truth. Rienzi restored Rome from a condition of disintegration to one of proud if not pristine glory, edneed order from chaos, and throughout the bounds established justice and good government. But in the zenith of his renown, he permitted himself to be destroyed by inordinate desire of fame and ostentatious vanity, unmindful that the ancient tribunes were not distinguished in style, habit, or appearance from an ordinary plebian; his effeminate luxury and slothful pride lessened day by day the extent of his power, until at length, having degenerated into the vices without having acquired the majesty of a king, his rule was overthrown, and he was compelled to abdicate the government and palace of the Republic.

Such was the ignominious close of the career of the Rienzi.

But far different from that will be the career, in its progress and in its close, of the great Tribune of the American people, Andrew Johnson, if, as I have said, the omens do not betray our hopes. Uncorrupted and incorruptible by the flattering favors of successful fortune; unshaken from his equipoise by the exercise of the mighty powers with which he is clothed; resigning and rejecting the new prerogatives of unrestricted power, that popular liberty may not be endangered; indomitable in the assertion of the principles of public duty which he believes to be right, and undismayed by the opposition of faction or the rage of party, he will complete the work which he has so well begun—he will accomplish the deliverance of his country—he will preserve the Constitution and maintain the Union. And that done, sir, he will be held, so long as his life shall last, in the grateful affection of the American heart, and, removed from earth, will take his appropriate place in the Pantheon of History, as one of those whom great and beneficent deeds have made immortal.

ORIGIN OF THE DOCTRINE OF SECESSION.

Reverdy Johnson, in a speech in the Senate a few days ago, cited some of the conclusive proof, which, those familiar with our political history, have known to exist, that the doctrine of secession—including indeed, the whole theory of Staterights—is of Northern origin. As far back as 1811, Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, then the leading statesman of New England, discussing the subject of the acquisition of the Territory of Orleans, said:

"I am compelled to declare it is my deliberate opinion that, if this bill passes, the bonds of this Union are virtually dissolved; that the States which compose it are free from moral obligations, and that, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some to prepare definitely for a separation—amicably if they can, violently if they must."

Coming down to a period immediately preceding the war, Mr. Johnson cited the following resolution, adopted by a convention held at Cleveland, Ohio, May 25th, 1859: Benjamin F. Wade, then as now, Senator from Ohio, being chairman of the committee by which the resolution was reported:

"Resolved, That the several States comprising the United States of America are not united on the principle of unlimited subunission to their General Government, but that by compact, under the style and title of a Constitution for the United States, and of amendments thereto, they constituted a General Government by certain definite powers, reserving, each State to itself, the residuary mass of right to their own self-government; and that whenever the General Government assumes undelegated power, its acts are unauthoritative, void, and of no force, and, being void, can derive no validity from mere judicial interpretation; that to this compact each State acceded as a State, and is an integral party; that this Government, created by this compact, was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion and not the Constitution the measure of its power; but that, as in all other cases of compact among parties having no common judge, each party has a right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as of the mode and measures of redress."

This resolution, which we need not say is as thoroughly State rights, and as fully justifies secession as anything that ever came came from the pen or lips of William L. Yancey, or Barnwell Rhett, was not only sustained by Senator Wade but by Salmon P. Chase, at present Chief Justice of the United States. In view of this latter fact, Senator Johnson well says:

"Mr. President, if the Chief Justice of the United States has not changed the opinion which he entertained in 1859, he is not the man to sit in judgment upon Mr. Jefferson Davis, or anybody else standing in the like position. He might pronounce him and I suppose he would—to have been guilty of treason according to the letter of the law; but, with this resolution in his hand, he would say to the department of the Government in which the power of mercy is lodged, 'For God's sake, as you value me and my character, pardon, for he did only to a greater extent what I said I would have done or that my State should have done if the contingency had arisen.'"—Richmond Whig, 10th inst.

THE CANADIAN ALARM.

The excitement in Canada over the apprehended Fenian invasion appears to be at a higher pitch than ever, and the provincial measures for defence are still being vigorously pushed forward. Lord Monck, the Governor General, has issued orders calling out the militia and designating the different organizations required for service, which, with a mass of other matter bearing on the crisis, appear in full in our present issue. The Governor talks in a spirited manner, and indulges in a fling at this country by speaking of the anticipated Fenian forays as threatened piratical attacks organized in the territory of a neighboring power. All the volunteers called out are to be placed under the regulations of strict military law, and are subject to the orders of Lieut. Gen. Sir John Michel, commander of the British forces in North America. While regretting that he is compelled to require the services of so many men, the Governor General expresses his assurance that if necessary, the entire population would volunteer. Much enthusiasm is represented to exist among the volunteers, who are still rapidly arriving from the country places in the principal large towns, whence many of them have been already dispatched to the frontier. It is reported that the forts of Quebec have been denuded of the regulars garrisoning them, and that these also are en route for the expected seat of war. It is proposed in Montreal to expel all aliens. It is amusing to see how the Canadian press and people now endeavor to ignore their guilt in giving all possible aid to the rebels of this country during our late war, and insist upon it being the duty of our Government to protect them from the terrible Fenians. One Montreal paper foams with rage over the matter, and says that President Johnson and his Cabinet will be responsible for every drop of blood shed in the apprehended conflict.—N. Y. Herald.

THE NEXT COTTON CROP.

In the March number of De Bow's Review, the editor, who has just completed a tour through the cotton-States, estimates the next cotton crop at not more than one million five hundred thousand bales. He adds: "These figures are not likely to be increased by anything that is now to happen, and may be greatly reduced by the ignorance, neglect or desertion of the laboring forces, which, judging from the experience of all other countries, is more likely to occur than not, and reduce the crop to one million or one million two hundred thousand bales. No account is taken in the calculation of the application of white labor to cotton, beyond what was applied to it before the war. The extensive mortality of the war has made white labor at the South very scarce, and so far it is absorbed in the necessary pursuits of the mechanic arts and trade, which have been furnishing most lucrative employment. The wear and tear, and frightful destruction caused by the war, opened other channels of employment besides agriculture. The increase of white labor at the South, so far as the next crop is concerned from immigration, is too trifling to be taken into account. The aggregate number of laborers introduced is insignificant, and so far is largely absorbed in the cities."

A MOST REMARKABLE CASE.—A Body which has been in the Vault for a month still Warm.—The following is undoubtedly one of the most remarkable cases that we have heard of and is creating considerable excitement among parties who have witnessed what we are about to relate.

On the 5th of February last Michael King, about seventeen years of age, was killed at Oakland, by being struck on the head with a stake, which was drawn from the ground by an unruly horse. Two days after the fatal accident, and when the body was about to be buried, the relatives of King thought they noticed evident signs of life, and the body was removed to the house, where it was kept for several days. A report got into circulation at the time, to the effect that the body had come to life. After keeping the body several days it was removed to the lower graveyard and placed in a vault, where it now is, and it has been visited by hundreds of our citizens. The body retains its natural appearance is limber and warm, after being dead in the graveyard one month. We have heard no reasons assigned for this strange phenomenon.—Louisville Democrat, 9th.

MISCELLAN

AN ENGLISH VIEW OF PETERSBURG.

A correspondent of the London Times writes the following from our city, under date of Nov. 7:

This straggling and impoverished little town was the graveyard of the Confederacy. In the strong and elaborate fortifications around it the Southern soldiers made their last desperate stand, fighting in the trenches till the dead were piled up as high as their heads, and giving way only when utter destruction threatened them, from Grant's besieging hosts. The suffering of the Confederate army, in these last days, were terrible.

After two years of unflinching resistance, Gen. Lee ordered the retirement of the Confederate troops around Petersburg, and Grant thus possessed the key to Richmond. The effect of this compulsory retreat was decisive upon the Southern army. Every man felt that the cause was hopelessly lost, and from the moment the troops left the trenches they straggled off in all directions. The country was soon covered with them. They left about thirty thousand strong. When Lee surrendered at Appomattox, there was only about eleven thousand five hundred men with him, including cavalry. The remainder went away, rather than be included in the surrender. With war thus raging about its gates, the town of Petersburg fell into almost complete ruin. It had formerly been a thriving place, by reason of its large trade with North Carolina, but the line which was drawn around the Confederacy stopped the vital circulation in every part of it, and Petersburg went to decay. It is now reviving again, though by feeble and uncertain steps.

Yankee store-keepers have settled down in the principal streets, and offer their amazing shoddy at prices which bring them the remunerative profit of a hundred per cent. The country immediately around is poor, and was never very rich. You ride through mile after mile of wild land, covered with pine woods, and only at long intervals see a patch of cleared land, in which the stalks of Indian corn stand bare in the frost. Here and there along the road a chimney-stack or fragment of brick wall litters the fields, while hastily thrown up breastworks or trenches cover the face of the country. The monotony of the brown woods is sometimes relieved by a black face peering from the top of a soldier's sand-off overcoat, the proprietor being the freedman on his travels in quest of the lands to be given him by Congress.

THE NEW ATLANTIC CABLE.

During the last few days the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company have begun in real earnest. Little had been done since the return of the expedition in August last, as there was no reason why the cable should be ready very much sooner than it will be needed. The Great Eastern still lies at her moorings in the Medway, with the remainder of last year's cable on board; and this will again be used during the present year, when that part of the cable which will have then enjoyed a twelvemonth's rest on the bed of the Atlantic, will be grappled for. Captain Anderson will once more have charge of the big ship, and he will again have the invaluable assistance of Mr. Halpin, the chief officer. Mr. Canning and Mr. Clifford will be, as in last summer, in charge of the laying of the cable, and Mr. De-Saumarez will be again in charge of the electrical department. Thus, so far as skill goes, there is everything in favor of the success of the coming expedition, which will set sail in the beginning of June, bearing with it the good wishes of all Europe. As at present arranged, the Great Eastern will carry the new cable, will lay it to Newfoundland, will there coal and return to the mid-Atlantic, where she will, with her consorts, grapple for the lost end, the locality of which can be ascertained within a quarter of a mile through the observations taken last summer by Capts. Anderson and Moriarty. It is not intended that the part of the old cable which now lies in the Great Eastern's tanks shall be again stowed in her hold on the outward trip. It will be carried in another vessel until it is needed. The grappling will be done in this way: Three vessels, including the Great Eastern, will be provided with grappling apparatus. Last year, it may be remembered, the grappling was done with makeshift appliances. In fact, the grappling lines were merely buoy ropes, and the swivels which broke while the cable was being hauled up were never intended to bear any such strain as that to which they were subjected. In the new grappling tackle there will be no swivels; perhaps even no shackles. Each line will be, if possible, in one piece, certainly not in more than two joined together by a strong shackle. There is, therefore, little fear that if the cable is grappled, of which there can be no reasonable doubt in the mind of any one conversant with the subject, it will be brought to the surface. And there is the more probability of this because the cable will be grappled in three places, at intervals of about two miles. One vessel will grapple, and, if necessary, cut her end by means of a steel blade set in the grappling iron; the middle ship will haul up, and the third vessel will also raise the cable to lessen the strain. There will, therefore, be three bights on the cable, or two bights and an end, and this end will be prevented from slipping by the formation of the grappling iron in which the cable will be jammed. No one connected with the project appears to entertain the slightest doubt about the success of this section of it. When the end is recovered and a message sent through to Valentia, as a test of the electrical condition, the splice will be made with the cable now lying in the Great Eastern, and then all will be plain sailing, except in case of another accident similar to that of last year, when all would have to be done over again; but this would be the worst damage. If one grappling is successful there is no reason why a second should not be, and even a third and a fourth; if it should come to that. The laying of the old cable may, therefore, be considered a certainty, so far as anything about cable-laying can be certain. But hope deferred will, probably, not make sick the hearts of shareholders beyond next July.

The new cable, which is to be laid first, is very different in appearance from that of 1865. That was black, but not at all comely. This is fair to see, in point of color, but rough withal, and shrewish—to coin a word for the occasion. But, save that there is no dark composition soaked into the Manilla hemp which forms the covering of the outer wires, this cable is identical with the last. So far, however, as strength goes, the new rope will bear a strain of from fifteen hundred weight to a ton more than that of last year; and, as is obvious, this additional strength may just make the difference between breaking and holding, if it should unfortunately be necessary to haul back to the ship at any time. The reason why it is possible to dispense with the composition for coating is that in the new cable the outer or protecting wires are galvanized. About 100 miles of the new cable have been already made, and when all the machinery is set to work, as it soon will be, the manufacture will proceed at the rate of 100 miles per week. By working overtime, this immense speed could be nearly doubled; but, of course, overtime will be avoided if possible. In all departments of the machinery the capacity has been much increased since last year. For instance, there are double the number of tanks which hold the core of the cable; and there is one new machine which alone turns out four miles per day of completed cable.—London Herald, 27th ult.

How Testimony in Behalf of the South.—When the Senate of Virginia was about to adjourn, a unanimous vote of thanks and approval was tendered to Lieut. Gov. Cowper, the presiding officer of that body, who responded in a handsome speech. From that speech we call the following:

"And I believe solemnly that, of all the citizens of the United States, the people of the Southern States are decidedly the most thoroughly loyal to that Constitution. And these are the sentiments of the Chief Magistrate of the nation—nay, I know it—and they are the sentiments of the best part of his Cabinet, who are now, to-day, standing, supporting and encouraging the Executive in the position he has taken."

These remarks the Herald of yesterday, are not the words of what is called "a rebel." They are the words of an original and consistent Union man, who opposed secession from first to last; and who, for his fidelity to the Union cause, was elected by the Unionists to the high position he now fills. This testimony to the loyalty of the Southern people deserves therefore to be written in letters of gold.

A NOBLE OBJECT.

Never was an organization formed having a more worthy and noble object in view, than the association now in operation at Baltimore, the purpose of which is to afford timely and substantial relief to the suffering and moneyless agriculturists of the South. We too well know how great a number of this class there were and still are—men a short time ago with abundant wealth at their command, but whom the sad ravages of war have left in possession of nothing but the lands which could not be wrested from them. These lands are as fertile as God's bright sun, in its daily course, shines down upon, and once were the source whence came much of the nation's wealth; but without capital the owners cannot plant and cultivate, and must see their once productive fields turn into a wilderness. There are many such cases in our fair Louisiana—most valuable plantations lying unused because the proprietors are without the necessary means to conduct them. It is not to be wondered at that the Southern people cling so tenaciously to the homes, the soil, for which they have made such terrible sacrifices. There are too many bright memories of the old time, and sad recollections of the more recent past, connected therewith, for them to willingly separate from the cherished spots; and many, consequently, prefer to remain in distress than sell their homesteads or permit them even temporarily to pass into the hands of strangers.

The association above referred to, which is called the Agricultural Aid Society of Baltimore, designs affording relief to this class, by supplying them with stock, seed, agricultural implements and other like necessaries in farming—taking the notes of the recipients of the favors in payment. We suppose security is required—probably mortgage on the land—but we can only conjecture upon this point. In an exchange we find the following note addressed to the secretary of the society, the place from which it is sent, except the word "Rectory," being left blank:

"GEORGE M. CARTER, Esq.—Dear Sir: I send you my note for wheat furnished me by the Agricultural Aid Society. But for the aid of that society, I would have been without farming implements, and, consequently, could not have seeded any wheat this year. I am fully persuaded this society has done great good to our community, for very many around us were in a similar situation with myself. I feel that I am under great obligations to it. Yours truly,

THOMAS E. LOCKE."

Such a society should have the sympathies and support of the people of the entire country, and we are glad to learn that the generous efforts of its projectors to restore to bloom the desolated fields of the South, are meeting with encouraging success. We shall endeavor to gain for our readers some further information regarding the operations of this noble association. That ably conducted journal, the "Field, Turf and Farm," warmly praises the men who are connected with it, and urges them to continue the work in which they are engaged as follows: "Our prosperity depends upon the flourishing condition of our agricultural pursuits. God has given to us a beautiful country, rich in soil as well as rich in minerals, and if we do not cultivate the fertile fields, we can develop none of that wealth upon which the power, fame and greatness of a nation rest."

WASHINGTON ITEMS.

President Johnson has signified that he will make no removals at present. He would gratify some Senators very much by dismissing two or three members of the Cabinet, and nominating political friends for their places. They would attempt to test the question raised in 1829-'30, but never decided, whether the President has the right to remove an officer without the consent of the Senate.

The Supreme Court of the United States has affirmed the decision of the court below condemning the steamer Bermuda as a Confederate blockade runner, captured during the war, but claimed and sued for as legitimate commercial property, by her owner, Edward Haige.

It is said now that the report that the gold claimed by the Richmond banks was to be returned, was premature. The matter is still undecided, and the gold is still held as abandoned property by the Freedmen's Bureau.

The Committee of Ways and Means have agreed to report a very considerable reduction in the internal revenue taxation, and especially to repeal the tax of six cents per ton, now levied on freight.

Arrangements have been made by the General Land Office which will soon result in the opening of land offices in all the Southern States. The first office for the sale of Government lands has been opened in Little Rock, Arkansas.

The bill declaring all persons born in this country to be citizens of the United States, excepting Indians not taxed, and to secure all persons in the enjoyment of their civil rights, has finally passed both Houses of Congress, and will soon be presented to the President.

It is understood that Controller Clarke will be asked to resign to-morrow by the President. Secretary McCulloch treats his demonstration with contempt. It is admitted among Republicans that Mr. Hooper smashed him up badly in the House.

Assistant Treasurer Fox, of the Navy, will leave the department for duty in a new position, on the last of this month.

General Schoepff comes back to the Patent Office.

Mr. English, the Democratic candidate for Governor in Connecticut, is in the city.

Mr. Creswell abandoned opposition to the confirmation of the nomination of Marshal Bonnifant, of Maryland.

Mr. Whiting, of the Interior Department, has gone to New York to investigate, concerning the alleged delays in paying pensions there. Mr. Prior, of the Pension Office, has gone to Philadelphia for a like purpose.

Mystery Solved.—The little son of Mrs. Taylor, formerly of Lafayette county, Miss., occupying rooms in the Irving Block, suddenly disappeared about five weeks ago. Every effort was made by the unhappy mother to recover her child. Advertisements were inserted in our papers, the police were called into requisition, and inquiries made in every direction, but no clue was obtained to the mystery, and the mother finally gave up in despair. A few days since a singular and horrible stench developed itself about the building, and at length becoming unbearable, on yesterday search was made for the cause. Upon examining an old sink in the rear of the building, the remains of the poor child were found, in the last stage of decomposition. It seems the sink was covered with shavings and other trash generally left about a new building, that the little fellow in his play must have ventured upon it and fallen through, and being perhaps rendered insensible by the foul air, was unable to give the alarm. The heart-broken mother will have the sympathy of all persons of feeling and sensibility.—Memphis Avalanche.

☞ Probably no man who has figured during the war, has been so ill understood as Jeff. Thompson. Under a kind of slam-bang manner, and a recklessness of speech, he conceals some of the noblest qualities. He was never guilty of any mean or cruel act. He treated his prisoners with the most scrupulous justice and kindness. In several instances he gave himself a great deal of trouble to do special favors to Union officers who needed and appreciated them. It will surprise all who do not know him, to learn that Thompson has one of the best mathematical minds in the country, and that several years ago he invented some new methods of calculation that were adopted on all the railroads in the United States.—Memphis Post.

SUBMARINE VOLCANO.

The United States Consul at Patras, Greece, under date of, February 15, 1866, transmits to the Department of State a translation of a series of observations, commencing the 23d of January, on the renewal of activity of the submarine volcano at Santorin:

It appears that a remarkable phenomenon has for several days occupied the attention of the inhabitants of that place. On the 18th inst. a low, rumbling sound was heard, from time to time, at New Cameria, and especially at the place called Vulcan, where the mineral waters are. At the same time stones, detaching themselves from different points on the island, rolled down continually. The morning of the 19th walls of buildings were covered with cracks, as was also the ground. Toward noon the rumblings began to be more frequent, till they seemed like the successive detonations of artillery. The sea was violently agitated, and an innumerable multitude of bubbles rose incessantly from the depths. On the surface, and at the beach was seen white vapor with a sulphurous odor.

The afternoon of the same day the ebullition of the sea increased, and the soil at the water's edge commenced gradually to sink down, and at about 5 o'clock, on the sea and western side of the same port, flames were seen, forming a crucial fire of ten to fifteen square meters at its base, and four to five meters in height. After an hour these flames entirely disappeared. A nearer examination was then made, when it was discovered that a portion of New Cameria was broken to pieces, and the island was completely divided by a chasm, and four little lakes of pure and quite sweet water appeared, whose size was slowly increasing.

As the party of observation advanced towards the focus of the volcanic action, they noticed a sulphurous odor. White and suffocating vapors arose from the agitated sea, and from time to time spots of greenish color appeared, proving that the vapors which arose were of hydrosulphurons and hydrophosphoric nature.

At the time the coosul dispatches were mailed the odor and smoke were becoming more intense, and at times red flames were seen at the centre of volcanic action, and the smoke became thicker and of a deeper color. It is believed that if these phenomena continue the whole islands may be sunk.

Catching Cold.—A valuable lesson may be learned from the fact that common colds were almost unknown in our army during the late war. Men were exposed to cold and wet long continued, so that during cold storms of winter men often were wet as long as the storm continued, and until their clothing dried upon them when the storm ceased. If this proves anything, it proves the falsity of the common complaint that one has been out too much and has caught cold. The truth is, he has been in too much.

You keep close by a warm fire with heavy clothing on nearly all your time, and the first time you meet a blast of cold air with all the pores of your body relaxed, and your whole system enervated by heat, you catch cold, and then comes Ipecac, Squills, Senega, and Dr. Cure-all's Cough Syrup, and Dr. Dose-em's Expectorant, all because you have kept too near the fire, and then you say, I can't go out without catching cold. Take a dose of God's own cold air every day, and you will find time, money, and many a pain and ache saved; and if you will add good doses of cold water on the outside, you will find that heaven's pure air and earth's pure fountain are the best of cures, and the most certain preventives of disease.—Army Surgeon.

A Fish in an Oil Well—Singular Discovery.—The Pithole (Penn.) Record has the following:

No. 66, T. Holmden Farm, has been pumping oil and water for some time, and on Saturday last the Superintendent had the tubing drawn for the purpose of cleaning the well out and drilling it deeper. During the operation they struck a large crevice in the rock, and on using the sand pump they brought to the surface a live fish, having no eyes, of a brown color, and some four inches long. The fish was brought from a depth of six hundred and sixteen feet, and no doubt felt as much surprised at being introduced into this vale of tears as did those who made the introduction. This specimen of the infernal production of the earth was put in water, immediately after being brought to the surface, but being accustomed to a more retired life, with a mixture of salt water and oil for food and raiment, survived his changed condition of life but a few hours. He was as tightly "bottled" as Butler on the James, and is now on exhibition at lease 66. It will furnish food for theoretically inclined individuals, as to how the fish came there, and what its state of existence, and what the formation of the lower regions it inhabited.

☞ Gen. Joe Johnston, we hear with pleasure, says the New York Tribune, is employing about five hundred of his old Confederate soldiers on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, which he is refitting. This is the right kind of reconstruction. We do not doubt that there are thousands of whites in the South who would go to work likewise, if they had a fair chance. And we urge all Southernors who reject free black labor, or who can't get it, to follow Gen. Johnston's example. Don't send to Ireland, or Germany, or the North, for white laborers, till you have advertised widely and offered fair wages for them among your own people. Rely on it, gentlemen, there is nothing like home industry to make a country prosperous and its people virtuous and happy.

Dividing up the Arlington Estate among the Negroes.—The Superintendent of Freedmen's Villages has been instructed by Major General O. O. Howard to divide the Arlington estate, lying east of the road, into five acre lots, to be rented on written agreements to the freedmen, the rent to be paid at each harvesting of the crops. Fifteen acres on the west side of the road to be divided and rented in the same manner. About twenty acres to be as a garden by the dependents of the freedmen's village. This estate is not confiscated property, and, therefore, cannot revert to the heirs at the death of the owner; but it was sold for taxes and purchased by the Government for the purpose to which it is now being applied.

Worthy of Thought.—At a recent public meeting in Buffalo, N. Y., to sustain the President, Dr. Brunck, editor of the Democrat, a German paper, made a speech, in which he sketched the disasters which followed those nations of the world that imposed unjust disabilities on those whom they conquered. Among others, he contrasted the English policy towards Ireland and Scotland and the result, saying:

The English policy towards Scotland had been just, and brought with it the spirit of unity, so that in National feeling the countries are inseparably one; while in Ireland, where a different policy, ignoring differences of character and adaptation of local institutions, has been followed, the more powerful Nation, at a time of peace and when no new oppression had for many years been instituted, is rocked to her centre by the hatred and uprising of the people. As Asdrubal made his son Hannibal swear eternal hatred to the Romans, so will we, by the exclusion of the Southerners, be the means of teaching ineradicable, pernicious and hereditary hatred to their children. From these evils it was not to late to save the country.

The Paris Exhibition.—Gen. Banks made a very brilliant and forcible speech in the House this afternoon on the bill making appropriations for the Paris exposition. He urged in a very effective manner the necessity of making a highly creditable exhibition of the natural and mechanical resources of the country. The effect of such a display upon European nations would repay the Government and country beyond all calculation. In the course of his speech, Mr. Banks referred so eloquently to the vast and undeveloped wealth of the country that he was applauded on the floor, and at the conclusion of his speech was congratulated by scores of members who had listened with profound attention. Mr. Washburne indicated a disposition to oppose the bill, but it is hardly possible that the effect of General Banks' admirable speech can be so far overcome as to defeat the proposition.

COURTESY IN HOME LIFE.

In the first place, then, let us watch our course when we are entertaining strangers, whose good opinion we wish to propitiate. We dress ourselves with care, we study what it will be agreeable to say, we do not suffer our natural laziness to prevent our being very alert in paying small attentions, we start across the room for an easier chair, we stoop to pick up the fan, we search for the mislaid newspaper, and all this for persons in whom we have no particular interests beyond the passing hour; while with those friends whom we love and respect we sit in our old faded habiliments, and let them get their own chair, and look up their own newspaper, and fight their own way daily, without any of this preventing care. In the matter of personal adornment, especially, there are a great many people who are chargeable with the same fault that I have already spoken of in reference to household arrangements. They have a splendid wardrobe for company, and a shabby and sordid one for domestic life. A woman puts all her income into party dresses, and thinks anything will do to wear at home. All her old tumbled finery, her frayed, dirty silks and soiled ribbons, are made to do duty for her hours of intercourse with her dearest friends. Some seem to be really principled against wearing a handsome dress in every-day life; they "cannot afford" to be well dressed in private. Now, what I should recommend would be to take the money necessary for one or two party dresses, and spend it upon an appropriate and tasteful home toilette, and to make it an avowed object to look prettily at home. Now, I maintain, that in family life there should be an effort not only to be neat and decent in the arrangement of our person, but to be also what the French call coquette—or, to put it in plain English, there should be an effort to look handsome in the eyes of our dearest friends. Many worthy women, who would not for the world be found wanting in the matter of personal neatness, seem somehow to have the notion that any study of the arts of personal beauty in family life is unmatronly; they buy their clothes with simple reference to economy, and have them made up without any question of becomingness; and hence marriage sometimes transforms a charming, trim, tripping young lady into a waddling matron, whose every day toilet suggests only the idea of a feather bed tied round with a string. For my part, I do not believe that the summary banishment of the graces from the domestic circle, as soon as the first baby makes its appearance, is at all conducive to domestic affection. Nor do I think that there is any need of so doing. These good housewives are in danger, like other saints, of falling into the error of neglecting the body, through too much thoughtfulness of others, and too little for themselves. If a woman ever had any attractiveness, let her try and keep it, setting it down as one of her domestic talents.—Chimney Corner.

THE LADIES OF THE SOUTH.

The New York Tribune, for some time past, has lavished insult upon the ladies of the South. No epithet has been too severe. It thinks them mean, vulgar, uneducated, illiterate, &c. The Courrier des Etats Unis, a French paper published in New York, in answering the slanderous imputations of the Tribune, pays the following beautiful tribute to the ladies of the South:

It seems to us that a thousand reasons, not to mention the simple one of propriety, should restrain a Northern journal from such attacks. The Tribune should remember, too, the heroism displayed by the Confederate women for their cause. Whether this cause was good or bad, the Southern women have sustained it nobly, and with a force of character which recalls the ancient women of Sparta, and which has everywhere commanded respect and admiration.

Not satisfied with attacking the Southern women, the Tribune institutes between them and the women of the North a comparison as odious as it is unjust. "Our women," says Mr. Greeley's newspaper, "are everywhere a most cultivated class; the women of the South are more illiterate than the men."

We dispute the truth of this assertion. The ladies of Charleston, of New Orleans, and of Richmond have shone in all the European saloons where they have appeared—as brilliantly as those of New York and Boston. We do not like learned women; we are repelled by women versed in Latin and philosophy, and, unlike Mr. Greeley, take the part of Henriette against Armande. A woman may be educated, certainly, but let her never become a pedant; and, above all, let her never parade her learning. We do not see at the South such physical and philosophical ladies; we see only too many of them at the North.

Let us permit the Tribune to insist upon the "gross ignorance" of the Confederate women, and to refer to this ignorance their energy and constancy during the war. We attribute the great qualities of which the Southern women have given us a higher example to a higher origin. There are no occasions in history when women, whose missions in ordinary times is to make the good wife, the tender mother, and to polish manners by the charm and grace which she brings into all social relations, may rise above herself and give examples of the highest virtues. These occasions occur when the sacred soil of her country, and with it (or through it) the domestic hearth and the family are threatened with invasion. The high virtues the women of the South have practiced without ostentation, without theatrical parade. They have borne all privations, they have defied all outrages by their proud and impassable attitude. Soldiers, drunken with blood, could outrage their bodies, but their victims remained as pure as those Christian virgins whose memories the embrace of the executioner could not defile. All that is precious to women—dress, jewels, the luxuries of home—all these the Southern women gave up—they did not even recoil before sacrifices still more painful—they did not fear to break their hearts by sending forth their sons to do battle for a cause sacred in their eyes, like that Lacedemonian mother who showed a shield to her son and said simply—return with it or on it—do thy duty or die.

Let the Tribune, then, cease to insult these conquered women, of whom the defeat has not diminished the greatness. The North, like the South, has its contingent of good, graceful, educated and elegant bred women; it has, perhaps, a larger number of that class who so little deserve the name of women, and for whom certain announcements are made in the journals; it possesses, also, a greater share of learned and pedantic ladies—but for these, will New Orleans not become envious of Boston.

Effect of Radicalism on Trade.—If the business of the country is dull at a season when all should be animation, to what shall we ascribe it but the unsettled state in which the Radical agitators are resolved to keep everything. With the South returned to its formal relations to the Union and the other States, labor would have speedily adjusted itself to the new situation, cotton fields would have been got in preparation for planting, capital would have commenced to flow into that new productive section, the basis of an active and healthy trade with the North would have been established, and the old circle of industrial employments would have been made whole again for the advantage of the country. But now there is only doubt. No such crop of cotton is likely to be produced as might have been. A delay in setting about the work of revival when all parties were in the right mood, will not fail to aggravate a condition of things none too promising already. And with business deadened and depressed, by reason of Radicalism alone, which affects to carry its head far above all such mercenary considerations, the public credit is deprived of those very supports which are all it has to rely on for existence.

Important Rumor.—A special Washington dispatch to the Baltimore Sun says:

A highly important rumor has just reached me from a source entitled to consideration, to the effect that the President had summoned to this city the Senators elect from all the reorganized Southern States, lately in revolt. The report may be premature, but several of these Senators are now here, and have been requested by the President to remain.

Labor, not Worry.—It is not labor that kills men; it is worry. Work is healthy; you can hardly put more upon a man than he can bear. Worry is rust upon the blade. It is not the revolution that destroys the machinery, but the friction. Fear secretes acids; but love and trust are sweet juices.

THE THUGS.

Mr. Vallandigham, in a recent speech at Dayton, denounces the Radicals of the Rump Congress as "Thugs, stranglers of the Union." This, certainly, appears to us rather an appropriate name for a class of fanatics, who have been banded together for so many years in this country for the vilest of purposes, the murder of its citizens and the strangling of republican institutions. Thuggism has existed in India for over two thousand years and the lives sacrificed by the Thugs, to conformity with their fanatical ideas, may be estimated by the million. So has it been with our modern Thugs, only they have, in four years, sacrificed more lives than their prototypes did in thousands. The ancient Thug held strangling his victim as a religious principle, and that same principle governs the modern Thug. They would strangle all the Constitutional rights of the citizen. During the existence of our civil war they strangled the rights of free speech, of a free press, of free thought and of personal liberty; and now the war is ended, they are engaged in strangling the sovereignty of eleven States of this Union, and the rights of millions of free white citizens in those States. The ancient Thug held it as a fundamental part of his creed, that the ties of friendship, of country and of race, must give way before the claims of the overmastering fanatical impulse that sent him forth upon the highway as a murderer and secret assassin. The fanaticism of our modern Thugs is not a whit less potent in its influence, and scarcely less destructive in its demands upon the zealot who embraces it and gives way to its devilish impulses. The application of this title, therefore, by Mr. Vallandigham, who has felt the hug of these fanatics, but, fortunately, escaped with his life, appears to us very appropriate.—N. Y. News, 12th.

EMIGRANT LABOR.

The Commissioners of Emigration, previous to this date, had refused access to all persons wishing to go within their jurisdiction for the purpose of obtaining supplies of labor. That privilege was under some suspicious spirit of monopoly, confined to only those individuals who sought labor as agents for others. That extraordinary rule was not only a clear injustice to employers, by forcing them into the hands of these agents, but by making such go-betweens a necessity, was an injustice to the emigrant also. We are gratified to learn, now, that the restriction has been removed; and that all persons well recommended may visit the grounds of the Commissioners for the employment of labor for their own wants. This bears, at all events, the seeming of a reform; but with the ugly fact before us of the previous exclusion of all but agents, we don't like to see the rights of the employer limited, or at all events, subjected to the interpretations that may be put by underlings of the Commissioners, on the words "well recommended." Every man or woman who wants to employ labor, ought to have free access, for that purpose, to the Emigration Depot; and after he or she shall have concluded arrangements with the parties, the Commissioners should not interfere beyond the extent of a reference as to the bona fide character of the contract. To save this reference from impediments in the interest of agency monopoly, plain instructions as to its character ought to be given, and by thus facilitating the work of employment, the Commissioners will not only save time to the emigrant, and unnecessary fees to the employer, but will reduce, very decidedly, the cost of maintaining the establishment at Castle Garden.—N. Y. News, 11th inst.

A General Amnesty Necessary.—The Radical plots are a curse to the country that shadows the very sunshine of peace. Why is it that trade languishes in the South? Why is it that Northern capitalists will not invest in that section, although the most brilliant inducements offer to purchase the fine lands of the impoverished planters? It is because the intrigues of the Radicals impress all business men with a sense of uncertainty and insecurity. Their venom poisons the life fountains of the industrial system and creates lethargy and stagnation where else all would be activity and enterprise. Is it not monstrous that the elements of our National advancement should be disturbed by the arts of these incendiary demagogues? We appeal to the President to put these maniacs in moral shackles, or, at least, to deprive them of the weapons of their frenzy. They can easily be disarmed. A proclamation of general amnesty would compel them to cease their revolutionary legislation, based upon the assumption of Southern "disloyalty." The exercise of the Executive clemency would be at this crisis an act of grace to the whole country. Why withhold it?—N. Y. News, 14th inst.

The Mobile and Ohio Railroad.—That a change must and shall be made in the administration of the road is becoming more and more apparent every day.

As to the choice of a successor for Judge Milton Brown, we have heard several names mentioned since Gen. Longstreet, whose chances were so bright, has declined the further use of his own. Those names are Gen. Braxton Bragg and Major Gen. Dabney H. Maury.

We cannot conceal our marked preferences for the latter.

Gen. Maury possesses all the qualities required for the management of an administration of the magnitude of our road, and his manners are such as to create friends for him wherever he appears.

With one of the brightest records as a military commander, the modesty and simplicity of his private life have endeared him to all those who, during our unfortunate civil troubles, ever had any intercourse with him, and his long station at Mobile has rendered him familiar with the wants of her population.

Let it not, however, be supposed that we base our preference on any but personal sympathies, as we have no less admiration for the official and military character of Gen. Bragg.

We heartily desire that the friends of both those distinguished men should come to some understanding, so as not to fritter away their sympathies and thus allow the re-election of the present President, to whom Mobile has but little cause to be grateful.—Mobile Times, 15th inst.

The Alexandria Election.—Of the municipal election held in Alexandria, Va., on Tuesday last, the State Journal of that city says:

As was anticipated by every person in the city familiar with the condition of our present political status, the Union ticket was yesterday defeated by an overwhelming majority. Not a single Union candidate received a majority of the votes cast in any of the wards. At least seven of the successful candidates have been in the South during the rebellion, and a majority of these served in the ranks of the rebel army, and it is a noteworthy fact that while some of the "reconstructed" voters were challenged, they were, without a single exception, allowed to vote. In the Second Ward nine votes were objected to being received by Commissioners Armstrong and Simpson. These votes were, however, counted in the general result by the Board of Commissioners this morning. In the First Ward objections were entered by Mr. Howard, one of the Commissioners to the reception of votes from those individuals who had returned from the South within the past twelve months, but his objections were overruled. In the Third and Fourth Wards no questions were propounded to the voters by the Commissioners on this point. We understand that steps will be immediately taken to contest the election of several of the officers.

Financial and Commercial.

MONETARY.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE,
NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, March 24, 1866.

The movement in financial circles, to-day has been closed no variation of any kind that calls for special notice. Gold ruled throughout as on yesterday. Some trifling sales were effected, at exceptional figures, but the principal movement transpired within the range of previous quotations. The market was amply supplied from the opening to the close, and the demand, which was at no time active or heavy, resulted in the following sales, viz.: $6000 at 125¼; $4000 and $10,000 at 125¾; $3000 and $10,000 at 125⅞; $2000, $2000, $5000, $5000, $4000, $4000, $8000, $10,000, $9000, $10,000, and $14,000 at 126; $1000, $2500, $4000 and $5000, at 126¼; and $4000, $20,000, and $20,000, at 126½. The movement in silver has been confined to $1@3 American coin at 119@120. We still quote gold at 126@126¼; and silver at 121@123 for American coin, and 124@127 for Mexican dollars.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE.—The movement in foreign bills has disclosed increased firmness to-day, and sales of small amounts have been effected at a slight advance on yesterday's prices. The pressure of offerings upon the market was of a more restricted character, however, while the demand was confined to a much more limited number of buyers than heretofore. The sales for the day were confined to the subjoined amounts, viz.: £3000, £5000, and £10,000, at 125¼; £9000 at 134@135¼; £7300 at 133¾@135¼; £3000 and £7000 at 134½; £3000 at 135; £20,000, sold by one broker, at 132¾@135, £3000, in two lots, at 134¼; £2000 at 133¾; and £1000, sold for gold, at 108. The sales of trades show some increase, and include 200,000f, at 4.21¼f. 225,000f and 275,000f, at 4.22½f; 225,000f and 300,000f, the latter in three lots, at 4.25f; 300,000f taken by one bank, at 4.25@4.26¼f; and 50,000f at 4.27½f. The closing quotations this evening are: for bank sterling, 135@135¼; clear bills, 134@135; bill of lading bills, 132@133; bank francs, 4.15@4.17½f; and outdoor francs, 4.21¼@4.26¼.

DOMESTIC EXCHANGE.—There is no variation of any kind to notice in domestic exchange. Offerings, though restricted, are more than ample for the demand, and the sales to-day have been confined to the subjoined amounts, viz.: $50,000, $75,000 and $100,000 New York sight at ½ ₱ cent. discount; and $100,000 and $115,000 do. at 9-16@½ ₱ cent. discount; $18,000, $30,000 and $65,000 one day's sight at ⅝ ₱ cent. discount, and $75,000 thirty days' at 1¼ ₱ cent. discount.

STOCKS AND BONDS.—The movement in securities of any kind is almost wholly neglected. A few favorite classes attract some attention, but the general run find no buyers. Sales since our last have been restricted to one $1000 bond of the Opelousas Railroad Company at 81½; 100 shares of the stock of the same company at 5¼; and 6 and 49 shares of City Railroad Company on private terms.

UNCURRENT BANK NOTES.—There has been some inquiry to-day for the notes of the several banks in liquidation, but the offerings, as heretofore, were small, and operations have been confined to the following lots, viz.: $2500 Bank of Louisiana at 61½; $6200 at 61¾; and $2500 and $4000 do. at 62c.; $40.0 Bank of New Orleans at 93¾, and $1000 Louisiana State Bank at 85c. ₱ dollar. In the present condition of the market, we, of course, cannot present reliable or even approximatio quotation.

COMMERCIAL.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE,
NEW ORLEANS, FRIDAY, MARCH 24, 1866.

COTTON.—The market exhibited a better feeling at the opening this morning, despite the further decline in prices at New York yesterday, as announced by telegraph. Offerings were unusually light, and the demand, which was moderately active at an early hour, soon became general, and resulted in sales of 5753 bales at steadily enhancing prices. The diminution of the supply was owing to the fact that a large number of factors had covered up their samples on Wednesday evening and refused to entertain overtures on the basis of previous ruling rates, while those which remained open to inspection were held at materially higher prices, and transactions show an advance of fully 1c. ₱ lb on the ruling figures of yesterday. The sales for the day have been magnified by rumor to an almost indefinite extent, but we have received the actual report from every buyer who participated in the movement, and the aggregate is as stated above. The operations, as divided among buyers, were in the following order, viz.: 1650, 1000, 670, 500, 500, 400, 350, 250, 100, 100, 70, 63, 50 and 50 bales. As the market has assumed greater steadiness towards the close of business this evening, we are enabled to furnish approximating quotations, which will be found to rule as follows, viz.: ordinary, 31@33c.; good ordinary, 35@36c.; low middling, 37@38c.; and middling, 40@41c.

THE CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

HOW SHALL WE MAKE IT, AND WHEN.

Mr. Editor—It is matter of history, that one hundred years ago Methodism was planted in America. That is, in A. D. 1766, the first Methodist class was formed, the first Methodist congregation gathered, and the first Methodist sermon preached, in New York, by Philip Embury, a local preacher and a Palatine Irishman.

It is possible that a year or so earlier, Methodism was planted in Maryland, by Robert Strawbridge, another local preacher and Irishman, who arrived in this country and settled in Frederic county, some time between 1760 and 1765. The date of his labors and successes is not furnished accurately.

A more formal period from which to reckon the Centenary of American Methodism is 1769. In that year, in the Conference held at Leeds, Wesley called for missionaries to the New World, and Joseph Pilman and Richard Boardman responded and were sent. Then, for the first time, America (what a circuit!) took place in the minutes.

The first Centenary (between 1860 and 1866, and based on Strawbridge's labors) is rather indefinite, has passed. The war was on us then, and it could not have been celebrated, even had it been exactly fixed in history.

The second, 1866, is now upon us. But Christians exhausted in material resources; struggling to live, and not able to build monuments. Repairing burnt and wantonly abased church property, and not at all care for sentimental enterprises.

The third and more historic period is twenty years ahead, 1869. No doubt about that, as an era in American Methodism.—When it comes, I hope we shall be ready to celebrate it with gifts and offerings and prayers.

But shall we let 1866 go by default?—There is interest in the date; there is motion and a spring to the mind and heart in it. Like the cluster of first ripe grapes—there is a blessing in it.

The Church moves by centuries. In A. D. 1544, the Roman Catholic Church, aroused by the spread of the Reformation, began holding its celebrated Council of Trent—giving the last and most complete expression and shape to the doctrine and discipline of that powerful but corrupt communion. A. D. 1644 the Westminster Assembly put the finishing touch to Calvinistic theology and Congregational polity. A. D. 1744 the first Methodist Conference was in session. Wesleyan labor and spirit then became organized, and the Arminian system perfected its development. A. D. 1844 witnessed the jurisdictional division of the largest representative body of Methodism in the world. The General Conference separated into Northern and Southern, greatly to the peace and increase of power in the whole Church.

The question is now, by what historic act shall the close of the American Methodist Centenary, from 1766, be celebrated?

Let us go for a celebration. Providence seems to indicate it. Our General Conference, the Congress of the Church, happily meets this very year 1866. To Southern Methodism it pertains to initiate the next act. Jacob, instead of Esau, inherits the birthright. In Isaac, and not Ishmael, shall thy seed be called. Can we read the signs of the times? O, that we may be taught to know what Israel ought to do.

How shall we celebrate the Centenary before us, and step forward to the Centenary before us? The Northern branch of the Church is rich and increased in means. They are laying foundations for Biblical Institutes, a Central Education Fund, a huge brick and mortar Mission House. Money—thousands of it—millions! They are gathering for thank-offerings, for memorials, and for grandeur.—The first, a million of dollars was to be raised by general contribution for connectional and local purposes. One of their bishops, laymen, came forward with a fifth of the sum! Now they have raised their figures, and strike for five millions. Count it. Imagine it, ye poor, desolated Confederates.

Providence, which, I sincerely believe, means to preserve a pure Methodism in the land, by the jurisdictional independence of the Southern Church, and which dictated the separation when the virus of Abolitionism, radicalism and fanaticism both prevail in the Northern limb of the body—Providence, I say, shows us up to a nobler and more significant celebration.

Not one of brick and mortar—of stone or greenbacks. These are of the earth, earthy. We can readily conceive how they may corrupt the church which is enriched by them; and be so administered, boasted of and depended on, as to hasten the decay instead of the growth of culture.

Silver and gold we are short of. But we have a grand opportunity is ours to lay down principles, and to introduce elements of strength into Methodist economy, that will make the close of our first hundred years memorable, and give an impulse and breath to it, that shall introduce a new and even a grander epoch.

Say that we have in the approaching General Conference 144 members—preachers. Give us such a change in Discipline as shall bring into that body 144 laymen, of social position, power and piety. Trace out this one measure into all its consequences. This alone would be worth five millions of dollars in greenbacks, well and safely invested.

Look in upon an Annual Conference. In a multitude of counsellors there is wisdom. Where are the laity? I will not call names of such laymen as you, reader, and you and you, know. Think of them, side by side with the preachers in Conference, devising means for the welfare of the Church, and caring for all its interests.—Would not that Conference be stronger?

Here you have 100 preachers in an Annual Conference. Add 100 laymen to this body; not holding their seats, as the preachers do, ex officio; but elected to them on the grounds of personal zeal, intelligence and fitness. Don't you double the strength of that body? Don't you double its influence upon the community? This is worth, to the whole Church, another five millions of greenbacks.

"You make the Annual Conferences too large," objects a friend. Well—divide the Annual Conferences, and cultivate the territory more closely. Cover the whole ground better. How many millions in greenbacks is this worth, in the long run?

Increase the Episcopal force, and let it teach, arouse, organize and vitalize the districts and the circuits, and be felt everywhere, and all the time, through the Church. This would be worth several millions in greenbacks.

Extend the pastorate. Review the appointments annually—herein lies the genius of itinerancy. Remove the arbitrary restrictions, and let the Bishops have the power of continuing an appointment so long as it works well. What an impulse will, by this one rule, be given to Methodism? Worth several more millions in green-backs.

These modifications, and a few other and minor ones, Providence further indicates as our Centenary celebration, by having prepared the mind of the Church for them. What a singular agreement prevails? How far were some of us from these things a few years ago? How far were we from each other? Now there appears a drawing together, an agreement, a maturity of conviction, and a quiet waiting for the assembling of the General Conference, in this Centenary year.

These changes and modifications will be seen and felt for good, to the enlargement and spiritual growth and vitality and power of Methodism, as it marches on through the next century, when greenbacks shall have been forgotten, and the monuments raised by greenbacks shall have fallen into decay, and the investments of greenbacks shall have been swept away by financial revolutions.

This, then, is to be our celebration, and a fit one: The inauguration of great principles and policies. M.

WESLEYANISM.

It speaks well for the character of Mr. Wesley, that his example and religious views exert such undiminishing influence among so great a number of intelligent and pious people, and it is an essential enhancement of the credit of those who cherish that influence and labor to make it operate in the sphere legitimate to it. The more pains that is taken to represent the man just as he lived and worked, the more will he be esteemed as an example of the genuine Christian, and the more commanding of respect and deference will his views on Christian life and Christian institutions appear to be.

Mr. Wesley employed his wonderful gifts, supported by a singularly clear and profound religious experience, in awakening a christian consciousness among his contemporaries; and all the agencies he brought to his support aimed to cultivate christian life. The result of his labors was properly enough called a revival; to foster this result was the single endeavor of his life and labors. His doctrinal views were not so peculiar to him as a reformer as was his labors—properly enough called a revival, and not a reformation. The doctrines of which he became the popular expounder, were not so altogether individually peculiar to him, as were his style of activity, and the agencies which received his sanction, and which afterwards afforded the most indisputable proof of his sagacity.

The religious life called forth by his efforts, and sustained by his personal influence, gave him an authority amongst his followers little less than that of an inspired apostle; nor is there, after the lapse of many years, and the removal of the generation among whom he labored, any discoverable ground to question his title to their confidence and veneration; nor is there any valid reason why his authority should not now be deferred to, by those who occupy the place made vacant by his death.

Wesleyanism is another name for a fervent expression of christian life; not simply the acceptance of a creed, but rather the consciousness of a direct personal faith in Christ, and a vital relation to him; a faith not so much under the control of reason, as of affection, and therefore the offspring of the heart. Deep down in the seat of life did Mr. Wesley strive to penetrate with the word of God, and there to call forth a faith that should ever afterwards mix with the nameless affections and sympathies of the human soul; there it would necessarily receive that peculiar impress of earnestness which characterized his own experience; and there it would steadily draw on the entire strength of man's being to carry it, through the incidental struggles of life, to the final victory of overcoming the world.

The portraiture and exemplification of christian life and experience made by Mr. Wesley, has not been improved since his day. Into the necessities of the struggling christian he entered minutely, and his pastoral ministrations led him to discover many helps, which, though much used since, have always, to the earnest-minded, proved to be means of grace. So perfectly possessed did Mr. Wesley eventually become of the one thought, and the one purpose of saving souls, that the institutions which he cautiously adopted, and which were merely advisory at first, on evidencing a utility proportionate to his expectations, were thenceforward invested with all the force of obligation that his authority could impose upon them.

Serious objections have been urged against this trait of Mr. Wesley's mind. It is regarded as altogether too narrow for a great reformer. But the fact has been overlooked, that Mr. Wesley only jealously guarded a society by means of which he was laboring to improve the religious life of a church already established, of which he and his followers were members, and with whose form of government he was perfectly satisfied. No restraints can justly be drawn from this source to cramp the spirit of needful legislation for the church now. On the contrary, he that is most deeply imbued with the Wesleyan spirit will feel most at liberty to conform the fundamental economy of the church to the necessities of its membership; and the utmost complacency with which the present economy of the church may be regarded, cannot close the eye against the glaring necessity for change in several particulars.

The more important modifications and improvements, such as the abrogation of the class meeting test, the extension of the pastoral term, and a large increase of the Episcopacy, are measures which have undergone the preliminary discussions and "conference inquiry," and will be presented in proper form to the consideration of the General Conference. But there are many things, which, although of minor importance, need careful attention and skillful treatment. Of these the probationary term of membership is chief; and scarcely of less practical importance in all its supposed bearings upon the future prosperity of the church, than those main measures which are regarded as chiefly engrossing. "Probation" is Wesleyan, and will doubtless be earnestly defended on that score; but this was also a "society" measure of precaution, and answered that end. But for "probation" in a church, no authority can be found in the New Testament, and whatever advantage may have accrued to the societies by the observance of the rule, has been more than counterbalanced by the mischief it has been the fruitful occasion of to thousands in the church.

In the first place, it is an expression of doubtfulness. It implies indecision and instability at the very outset of christian enterprise, and has tended chiefly to foster these results.

In the second place, it uniformly deprives the act of joining the church of all solemnity, and settled determination, and has tended only to produce a disregard for the inestimable privilege of church membership.

In the third place, it complicates the economy of the church, without compensating by a single advantage. It answered for a society, the rules of which were rigid and arbitrary, and chiefly of human invention; but as a condition to affect membership in the church, it is as unsuitable as any of the rules and bye-laws of the fraternities and societies in the Catholic Church.

The abrogation of this rule will require the preparation of a form and service for the admission of members. An opportunity will thus be afforded, and a precedent set, for the revision and better construction and arrangement of the entire ritual, particularly the baptismal, the burial and the marriage ceremony. All this can be done without destroying or obliterating a single leading Wesleyan trait of the system of the Southern Methodist Episcopal Church, and without impairing the hearty will and to the perfection of a system, the chief value of which is its simplicity. MEMBERSHIP.

Messrs. Editors—Your correspondent W., has quite an appropriate and sensible article, in the Advocate of February 3d, on the reception of members into the Church—one, the precepts of which, if practised, would doubtless be of infinite advantage to the Church.

I have long regretted the laxity of the Church and ministers in enforcing the disciplinary requirement on that subject. In many instances I have known persons to remain as probationers for years; and frequently have I known probationers received into full connection in such a manner as to give no solemnity whatever to the occasion.

I hope it will not be considered egotistical in me to propose the addition of one other question to those already suggested by W., in order that there can be no mistaking the purport of the interrogatories. The question is this:

"Has God, for Christ's sake, pardoned your sins?"

It is possible that W. intended the question, "Have you faith in God?" to embrace the one just proposed; but if so, I think that it is not sufficiently explicit. I have ever believed that the framers of our Discipline intended that none but converted persons should be admitted into full connection, and have in my administration admitted none except those believed to be of that class, and who thus expressed themselves with confidence.

As the probationary system will possibly be abolished at the ensuing Conference, and members hereafter be received into the fellowship of the Church without trial, as heretofore, it seems to me that every possible means should be adopted to prevent unworthy persons from uniting with us, and also to secure the greatest possible efficiency in the Church.

"The visible Church of Christ," says our article, "is a congregation of faithful men," etc.; which term faithful, according to Mr. Wesley means true believer, and exactly corresponds with the idea of a true church, as presented in the New Testament Scriptures.

In the Epistle of the New Testament the Church is addressed as saints—Beloved of God—Them that are sanctified—The Faithful in Christ Jesus—Faithful brethren in Christ. And the Apostle speaks of the Church of the Thessalonians as being in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ. Now, it seems to me that the above terms cannot possibly apply to unconverted persons; if not, they compose no part of the true Church of Christ, and ought not to be admitted as members of his visible body. Unconverted persons are not in God the Father, nor in his Son, Jesus Christ, neither should they be admitted as members of his body here.

I regard the probationary system as being one of the best possible means for keeping unworthy persons out of the church proper. Indeed with that system, the door into the M. E. Church is more vigilantly guarded than that of any other with which I am acquainted; with which, and the above searching interrogatory and those proposed by W., it seems to me that it would be difficult for a designing person to impose himself on the church; as, in addition to their christian experience, their walk must be blameless for at least six months. I hope, therefore, that the next General Conference will not abolish a system productive of so much good, and so cherished by multiplied thousands, as is our probationary system. But if they do, I trust that the test of membership will be so rigid that unconverted persons cannot possibly gain admittance.

The Maiden Reading the Bible.

How beautiful, in her unsophisticated simplicity, reading the Book—the book most ancient, most wonderful, most true and most wise of all books. No shadow of skepticism crossed her sky, or dimmed the brightness of her faith. No; with trusting love, and adoring reverence, she reads it as God's book. She sat at the feet of God. Sat where Prophets and Kings had sat, to learn the lessons of wisdom divine, and the way to immortal life.

How beautiful the sight; the young mind free from all corrupting principles, all unbiassed, and unwarped with prejudice, coming into contact with the mind of God; as the unfolding bud opens to the genial rays of the morning sun, so her young mind opened to receive the word, the entrance of which giveth light. What purity of principle, what holiness of resolve, and what depth of love must such communion inspire.

The maiden reading her Bible, is a prophecy to the eye of faith. She is in the path that shines more and more unto the perfect day. Faith sees in her the matured Christian matron, with a widened circle of affections, and an enlarged sphere of holy activities and blessed ministries. Faith sees the maiden, the venerable saint, serene and happy; honored by many, and rejoicing on the frontiers of heaven, already breathing the air, and talking the speech of Canaan. W.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

The children, who have grown into a large family since you began your weekly visits, and who, some of them, remember you (en passant, their parents' marriage was recorded in your columns), were gleeful at the idea of your revival. Hungry for new reading during their war years, they turn eagerly to their corner, but look in vain. We who are elder know that in a perplexing situation children may be very troublesome little beings; but when you come out of the difficulties that beset your new appearance; when you have a quiet hour, help the mothers by giving the children a spare corner. Tell them of some new books; think of all they have lost in our isolation.

An incident occurs, that by your reviewing may be valuable. A four year old boy, whose Christian father sleeps near one of our saddest battle fields, had gone beyond the limits of propriety on a Sabbath evening. His mother, taking him on her lap, told him of the sinfulness of breaking God's holy day. The little fellow frankly confessed his fault and promised "not to do so again."

"But, Thomas," said his mother, "If you could be always good, what would you do with the past sins; they are all written down?"

"O," said the boy, "I will tear up the book when I go to Heaven."

"But if they should be on stone?"

"Then," he said resolutely, "I will break it."

See then made him feel that he could do nothing to destroy the record. He burst into hopeless tears. Now came the lesson, often told before, but now first understood, because first needed, through a sense of want: Of how Jesus came to seek and save and cleanse from sin, till the little heart was comforted. Since then no prayer is complete to him without, "For Jesus sake."

Yours, most friendly, H.

Stonewall Jackson.

The memory of Stonewall Jackson has received few tributes more touching in simplicity and pathos than the following beautiful poem, published in the New York Citizen, of which Mr. Charles C. Halpine is the editor. Mr. Halpine himself is a poet of rare taste, was an officer in the United States army during the late war, and is well known to fame as "Private Miles O'Reilly."—The poem in question, he says, is from the pen of a distinguished officer of the United States Navy.—Petersburg Express.

He sleeps all quietly and cold
Beneath the soil that gave him birth,
Then break his battle-brand in twain,
And lay it with him in the earth!

No more at midnight shall he urge
His lollsome march among the pines;
Nor hear upon the morning air
The war-shout of his charging lines.

Cold is the eye whose meteor gleam
Flashed hope on all within its light;
And still the voice that, trumpet-toned,
Rang through the serried ranks of fight.

No more for him shall cannons park,
Or tents gleam white upon the plain;
And where his camp fires blazed of yore,
Brown reapers laugh amid the grain!

No more above his narrow bed
Shall sound the tread of marching feet,
The rifle volley and the crash
Of sabres when the foemen meet.

And though the winds of autumn rave,
And winter snow fall thick and deep,
Above his breast—they cannot move
The quiet of his dreamless sleep.

We may not raise a marble shaft
Above the heart that now is dust;
But nature, like a mother fond,
Will ne'er forget her sacred trust.

Young April, o'er his lowly mound,
Shall shake the violets from her hair;
And glorious June, with fervid kiss,
Shall bid the roses blossom there.

And round about the droning bee,
With drowsy hum shall come and go;
While west winds all the livelong day
Shall murmur dirges soft and low.

The warrior's stormy fate is o'er,
The midnight gloom hath passed away;
And like a glory from the East,
Breaks the light of Freedom's day!

And white-winged Peace, o'er all the land,
Broods like a dove upon her nest;
While iron war, with slaughter gorged,
At length hath laid him down to rest.

And where we won our onward way,
With fire and steel through yonder wood,
The blackbird whistles, and the quail
Gives answer to her timid brood.

Yet oft in dreams his fierce brigade
Shall see the form they followed far,
Still leading in the farthest van—
A landmark in the clouds of war!

And oft when white haired grandsires tell
Of bloody struggles past and gone,
The children at their knees will hear
How Jackson led his columns on!

Longfellow has set the deeds of Florence Nightingale to beautiful music, which is worthy of being given entire, without the loss of a single note:

"Lo! in the house of misery
A lady with a lamp I see,
Pass through the glimmering gloom,
And flit from room to room.

"And slow, as in a dream of bliss,
The speechless sufferer turns to kiss
Her shadow, as it falls
Upon the darkening walls.

"As if a door in heaven should be Opened, and then closed suddenly,
The vision came and went,
The light shone and was spent.

"On England's annals, through the long
Hereafter of her speech and song,
That light its rays shall cast
From portals of the past.

"A lady with a lamp shall stand
In the great history of the land,
A noble type of good
Heroic womanhood."

SPRING.

Let us abridge our talk of books to-day. The delicious sounds and delicate smells of Spring steal upon us through the open window, and out-of-doors, we know, there is being wrought a sweeter, fairer poem than ever poet has sung. It is the old miracle and mystery of vegetable life, displayed anew, with its eternal freshness. And performed, on what a magnificent scale!—fringing the dikes and hedges, spreading like a tide over the lake-like levels, and glorifying miles and miles of belting woods. We feel hushed and awed by its universal presence, its silent, triumphant manifestation.

But Spring to us, in this altitude, is not wholly new-born. All winter the flutter of her silvern robes has been seen on the southern horizon, and frequent wafts of her perfumed breath proved her not far away. She does not return to us with such a sudden, swift glory—such a passionate, lavish burst of gladness and irrepressible beauty, as in northern latitudes. She comes not as a new-made queen, who seizes her purple robes and flashing crown in all the hurry of unexpected joy; but as one accustomed to her regal state, and with the proud and languid step of one clothed in habitual splendor. Her loudest herald is the careless mocking-bird, who makes the air of some bright morning turbulent with the merry jangle and liquid whistle of his notes, which he flings from his throat in reckless abandon and scatters upon the air like invisible bubbles. Her earliest smile, faint, capricious and uncertain as that of a long-time queen, is seen in the snowy and sky-blue blossoms of the tiny houstonic, spreading themselves among the dead grass of the prairies, and borrowing a deeper tint from stray violets. Before one knows it, the early garden flowers are sweetening the air, the resplendent pansy crowding fast upon the delicate, shrinking hyacinth; the oxalis is abroad on the prairies, with its specks of yellow; the star-grass is swinging its up-turned bells; the anemone turns back its shell-tinted corolla, and spreads flat its waxen rays; and soon the dewberry is making the ground white with its large, snow-flakey blossoms.

In a little while the air is odorous with peach-bloom, whose pink-masses are musical with the violin-hum of bees. From the woods comes the warm, aromatic smell of lemon colored blossoms pendant from the trees, and it mingles with the heavy pungent fragrance of juicy young leaves. Over the groves of live-oak, grim all winter under their grey beards of Spanish moss, blown about like old King Lear's, now creeps and creeps, deepens and thickens, a tender mist of green.—It hovers about the woods as far as eye can see, hanging among them like a sea-green haze, through which the tops of evergreens show like rocks honey-combed and black. The air is creamy-blue, warm and dreamy. There is no throb, no ecstacy in it; but a sense of perfect peace and full-veined, drowsy pleasure; the intense but tranquil rapture that attends the sure possession of long-sought love.

This miracle, this birth of visible glory from nakedness and darkness, this beginning of a carnival of greenery, is old as creation, but it never ceases to thrill us. It is so palpable, so vital, so full of silent motion, so instinct with mighty power. The new life gushes from the ground and the dry tree, with a strange freshness and force. The veins and sluices are open, and from a divine and hidden fountain floods of subtle influences pour in and transfigure the earth. If you go into the woods, there is a pervading Spirit in the air and sprouting boughs, that seems longing to speak to yours. To your inner ear there are wonderful hints, whispers, impressions.

You know all this burst of beautiful life means something; you feel that if you were only purer and better you could hear perfectly what the Spirit says. You cannot interpret all the sights and sounds, but there is a dumb, swelling response to them within you, and you know that heaven, and truth, and light are near.

ERASTIANISM.

This word, as descriptive of a system of doctrines, was in common use during the great controversies which took place in the Scottish Church during the seventeenth century, and now, greatly to the surprise and mortification of all true Presbyterians, it has again become a living and influential name in the controversies of the nineteenth century, and the American continent, where we had fondly supposed that all the questions which it represents had been settled finally and forever.

This ecclesiastical term is derived from the name of Thomas Erastus, a man celebrated both as a physician and theologian in the sixteenth century. He was born at Baden, in Germany, about the year 1854, a little after the date usually assigned for the commencement of the Reformation. He was sent to the University of Basil, at the early age of sixteen, and afterwards spent nine years at Bologna, in Italy, where he devoted himself to the study of both philosophy and medicine.

Although a very learned man and a very accomplished physician, his name would hardly have survived the wreck of time but for his work on the Church which, by his own direction, was not published until after his death.

This was probably owing to the prejudice which he foresaw would be excited by the doctrines which he held. The title of his book is—"De Excommunicatione Ecclesiastica." In it he denies that the Church of Christ possesses any independent authority, either spiritual or temporal; and contends that the censures of the Church, such as they are, are incapable of extending beyond the present life. He was answered by Beza, the pupil and successor of Calvin in the Church and school of Geneva, in a book entitled "De vera Excommunicatione et Christiano Presbyterio." Hammond, also, of the English Church, replied to the argument of Erastus, in his work on "The Power of the Keys."

During the controversy in Scotland, two hundred years ago, those who denied that the Lord Jesus Christ had established a kingdom in the world of a purely spiritual nature, and independent altogether of the civil power, were called "Erastians," and their doctrine Erastianism," and ever since that time those who in any respect, or to any extent, have endeavored to make the purely spiritual authority of the church subservient to any secular or temporal end, or to the advantage of any earthly power or potentate, have been characterized by the same term. In the sense of the old Scottish worthies, who, we thought, had secured by their conflicts and martyrdoms the final victory for the spiritual independence of the Church of Christ, they are Erastians. In the Presbyterian Church it is undoubtedly a term of reproach; yet truth and honesty, as well as the reverence due to the memory of our fathers and their heroic deeds and sufferings, require that it should be applied to those who compel the true Presbyterian to fight over again, in the nineteenth century, the great battle which we thought had been fought and won two hundred years ago.

SCIENCE AND CHRISTIANITY.—I have no fear that the splendors of physical science will make the crown of the Christian faith pale and wax dim. Let them stand before the world side by side, and let them both tell all they have to communicate concerning the nature of man, and concerning the achievements of God. The human heart will declare that, marvellous as are the manifestations of the divine wisdom, and power, and beneficence, in the material creation, they are nothing compared with the transcendent glory of his infinite love for man, as manifested in the incarnation and death of the Lord Jesus Christ; and that vast as are the benefits secured for the race by a deeper and wider knowledge of the laws of the material universe, they are utterly insignificant compared with the rest for the agitated and weary soul, the peace for the troubled conscience the hope and triumph in the hour of death, the blessedness of present communion with God, the recovery of his image, the certainty of eternal fellowship with him beyond the grave, which Christ has brought within our reach.

Physical science may tell me of the rich and bountiful gifts which God has bestowed upon his creatures, and may dazzle me with the pomp, and splendor, and power of the ministers of his wisdom and love; but Christ takes me by the hand and brings me face to face with God himself. In his presence there is fullness of joy. He is the Father of my spirit, and you leave my deepest and intensest longings unsatisfied until you give me rest in his love, and direct communion with his infinite and eternal bliss.

CHEERFULNESS.—Cheerfulness fills the soul with harmony; it composes music for churches and hearts; it makes and publishes glorifications of God; it produces thankfulness, and serves the end of charity; and when the oil of gladness runs over, it makes bright and tall emissions of light and holy fires, resolving up to a cloud, and making joy round about; and therefore, since it is so innocent, and may be so pious and full of holy advantage, whatever can minister to the holy joy does set forward the work of religion and charity.

Place of Session.

The General Conference of the M. E. Church South will hold its sessions in the Carondelet Street Church, and not in the Mechanics' Institute. The acoustic properties of the Legislative Hall are so very bad, and the want of convenient arrangement for the audience, have determined the change.

Delegates to the General Conference, Upon their arrival in the city, will please call at 112 Camp street, to ascertain the houses which have been assigned them.

BISHOP SOULE.—The last number of the Christian Advocate, printed at Nashville, gives the gratifyin information that the health of this venerable servant of God has somewhat improved of late, and intimates the probability of his being able to attend the approaching General Conference.

"WISE REFORM."

Since the year 1844, Methodism in the Southern States, under the guidance of the M. E. Church South, has been full as effective as at any period previous to that year. Proportionably as much has been accomplished for education, in church building, in missions, in Sabbath Schools, in reaching the people, and in the increase of membership. The fire and blood of the past four years were enough to have swept away conferences and societies, as it has legislatures, municipalities and courts of law. Churches have been seized, congregations turned out, and every engine of confusion and destruction has been brought to bear upon our Zion. Yet not a conference is wanting, not even the far Pacific, or the fire-girt Western Virginia. The artillery of the States scarcely ceased, before the "Advocates" resumed. Our Church has lost none of her loveliness. She comes out of the war fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and strong in the hearts of her people. There are different ways of illustrating the vitality of a Church, and in the Providence of God, this recent War of the States has been one of them. "Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there divination against Israel."

We might even venture farther in this same line of reflection, and show that elements of positive weakness have, by the same Providence, been purged away. That God has turned toward us the hearts of thousands of the goodliest and godliest of earth. It answers our purpose however to say thus much.

Suggestions have been made which would seem to indicate a very different state of things. The most thorough and organic changes are suggested to be made in the Government and Constitution and Polity of our Church. So many and so great, that if they were adopted, the Methodist Church South would cease to be itself, and become another Church. The mere preservation of her Doctrines only would not secure her existence, because they were held long before Mr. Wesley, and still are by other Churches. And though the life of every Church is its spirituality, it cannot be claimed that High Spirituality is Methodism, irrespective of its peculiar organization. How far this spirituality is dependent upon this organization, we do not pretend to say. In the providence of God they came forth at the same instant, and grew up together.

If Methodism takes on forms essentially different from its own, it will assume, maybe, that which is not needed. It is now constituted for prompt action; to deal with classes of the people not brought within the influences and ministrations of other Protestant forms.—The result of this Method of diffusing the Gospel, as compared with other Methods of the Holy Spirit, is far from unsatisfactory. During the past 100 years Methodism has increased at the rate of 19 for 1, while other Churches have increased but 4 for 1, and as 6 for 1.

It is very easy, by legislation, to make our Church unwieldy in its movements: To transfer power from those who are called specially by the Spirit for the work of the ministry, and consecrated exclusively to this work, to those whose lives are mainly employed in the common pursuits of life: To weaken the hands of one part, and not add strength to those of the other: To neutralize the one by the other: To place power where God has not placed responsibility. And though the corrupt churches of the olden times may have produced powerful results, yet a powerless Church can effect but little good.

It is easy to have a house of Bishops and a Diocesan Episcopacy; to break up connectional unity by the very arm that has heretofore been its main support; to have conferences with their own centres conflictive, and presently destructive of each other.

It is easiest of all to destroy Itinerancy, the one prominent, and to the common mind the distinctive feature of Methodism: To precipitate the whole into so many Congregational Churches, repudiating even the "hole of the pit from whence they were digged, and the rock from whence they were hewn."

We believe that constitutions, to be strong and healthy, must be of slow growth. They are the result of the experience of generations; and when once formed, should be touched with the utmost caution.—We speak now of the organic law of either a State or a Church. And we look back with wonder upon the readiness with which we, in common with other members of the General Conference of 1854, introduced a change of the greatest import into the very structure of our constitution; by which the Board of Bishops are invested virtually with a veto power upon such acts as, in their judgment, may seem unconstitutional. Of the wisdom of this arrangement we have nothing to say, but of the facility of this General Conference action, this much—that the right of making it was doubtful, and that the expediency should have been under the consideration of every Annual Conference, and of the whole Church, for several years before it was made.

There is sufficient room for legislation without touching the vitals of Methodism. And as a general rule it may be laid down, that if a certain policy cannot be secured without changing what is fundamental, it is better, nine times out of ten, to abandon it. It costs more than it comes to. It breeds disturbance often more serious than the amount of good which is even hoped to be secured. The bane of legislation is, the disposition which is forever discovering itself, to make a general law in order to cover a special case.

The Wesleyan Connexion has suffered several extensive off-shoots, rather than admit great organic changes in its government: The New Connexion, in 1797; the Primitive Methodists, about 1814; the Association Methodists, in 1835; and the Wesleyan Reformers in 1851.—And the wisdom of so doing has been vindicated by the subsequent history of that body. Of these other forms of government, but one, the Primitive, has been prosperous.

Indeed it is evident, that however great the body of the people may be affected in times of general discussion and excitement, opinions on polity do not influence serious and devout men in their choice of a Christian community. That religious body will most steadily and rapidly progress which retains the most ample evangelical agency, and manifests most fully the love of Christ to perishing sinners.

Thomas Arnold, of Rugby, is the best representative of the progressive evangelical school of whom we have knowledge. In a letter to James Marshall, Esq., he gives some valuable suggestions on Reform.—"Again, the principle of Conservatism has always appeared to me to be not only foolish, but to be actually felo de se; it destroys what it loves, because it will not mend it. But I cordially agree with Niebuhr, who, in all such questions, is to me the greatest of all authorities; because, together with an ability equal to the highest, he had an universal knowledge of political history far more profound than was ever possessed by any other man,—that every new institution should be but a fuller development of, or an addition to, what already exists; that if things have come to such a pass, that all its past history and associations are cast away as merely bad, reform in such a country is impossible."

Here we have a rule of the highest consideration, whether we regard the source from whence it emanates, or the profound wisdom of the rule itself—one that is worthy to control all practical efforts at reform. The great point is, therefore, not to exchange an ascertained good for a good yet to be ascertained; but to develop the ascertained good according to its own law, and in its own line of development. It is not to give up one good thing for another as good, but to add on to what we already have, so that even the good we have shall be still increased. Reform guided by Wisdom, is a sight for the Ages.

Nashville Christian Advocate.

The mail showered ten numbers of the Advocate upon us at once—the first we have seen. The paper, type, presswork and matter are of the best quality. If we could only have had the advantage of its full information to clip from, we might have entertained with more varied and substantial matter our own readers.

The subscription price from the 1st of March to the 1st of July is $1 50.

It seems, like the New Orleans Advocate, to edit itself, running six days on the strength of the seventh. This light, unsubstantial, unreal editor is a capital discovery, evolved from the brain of ecclesiastical necessity, requiring no food, no salary, no "foot of land," no "certain dwelling place," craving only two or three things—subscribers, contributions, scissors, a little good poetry, and "more copy." Such demands being reasonable, are easily met, and the result is, an "immense success."

We are indebted to the Nashville for the excellent memoir of that simple-hearted, holy man, Rev. Elisha Carr.

"The Presbyterian Index."

"Published every Thursday, by an Association of gentlemen, in the city of Mobile. Rev. JOHN H. RICE, D. D., Editor, for Mobile. Office in New Orleans, H. T. Bartlett, No. 28 Carondelet street. Subscription price, $5."

The first number of this large, beautiful sheet made its appearance this week among our exchanges.—It is destined to "take the place of the True Witness, not as a lineal successor, but simply as occupying the field from which it has retired. The voice of the South-western Church ought to be heard through an organ of her own. We propose that the Presbyterian Index shall be that organ. By the South-western Church we mean the Synods of Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, Arkansas, Memphis and Nashville."

In the great battle which has begun against Erastianism, this Christian weekly will, we doubt not, prove to be an arm of power. The bare sight of it strengthens the "arms of our hands." We almost envy the resources and zeal which have sprung this full-orbed, mailed champion into being. While we are struggling into life, it has shot up into a pyramid of editorial and typographical completeness.

Northern Church Papers.

A writer who has had the reading of a file of Northern papers, furnishes the following description of their peculiarities:

They are technically and tinlarly christian—D. D.'s act as editors: in one case, some half dozen figure in sensation-advertisement style at the head of its columns; they are all of the Methodit persuasion, and are all very self-complaissot and church-complaisant. "We are the people," etc. "Christian," I sad, but doubtless on the lucus a non principle.

Editorially, I find them ever and only pragmatically political; towards the South sanctimoniously vindictive in the enjoyment of their triumph; as much behind the "Tribune" in piety as they are in power.

They talk—these editors and their correspondents—of magnanimty and forgiveness, and in the next breath advise "military hands of hoop-iron," to hold us to the North. They advise, as equally needed and efficacious, missionaries and negro garrisons—and we agree with them. We neither need nor desire Ames's Gospel nor Stanton's soldiers. We have sworn the oath and intend to keep it; but, in the name of heaven, do not crowd upon us—give us time to 'swallow our spittle," as old Job said, when the three D. D.'s were badgering him. But these gentlemen of the "secular clergy"—these political Doctors of Divinity—and they have been scattered over the land as Moses scattered the "handful of ashes," and with about the same effect—with a peculiar insensibility to the claims and characteristics of true manhood; with an absolute incapacity, it would seem, from their teaching and demands, to understand or appreciate the feelings of a man; these Doctors of the "Gospel of Hate," knowing nothing of what the world very properly calls "honor," educated in theological seclusion, and from boyhood, by professional position occupying a conceded but undeserved social supremacy—not touching humanity except upon the "total depravity" side; or coming out of their theological seclusion with the trammels of tradition upon heart and understanding; carrying into the hustings the same inexorable laws which they have fulminated from the pulpit. These men, thus educated, demand extemporaneously from the South, a total change of opinion, sentiment, feeling—everything; demand that the last two hundred years of practice, prejudice and principle be swapped off for Yankee notions of yesterday, as a boy would a bauble, one for another; and all because—that is the way it is put—the armies of the South were whipped from the field by the armies of the North; the territory of the South overrun by Northern hosts; the homes of the South burned by Northern hands; therefore and finally and conclusively, after such reasoning the South should change its convictions of social and national polity, of Biblical teaching, of political economy, of the laws of ethnology; abandon every prejudice, although more unalleable than principle; abandon every principle, though established by unrefuted logic; abandon every belief, though based upon the accumulated facts of four thousand years—all because the armies of the Union were stronger than the armies of the Confederacy! Again I plead, O Doctors of Divinity! give us time to get our breath, and what is equally important, to get our bread.

By parity of reasoning, as the dialectician would say, the Athenians should have abandoned their religious tenets, when, likewise, their armies were driven from the field, their cities sacked, their people slaughtered, their women ravished and burned, their country so ravaged that "a crow flying over it must carry his rations." Was it Simon de Montford, who said this?

Likewise, also, the Huguenots pass before me. The massacre of St. Bartholomew's should have made good Catholics of the fortunate few Protestants who survived that summary process for arresting and punishing obstinate adherence to old religious, political and social opinions. But it did not; they would not accept the Pope nor transubstantiation. Likewise, also, the battle of Naseby, "the crowning victory," should have made good Hardshell Baptists of all the Arminian Episcopalians in England at that time, and vice versa, Monks' triumphant march from the Tweed to the Thames (Sotto voce, he did not burn a single house nor insult a woman) should have retroverted the converts and converted the Hardshells into Presbyterians and then into Prelatists.

Mr. Editor, triumphant fanaticism wearing a white cravat, is the most heartless and unrelenting demon that sin has turned loose upon mankind. But does not this demand for an instantaneous change of all our habits and feeling show a marvellous stupidity and ignorance of actual human nature? Versed in history these men may be, but for all blessed and blessing purposes they had as well be versed in comparative anatomy. It is to them the dead past truly, and has no warning, no entreaty, no instruction.

We have sworn the oath and we mean to keep it; but we have some pride of opinion, some confidence in the integrity of our position, some sympathy with our past, besides some thousands of houseless chimnies, stark and drear, daggering our eyes—all to be forgiven or forgotten, before we can rush into the embrace of our brethren, and delightedly adopt their opinions. They will pardon a little tardiness when they see it in this light. J. W. B.

Religious Letter-Writing.

The following, copied from an exchange, recommends itself to every thoughtful mind:

Have you, Christian, ever considered how much you might glorify God and promote the salvation of your friends by letters written in love for their souls, direct, affectionate, personal?

The biographies of the good and useful disclose that they did much by letters. A few of these come to the light; most never in this world. Their fruit will appear in eternity.

The letters of Rutherford and Fletcher, warm the heart of the stranger to this day. What effect, do you think, such letters had on those to whom, in a nice and personal adaptation, they were addressed?

Politicians have known the power that lies here, and some of them have used it.—Jefferson was an indifferent speaker; his voice was unmusical, his manner awkward. But his private correspondence told upon the opinions and actions of his cotemporaries. He approached men kindly, confidentially, plainly and pressingly in this way, and they came into his views and co-operation. Thus he indoctrinated men politically.

Franklin was a model letter-writer, and relied much upon it. He tells how. In the Assembly there was a man, who, for some cause, had taken up a prejudice against him—would have nothing to do with him. With a knowledge of human nature he took this plan; borrowed a book of his offish neighbor, and returned it to him with a note of thanks. In that note he reached him, and he was ever after his devoted friend.

A printed letter is a failure. It has not the power sought by the use of the letter form—because it lacks the elements of it. The wisest party candidates and committees have understood this so well, that they have dispensed with circulars, and have letters copied by hundreds, in human handwriting, with all the bends and the shakes, the dots and lines of the live personal fingers; and these letters are signed by candidates, or members of committees, each man in his own familiar handwriting. Then they tell on every "sovereign" that gets one.

We do not mean letters on nothing in particular—mere scribbling. The keeping up a long list of correspondence, for the sake of it, is a poor vanity.—Nor are letters of formal condolence, etc., meant.

You have a friend or a relative. His spiritual condition lies heavily on your heart. You have often spoken with him; but his reply evaded, while it did not meet the force of what you said. And because of modesty or embarrassment, you never said exactly what you wished to say. You have prayed, too; but you must use other means. Try a letter. You may not have a gift that way. Your style may not be Addisonian. But submit to the labor.—Write an earnest letter—all between yourselves and to the point. He will read it alone and ponder it. It carries an unmistakable evidence of your friendly concern. Every line that is drawn by your pen speaks a special and felt interest in his spiritual welfare. Unburden your heart—tell your mind. Seal it and send it off, with prayers; and wait in hope to hear the result.

We have been impressed lately by facts, with the importance of the suggestions herein contained. The author of the Greyson Letters gives a fine expression and strong confirmation in the same line of thought.

He was in the habit of saying, that "Affection, if it but spoke the truth, was truth's best pleader;" and that "if any man would submit to so odious a task as writing a long letter, provided love dictated it, for the special behoof of some one person, it was hardly in human nature that one should not read it with grateful attention." And that thus, a little tract, in the shape of a letter, might do more good than a treatise which was intended for everybody in general and nobody in particular.

PULPIT QUACKERY.—The following, from the National Magazine, will bear republishing as long as ministers make singular announcements for the purpose of filling empty seats:

Suppose a clergyman were to advertise that he should preach next Sunday morning on the necessity of regeneration, in the afternoon on grieving the Holy Spirit, and in the evening on Faith in Christ.—The community would laugh at his simplicity and stay at home.

But if it should be noticed that the Rev. Mr. B. or Rev. Dr. C. would preach on "War in Heaven," and the part young men and young women were to take in it; or on "Paul, the christian gentleman," or a parallel between Washington and Moses; or a parallel between the dancing of David before the ark and the dancing of Herodias's daughter before Herod, there would be a rush to hear this new gospel.

City papers are full of these quack gospel advertisements. Now what must be the state of a minister's heart who craves such notoriety? And what must be the inevitable result to himself and to his hearers?

BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor—With eyes moistening with glad tears, and a heart swelling with emotions of joy and gratitude, I have laid aside the Advocate of March 10th, to take up the pen. The full heart seeks some avenue of expression—asks for kindred sympathy—wants a sharer in its blessedness. I have just read, in that number of the Advocate, the proceedings of the Baltimore Conference, the Resolutions of that body, and their Pastoral Address. It is this that has thus moved me.

I remember with what feelings of proud triumph, of hearty sympathy with the movement, of love and reverence for the men who were capable of such a sacrifice, and of honor for the noble principle which their conduct illustrated—I remember, I say, with what feelings I read the account of the proceedings of that body of ministers, who left wealth, position, homes, worldly endowments and honors, and, arm in arm, walked out of the grand old church, where they and their fathers had worshipped, and for conscience sake, took their way down the long street, to a plain, unconsecrated building, which was to witness the inauguration of the Free Church of Scotland. Welch and Chalmers led that procession; and the heart of the people, true in its instincts, and comprehending the solemn import of that silent exit, reverently and silently uncovered and made way for them, as those venerable and honest witnesses for the truth moved on toward their place of destination. The moral grandeur of this scene has always touched me inexpressibly. Its illustration of the spirit of true Christianity is invaluable; it is worth more than monuments of marble or of brass—for it lives in the hearts of believers; it is written on imperishable materials.

And now, we have another and a similar illustration, to tell us, if we were doubtful and faint-hearted, that Truth is not dead—that Christ yet lives and reigns in the hearts of His people, and that they will show forth their union with Him by fruits of faith and the spirit of sacrifice.

Such an example, at this hour, rebukes the worldly wise, and encourages the timid. We rejoice that these, our brethren, have counted us worthy; and that they, counting the cost, have decided to unite with us. Thousands of gold and silver, and tens of thousands of cold and worldly and unChrist-like names, to swell our numbers, would not have so gladdened our hearts and strengthened our hands.

Welcome, dear and honored brethren! Welcome to our hearts, to our homes, to all that we possess. In our deep poverty, under sorrow and bereavement, we have neither wealth nor honors to bestow—nothing but love.

But we will learn of you, and you shall bring to us more of the spirit of your and our divine Master; more faith, more zeal, more of self-sacrifice. So shall we quicken each other "to love and good works."

Class Meetings.

Mr. Editor—We fear that some views set forth by your able correspondent of Marshall, Texas, in the Advocate of February 24th, on the subject of Class Meetings, may be of harmful tendency. He was advocating the abrogation of that rule of the Methodist Discipline which makes attendance upon class meetings a condition of membership in our church. We do not intend to controvert his arguments on this point.

We see no good reason why a member should be excluded from the church any sooner for failing to attend class meetings than for neglecting family or private prayer. A portion of his remarks are, however, susceptible of such construction, as gives countenance to certain courses of conduct and modes of reasoning, which we can by no means approve. He says he did not say a word against class meetings. Be it so. Did he not say some things, if not approving, at least excusing those who not only fail to attend class meetings, but declare that they do not like them?—Class meetings do not suit them, and they do not desire to attend them. If we do not misunderstand your correspondent, he virtually admits that such feelings and reasonings as these are allowable in a Christian.

We, on the contrary, think that no real Christian can dislike a well-conducted class meeting. We do not say that none are Christians who fail to attend class meetings; but we believe that no zealous Christian can disapprove of a class meeting when properly conducted in all respects.—A Christian might not desire to attend preaching at daybreak on Monday morning; but no Christian could say that he does not like divine service, under proper circumstances.

"But," says your correspondent, "it is in the very character of some persons, * * * not to relish class meetings."—If character means peculiar dispositions of mind, and their consequent peculiar habits of life, it may be just this very character which it was the design of Christianity to renovate and change.

But some do not like to open the "sacred privacy" of their hearts in class meetings, further than they think proper to do so. This looks very much like the old charge of a resemblance to the Roman Confession, but will not stand against any genuine class meeting.

The truth—the sad truth we fear is, that about five out of seven of the members of the Methodist Church have become so cold, so indifferent, not to say so dead, in reference to their spiritual interests, that they have no relish for the subject of religion as a topic of conversation anywhere, or at any time. Such are but too eager to find any excuse for not attending class meeting. It is with the view of preventing any such from resting in carnal security beneath the shadow of the great name of your correspondent that these lines have been penned.

We believe class meetings are good to the use of edifying; and very much fear that those who do not like them are somewhat backslidden in heart. Let us examine ourselves.

After all the ridicule and contempt which some have endeavored to cast upon class meetings, we have yet to see it proved that it is any more unreasonable for Christians to assemble for the purpose of conferring about the reality of heaven, the difficulties of the journey thither, and the best means of getting there, than for a ship's crew, in a storm, to meet together to talk about land, and the best mode of reaching it in safety. Sacramental Meetings.

Mr. Editor—I would like to call attention to one particular, in which we have long been lamentably deficient. I refer to the general neglect of sacramental meetings in the country. My observation and experience is confined entirely to country appointments, and here the neglect seems to be universal.

Neither preachers nor people ever seem to think of having sacrament except at Quarterly Meetings, and even then it is sometimes quietly dispensed with, because "the elements are not prepared," and nothing is said about it until the next Quarterly Meeting.

Of course the next meeting at another place, perhaps ten, twenty or thirty miles distant, and those who cannot go so far must wait until their turn comes round again the next year. So it goes on from year to year, and the consequence is many of Christ's little ones, who would gladly obey their Saviour's dying command, "Do this in remembrance of me," are thus deprived of this precious means of grace for months, and even for years together. Is there not fault somewhere? Shall the state of things be permitted to continue? Country churches of other denominations have their stated season for communion, why may not ours?

How can a preacher go to Conference at the close of the year, feeling that he has done his whole duty to the people of his charge, when he has never gathered them around the table of the Lord, to commemorate the sufferings and death of the Saviour he has been preaching to them? I would be glad to see some notice taken of this matter. COUNTRY METHODIST.

Change in Discipline.

Mr. Editor—There are some changes recommended to be made in our Discipline which appear to be susceptible of support from sound reason and from warrant of Scripture. As to the matter of change itself, the Church seems to be invested with a large liberty by her great Head. He has given a few fundamental principles, together with two sacraments and a general commission to preach the Gospel, and these form the Scriptural constitution of the militant church. Other matters are left to the determination of the Church in her corporate capacity, guided by this constitution, the Holy Spirit and the conduct of the Apostles. No doubt secondary things were left, in great measure, to the Church, because changes in these would be required by differences in the physical and social conditions under which she would have to operate at different times and places. The Gospel is too flexible in its application to the conditions of man, and in its spiritual power too far overreaches mere forms and agency, to require only one cast of ecclesiasticism to make it effective.

Something ought to be done for the more careful education of the children of the Church, by their positive recognition as catechumenical members, in training for a higher grade of membership when they shall become adult. It would seem hardly improper to express our doctrine on the subject in an Article of Religion, regulating the detail of duty in the case by rules of discipline.

With these catechumens, and with adults whose fitness for membership may be seriously doubted, it would be difficult to dispense with the probationary relationship altogether. But it could be so modified as to be rid of the objections now justly raised against it. For this it is necessary simply to regulate the time of confirmation to the fact of fitness, leaving the pastor, with his advisers, to judge when this is. If an adult gives evidence of genuine convictions and honest purposes, and consecrates heartily to the fundamental doctrines, and to be governed by our laws, let him be received at once. But special cases will require more time. Remove restrictions, allow discretion.

So on the rule on class meeting—a precious good meeting, full of benefit to all who attend them, and never to be abolished from Methodism. But where is the Scripture warrant for making attendance on this appointment of the Church a test of membership? Leave the attendance to the choice of the individual, and urge the spiritual benefits as inducements. Allow all the liberty to individuals that will consist with integrity to Christ. Let us be as charitable towards our own members as we are towards those of other churches. We invite the fellowship of men and women of other denominations whom we know to be opposed to class meetings, and reject our own members for no other offence. Why cannot a Methodist love the Lord Jesus Christ, serve him, and get to heaven on the same terms with other Christians? Who is authorized to put a difference between the two?

PETITOR.

HALT.

The following sensible article is taken from the New York Times of the 19th inst.:

During the year 1865, the goods imported at the port of New York were officially valued at $224,742,419. That the actual market value of these goods was over three hundred millions of dollars, we think no one acquainted with customhouse valuations will deny. Most certainly, considering that these goods were in good part imported on foreign account and sold at a large profit, there can be no doubt that they cost our people considerably more than that amount.

During the first two months of the present year, the imports at this emporium would seem, from the incomplete data before us, to be five-fold those of the corresponding months of last year. This may be more than the final returns will show; but the increase is very great. We know that the textile fabrics imported this year are valued at $32,561,370, against $6,091,625 last year—an increase of more than five-fold. In fancy goods, copper and steel, it is somewhat less; in fish, hides, wines, spices, etc., it is more than five-fold.

The fabrics of wool, silk, cotton, flax, etc., imported in the first two months of 1866 are fully equal to those imported during the corresponding two months of 1863, 1864 and 1865, added together.

These are startling facts. Their cause is two-fold:

1. An inflated currency, which increases the inevitable money cost of everything produced in this country.

2. Inadequate import duties, considering not our domestic manufactures are taxed not only in their products, but on every element of their production—the aggregate taxation amounting to more than the duty on the imported rivals.

In this statement, we take no account of smuggling, which is unquestionably prosecuted to a far greater extent than in former years. Whatever this excess amounts to is to be added to the enormous increase of our imports indicated above.

Unless we are willing to drift heedlessly and swiftly into National bankruptcy, this must be stopped. The means are direct and simple, viz:

1. Resume specie payments forthwith.

2. Take the excise taxes off our home manufactures so far as possible.

3. Judiciously but efficiently increase the duties on imports.

A NEW SILK-WORM.

It is with more than ordinary interest that we are engaged in the culture of the silkworm have learned that a silk worm of the species has lately been introduced into France, from Japan. This insect, which seems at present perfectly healthy, has, it is said, been found by experiment perfectly adapted to the climate of Normandy. If this report is correct, it may also be introduced with success into the Northern portions of America.

The history of the introduction of this insect into Europe is interesting. The oak-worm, or yama-a-mai, of Japan, is said to be a monopoly of the royal family, and to export the eggs is punishable with death. To this fact is attributed the ignorance which for so long has obtained in relation to this insect. In 1861, Mr. Duchesne Villecourt, the French Consul-General in Japan, forwarded some of these eggs to the Société d' Acclimation, but as nothing was known of the habits of the insect, only one cocoon lived long enough to make its cocoon. This one specimen, however, was enough to establish its value in the minds of the Society, and cause a thorough investigation. Accordingly, in 1862, a scientific commission was directed to search for, and send a supply to France, which the commission has lately accomplished through the aid of Dutch marine officer, M. Pompse von Meerdtfi, Director of the Imperial Medical school at Nagasaki. A Monsieur Personnat of Laval received from the commission a few of the eggs, and after three generations he had in May, 1865, 20,000 worms hatching at Laval. In his report to the Société d'Acclimation upon the subject, he says:

"The eggs are easily preserved through winter if kept dry, and in the spring, when the oaks come into leaf, to hatch the eggs it only requires that they should be brought into a room with a southern aspect. The worms feed upon any kind of oak, grow sleepy, cast their skins four times, and in forty or sixty-five days begin their cocoons. The first change or even from the egg may be exposed to the open air, as they are protected by the weather. The weight of the cocoons is much greater than that of the mulberry worm. An empty one weighs 70 centigrammes (11 grains), one of the mulberry worms only 33 centigrammes (5½ grains). It takes 450 to 500 full or fresh mulberry leaves to weigh a kilogramme, while two pounds of the oak worm will make the same weight. One square metre, nearly nine inches square, of oak underwood, will feed fifteen or twenty cocoons; but if planted only ten, then a single hectare (two and a half acres) will produce one of two thousands cocoons, or five hundred pounds.

"There are many thousand acres of oak in the United States, both at the North and at the South, and according to the report of the Secretary, nothing can be easier than to make them of great utility in the production of silk. In various States vast extents of scrub oak barrens exist, at present of no value, which could be very well brought into cultivation, and which at least afford fields for experiment. So says the Mississippi Christian Advocate, 21st inst.

LETTER SOJOURN ON AN ALPINE PEAK.

A letter from Berne, Switzerland, says:

It will be remembered that at the beginning of the present winter, M. Dolfus Ebneri and three men to pass the season upon the summit of St. Theodule, in the Canton of Valais, at an elevation of 10,241 feet above the level of the sea, to make meteorological observations and to note the weather in that inclement region. The keeper, Seiler, of Brieg, the owner of two hotels at Zermatt, recently ascended the mountain, in company with the guide, Perren, and his builder, to visit the adventurous party.

They left Zermatt at 3 A. M., accompanied by Mr. Langwalder, Jr. The ordinary path being impassable in winter, for four or five hours, we shaped our course up to the Hermenjda, till below the Black Lake, and thence over the Furka glacier to the rocky ground. Here we took our first meal, and demolished a hearty breakfast. We were much refreshed; thence took the usual route and reached the summit of St. Theodule in eight minutes past nine. The joy of the three men was great when they saw us. We were feasted with some good mutton, bread and excellent Italian wine. In the book of the register they had kept of the weather, showed the following results:

On the 12th of December, 1865, the thermometer stood at seventeen degrees of cold; on the 13th at nineteen; on the 14th at one. During the remainder of the month the temperature varied from twelve to seven-degrees of cold. Upon the 5th of January, 1866, warmth in the sun rose, at noon, to twelve degrees; on the 13th the thermometer at twenty-one degrees. At noon on the 16th warmth rose as high as sixteen degrees, while two hours later the thermometer was again at two degrees. During the rest of the month the temperature varied from twelve degrees to sixteen degrees below zero.

The weather was so magnificent that I believe we could have ascended the mountain without any danger. The prospect was glorious—the splendid deep blue sky above, and the grand, majestic mountains in their glittering white dress. The Matterhorn alone was draped in mist—a fog, one might fancy, for its victims of last year."

SPANISH INSURRECTIONS.

The recent revolt in Spain gives interest to the following account of former insurrections in that country, which we find in the Paris Siecle:

It is a sort of Castilian appanage to wish to be free and independent, and to proclaim one's opinion sword in hand. We will not go back to the days of Cid and the pronunciamento of former times, but will confine our remarks to those of modern times. The staff of the Spanish army consists of ten Marshals (Captains-General) of whom five are lonorary, the King, the Infantes and the Duke de Montpensier. The five others, Espartero, Duke de la Vittoria; Narvaez, Duke de Valencia; Guittierez de la Concha, Marquis del Duero; O'Donnell, Duke de Tetuan; and Serano y Dominguez, Duke de la Terre, have all taken part in celebrated insurrections.

If they have fought the enemies of their country, they have also chiefly awed their elevation to the energy with which they have combatted their rivals. Among the generals commanding the different arms, the most illustrious, Gen. Ros de Olano, Marquis de Band y Gelu; Gen. Zavala; Marquis de Sierra Bullones, who is now pursuing Gen. Prim; Gen. Dulce, Marquis de Castelliorite; Gen. de Messina, Gen. Genaro-Quesada, and many others, have also shared in pronunciamentos. All those risings have not triumphed; but it must not be supposed that a man is ruined forever through having failed once. Some few generals have been shot; but most of the vanquished have only been exiled. On the other hand, if a man does not always succeed in the first attempt, it is seldom that he is not more fortunate in a second.

Thus Narvaez, after his first, in 1829, was exiled, and took refuge in Paris; but, in 1842, while still in the capital, he organized a vast conspiracy with the money of the exiled Queen Regent. He landed at Valencia, passed between all the generals who were watching for him, July, 1843, entered Madrid in triumph and recalled Maria Christina. In commemoration of this successful attempt he was made Duke of Valencia, where he first touched land.

Marshal O'Donnell, now President of the Council, had long conspired against Espartero, before directing the famous rising of 1854. After his success on that occasion, he mercilessly crushed, 1856, those of Madrid, Barcelona and Saragossa, directed against himself, and only secured his power after the days of the 14th, 16th, 18th and 22d of July, for a very short period. Narvaez again became Prime Minister. Marshal O'Donnell resumed what might be called the Grand Viziership in 1857, and he then gave Gen. Prim an opportunity of distinguishing himself by his side in Mexico. Notwithstanding his laurels of Tetuan, he was compelled to see Marshal Narvaez take precedence of him in 1864, and did not re-enter the ministry till July, 1865.

The power of the chiefs of Spanish insurrections is not always of long duration. Thus Espartero, by whom we ought to have commenced, after his first rising in 1852, in favor of the innocent Isabella, passed eight years in combating Carlism before he found an opportunity to take the first place. This occasion arose on his second revolt in 1841, when he became regent in the place of Maria Christina. But his companions and rivals, Serrano, Lopez and Cabelero, pronounced against him; Narvaez landed at Valencia, as already stated; Espartero was obliged to fly to England for a refuge. Returning from exile, he again became the head of the Progressist party, and after the rising of 1854 was made President of the Council. But O'Donnell, his rival, compelled him to resign in 1856, and the risings then made in his name were put down, so that the Duke de la Vittoria might now be called the Duke of Defeat, if real and great services rendered to Spain did not protect his name from outrage. It is not impossible that he may yet be in power again, notwithstanding his advancedage. The above facts will show that many illusions are entertained respecting pronunciamentos. They are the life of Spain, and will continue to be so until a strong civil Constitution shall place the conduct of its own affairs in the hands of the Spanish nation.

VOICES—What they Indicate.—There are light, quick, surface voices that involuntary seem to utter the slang, "I won't do to tie to." The man's words may assure you of his strength of purpose and reliability, yet his tone contradicts his speech.

Then there are low, deep, strong voices, where the words seem ground out, as if the man owed humanity a grudge and meant to pay it some day. That man's opponents may well tremble, and his friends may trust his strength of purpose and ability to act.

There is the coarse, boisterous, dictatorial tone invariably adopted by vulgar persons, who have not sufficient cultivation to understand their own insignificance.

There is the incredulous tone that is full of a covert sneer, or a secret "You-can't-dupe-me-sir." Intonation.

Then there is the whining, beseeching voice that says "sycophant" as plainly as if it uttered the word. It cajoles and flatters you; its words say, "I love you—I admire you; you are everything you should be."

Then there is the tender, musical, compassionate voice, that sometimes goes with sharp features (as they merely indicate intensity of feeling) and sometimes with blunt features, but always with genuine benevolence.

If you are full of affectation and pretense, your voice proclaims it.

If you are full of honesty, strength and purpose, your voice proclaims it.

If you are cold, calm and firm and consistent, or fickle and foolish and deceptious, your voice will be equally truth-telling.

You cannot wear a mask without its being known you wear one.

You cannot change your voice from a natural to an unnatural tone without its being known that you are doing so.

ANECDOTE OF WEBSTER.—There is a true story connected with Webster's intimacy with Branch Pierce, the Plymouth hunter, which has never been printed. It was Mr. Webster's custom, in the hunting season, to travel across from Marshfield to the Plymouth woods, and meet the other huntsmen at the cabin of "Uncle Branch." On one of these excursions he was overtaken by a storm which lasted all day. No other huntsman appeared at the cabin, and solitary sport was out of the question. But Mr. Webster, who often made small occasions great by his wonderful genius, was not at a loss for entertainment. Adapting himself to the peculiar religious inclinations of his hosts, while they pursued their usual homely occupations, he read and reported from memory a multitude of psalms and hymns, with which much reading had made him familiar. Hour after hour the great statesman paced the floor of that cabin kitchen, repeating with his magnificent voice the inspired Psalms of David, and Watts' undying hymns, with only Branch Pierce and his wife for listeners. No church or cathedral ever resounded to grander or sweeter music than that which Daniel Webster that day filled the cabin of the hunter of the Plymouth woods; and no audience ever listened to his own triumphant eloquence with such delight as its humble tenants listened to the familiar psalms, which for them received new inspiration as they rolled from his marvellous lips.—Worcester.

TO FATTEN FOWLS.—It is conceded that the fowls of France are the fattest and whitest in the world. The method of preparing them for the market is this:

Fifteen days before they are to be killed they feed them with dough made of wheat flour of the previous year, with ten grammes of salt to every quart of water, and three or four small gravel stones to a mouthful of dough. Twelve hours before they are to be killed they should eat scarcely anything, in order to leave the intestines empty, and thus avoid the acid fermentation, which would produce decomposition, and make it impossible to transport them any distance. Not a feather should be plucked till the fowl has been thoroughly bled, which is without cutting off the head. So long as the blood is in circulation, each little vesicle of the root of the feather is filled, and causes spots if this is plucked till it is entirely drained. If they are killed immediately after eating, they will keep only eight days; but if they have fasted twelve hours, they will keep fifteen days.

PATRONAGE OF THE PRESS.—Daniel Webster was right when he remarked of the press: "Small is the sum required to patronize a newspaper; amply rewarded its patron, I care not how humble and unpretending the gazette he takes. It is next to impossible to fill a printed sheet without putting into it something that is worth the subscription price."

PREPARATIONS FOR THE CHOLERA.

HOW TO AVOID THE EPIDEMIC.

The rapid march of the cholera through the West Indies, and the preparations being made throughout the country to check its ravages should the dread demon of death visit the United States, is exciting a deep interest. In our own fair city, we are poorly prepared to receive such a visitor, and in view of this fact, we subjoin the following timely instructions, and earnestly hope that our citizens may profit by the lessons they teach. If it comes its first victims will be principally:

1. Those who use intoxicating drinks.
2. Those who are not cleanly in their persons and houses.
3. Those who are irregular in their habits, keeping unseasonable hours, eating irregularly, etc.
4. Those living in filthy, dirty localities.

TO PREPARE FOR CHOLERA.

1. Be scrupulously clean in person, bathing the whole body daily, and keeping the entire clothing clean.

2. Clean thoroughly and whitewash your rooms, outhouses and premises generally.

3. See that no swill, garbage or other refuse matter is thrown out on your lot, street or alley. Clean up thoroughly your whole premises, indoors and out, and set an example of cleanliness to your neighbors.

4. If your landlord refuses or neglects to do his duty in putting his houses and lots in proper order, report him to the health officer in your district.

5. Abstain from all intoxicating drinks, ale and beer, as well as whisky.

6. Use simple, wholesome food, thoroughly cooked, avoiding stale vegetables or tainted meats. Do not give way to fear or panic. This will increase your danger. Cholera will, in most cases, yield to skillful treatment, if taken in its first stages. Watch for the first symptom, which is usually a diarrhea. Do not neglect it for a single hour, however mild it may be. Delays are dangerous. Avoid all nostrums and advertised "cholera medicines;" most of them will do more harm than good. Apply at once to some reliable physician. None of our physicians will refuse their services at such a time to the poorest.

Lastly, but first in importance, prepare for it by giving your heart to the Lord Jesus Christ. Then you will be fitted for either life or death. You may not fall by cholera this summer. But death is certain to all, and may come to you soon. If you are a Christian, you are safe; if not, you are unsafe and cannot be at peace. "Be ye always ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh."

At a meeting of the New York Health Commissioners, Dr. Sayers, of Brooklyn, gave the following general rules for the treatment of cholera patients: "Great fear and anxiety had a great deal to do in the prostration and spread of disease, and influenced the physical condition to such a degree as to make persons more subject to it than they would otherwise be. He thought if the people understood the single fact that it is always preceded by certain premonitory symptoms, such as lassitude, languor, debility, and a diarrhea, and that in this stage of the disease it is nearly always curable if the proper precautionary measures are taken, it would tend to allay the popular terror. At this stage of the disease, it is of the first importance to pay attention to the first symptom, which is diarrhea. At the very first approach, the patient should assume a horizontal posture and retain it, with the hips higher than the shoulders, and under no circumstances assume the perpendicular, even for a moment.

Absolute, positive rest is needed, the body being kept in a warm condition. Any artificial means can be used for that which may be necessary. The main thing is the horizontal position and perfect rest at the very commencement of the disease. If the patient is down stairs when taken, let him stay there or be carried up. If he is out visiting, let him stay at his friend's house. Keeping this position for forty-eight hours, in the majority of instances, the disease will pass over, and the patient, on recovery, need make no very great changes in his mode of life. Of course, if he has bad habits he should reform them; eat and drink rationally, and attend to business as usual, but not overdo it. In the present state of the atmosphere, when pestilence is abroad, the system is rendered more liable to exhaustion, and he should husband his strength by avoiding violent exercise. With these few precautionary measures and a proper sanitary condition of the city, and a rigid enforcement of quarantine, we may hope to escape any pestilential epidemic.

LIABILITY OF TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

An important decision touching the liability of telegraph companies for the correct transmission of messages, was decided a few days ago in New York by Judge Brady, in the Court of Common Pleas. The case is as follows: The plaintiff, Edward De Rutte, of San Francisco, has a brother named Theophilus De Rutte doing business in Bordeaux. The latter procured from Callarden & Bourdette, of Bordeaux, an order for the former to purchase a cargo of California wheat. He prepared a telegram as follows: "Edward De Rutte, San Francisco, buy for Callarden & Bourdette, bankers, a shipload of five to six hundred tons white wheat, first quality, extreme limit twenty-two francs, the hectorolite landed at Bordeaux, same conditions as the Monod contract. Th. De Rutte," and enclosed it in a letter to Wales Lorrimer, of New York, with instructions to send it to the San Francisco De Rutte in the quickest manner. Lorrimer's clerk copied the dispatch and took it to the office of the New York, Albany and Buffalo Electro-magnetic Telegraph Company (the defendants,) where he paid charges ($21 50) for transmission to San Francisco. The defendants' line extends from New York to Buffalo, where it connects with other lines and a pony express to San Francisco. The message was transmitted correctly by the defendants' line, and by the connecting lines to St. Louis, but when delivered to the plaintiff at San Francisco there were several errors. Th. De Rutte was changed to Thos. De Rutte, Monod contract to monied contract, hectorolite to pretorlitiere, and twouty-two to twenty-five francs.

The plaintiff was not misled as to three of the alterations. He understood the abbreviation Thos. to mean Theophilus, the words monied contract to mean Monod contract, and pretoilitiere to mean hectorolite. The words twenty-five francs, however, he assumed to be correct, but before acting upon the message, he tried, as he said, to get a copy of the dispatch from the telegraph company at San Francisco, but they stated that they could not furnish it. The plaintiff accordingly purchased the required quantity, and chartered a vessel for its shipment to Bordeaux, when he received from New York, twenty days after the dispatch, the letter which his brother had written advising him that the extreme limit was twenty-two instead of twenty-five francs. As a further assurance, on receiving this letter, he had the dispatch repeated, after which he sold the wheat at the cost price, less commission, storage and interest, and after several days' effort he succeeded in getting rid of the charter party by the payment of $1600 in gold, and he paid the wharfage of the vessel and the brokerage fees upon the re-charter, making in all, with the commissions, storage and interest, the sum of $2004 61c., for which the plaintiff recovered judgment.

BLOODY WARS.

It has been customary since the close of the war to style it the bloodiest one in the history of the world; but the following paragraphs, clipped from our exchanges, may astound those who are not familiar with history:

At the taking of Jerusalem, by Titus, 1,000,000 Jews died by slaughter and famine.

Marius, in one slaughter of the Teuteas, near Aix, left 20,000 dead.

Cæsius at one time slaughtered 37,000 inhabitants of Selencio.

Probus put to death 700,000 Gauls upon reducing their country.

Belisarius once had to kill 300,000 people to stop a revolt in the city of Constantinople.

The Jews of Antioch got mad at one time and killed over 100,000 of the other inhabitants.

At the three days' battle of Chalons, over 100,000 Huns were killed, with proportionate numbers of the Gauls and their allies.

Gibbon estimates that in the various crusades five millions of Europeans lost their lives.

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

From Havana news is received that the recent decree of March 2, directing that all the emancipated or native Africans on the plantations, should be brought to the Government depot at Havana, to be sent to the Island of Fernando Po, has been revoked. Gen. Dulce has sent in his resignation, and it is reported that he will leave the island. A movement is on foot to revive the slave trade, and a counter-movement toward the abolition of slavery in Cuba and Porto Rico.

Advices from the Rio Grande to the 10th, report an unbroken quiet prevailing. The French remained in full possession of Bagdad, and all the country surrounding, while the opposing forces had left for parts unknown.

By the way of Havana intelligence is received from Mexico that the Belgian Minister had been murdered while riding in a diligence. No further particulars are given.

Three of Prof. Agassiz's assistants returned from Brazil in the last United States and Brazil Company's mail steamer Havana. The courtesies of the Company have been most handsomely extended to Prof. Agassiz and his assistants, not only as above, but in transporting from the Amazon the rich collection of fishes to the United States. The Boston Journal is informed that Prof. Agassiz and the others of the party will not return until late in the season.

There was almost a riot in Worcester, Mass., on Saturday last, a crowd of a hundred men attempting to rescue a drunken prisoner from the police, and making it necessary for the officers to fire upon them. Several of the rioters were wounded, and some of the officers received some hard knocks.

Harriet Pinckney, aged 90 years, a daughter of Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, of revolutionary fame, died in Charleston, S. C., on the 15th inst.

Near Reese river, in California, there is an isolated mountain about five hundred feet high, whose entire surface on all sides, from summit to base, is covered with agates. Upon digging into the soil, they are found like potatoes in a hill. They are oval in shape, and from one to four inches in diameter.

A field of wheat buried under an avalanche in Switzerland for twenty-five years, proceeded on its growth as soon as the snow had melted.

A curious case has just been decided in London. Col. Campbell sued Lord Wenlock for 500 guineas, the rent of a furnished house in that city, from the 22d of April to the 1st of August, 1865. His Lordship admitted taking the house at the above rent, but said that the servants' rooms were found to be infected with bed-bugs. He therefore left the house immediately. The Chief Justice summed up and told the Jury that the question for them to decide was, whether the apartments were in such a condition "as to render the rest and comfort of the inmates impossible." The Jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of the rent, 500 guineas. So it is law in London that any quantity of bed-bugs in chambers do not make a house untenantable for a noble family.

The Terre Houte Journal says that B. M. Harrison, Esq., of that place, is about to become the proprietor of one-half of the sum of $6,250,000, left him by a deceased relative in England. It is said that the "fine old English gentleman" bequeathed his fortune to the oldest member of the Harrison family, in Monmouth county, New Jersey. B. M. Harrison and a first cousin of his, both natives of the same county, were competitors, but both being born on the same day, and the exact hour not being known, they have, like wise and sensible men, agreed to share equally in the magnificent bequest, amounting to a million and a quarter sterling.

The opposition to the Reform Bill in the British Parliament was taking definite shape under the leadership of Lord Derby. The bill to abolish Church rates had passed to a second reading in the House of Commons, but would encounter the usual opposition in the House of Lords. It is rumored that a German crisis was imminent. The Prussian Government had dispatched to Vienna a summons in respect to Holstein, which was as peremptory in its tone as its demands. Bismarck was ready to face a war and its consequences. Our Continental news is meagre and of little importance.

Among the other absurd antics enacted in Congress during last week, was the introduction of a proposition to endorse the Juarez Government of Mexico to the amount of $50,000,000—this, too, at a time when it is impossible to tell where the Republican Government of Mexico is, and when the people of the United States are divided as to the probability of paying their own enormous debt. If Congress has so much money at its disposal, let it loan fifty millions to the Southern States, as capital to be invested in restoring their disordered finances, the cultivation of their desolated fields and the revival of their industrial interests, now so terribly demoralized, and then if there is anything left, let it be given to the Fenians!

An agent from some great capitalists and contractors, who propose to establish a tunnel under the sea from Dover to Calais, has arrived in Paris, to apply to the Emperor for permission to make borings on the French soil in order to ascertain the practicability of the scheme.

It has transpired that the Emperor of the French and Prince Metternich both nearly lost their lives by the fall of an immense limb of an oak, while out shooting. They had just passed it when it fell with a tremendous crash. What a confusion in the world's affairs was most happily escaped, and but by a second!

The daughter of a keeper of an old curiosity shop in Paris has just lost her leg from a singular accident. She was displaying a Malay dagger to an amateur of arms, when the weapon fell from the scabbard and slightly grazed her foot, which began to swell immediately. The doctor at once tested the weapon, and found that the point had been dipped in one of those dire poisons against which there is no antidote.

The Toronto Globe says that Bristol Bill, and the other rogues who were concerned in the Galt Bank robbery, were aided in the work by some members of the Toronto police, who kept them posted as to the movements of the police force, and one of them concealed Bristol Bill in his house for some days. The discovery was made by a confession of one of the parties, whose statements are corroborated by known facts.

One account of the marriage of the Princess Anna Murat says that the whips of the coachman cost twenty dollars each, and the silk stockings of the footmen thirty dollars a pair.

San Francisco statistics exhibit a very remarkable growth in population during the war. In 1860 there were 56,000 citizens; in 1865, 110,000. The Bulletin thinks that there will be a less rapid increase in the future. Its estimate for 1870 is 100,000.

Bohemia, according to estimate, had at one time 160,000 colonies of bees on 20,000 square miles, and a writer for the Prairie Farmer does not hesitate to say that no square mile of the West is ever likely to be overstocked with bees.

THE GREAT PITTSBURG RAILROAD ROBBERY.

On the 16th of last September an extensive and apparently ingenious robbery was committed in this city at the office of the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad Company. On that day the paymaster's safe was opened by some person, at the time unknown, and money and drafts abstracted to the total amount of $30,000. Arrangements had been nearly completed by the paymaster of the company and his assistant for disbursing the amount required to meet the current account of wages. They had counted the money, and placed the sum due to each individual in separate envelopes. These envelopes were then put in a tin box, about twelve inches in length and six in width, and the box was locked up in the safe. No more thorough precautions could have been taken to insure security. The paymaster and his assistant went, about half-past 5 o'clock, to their customary evening meal, and the office was closed by the janitor. They returned in less than an hour, and, on going to get out the tin box, for the purpose of completing the details of the pay system, found that, in their absence, the safe had been opened, and the box with all its contents abstracted.

The treasurer of the company was immediately notified of what had happened, and a searching investigation was instituted, but not the slightest clue to the perpetrator of the robbery could be discovered. Consultation was had with Messrs. Humphlin & Moreland, the solicitors for the company, and they undertook the task of probing the case thoroughly. They procured the services of Pinkerton's private detective police of Chicago, and the ablest members of that force were detailed for working up the case. They got the idea into their heads, after awhile, that a young man named William Maguire, a messenger attached to the office of the company, was more or less implicated, and to him and his movements their special attention was thenceforward turned. Him they watched and hung around, and followed and analyzed generally, in a manner that must have been very unpleasant to his feelings had he known to what an extent he was the object of their regard and scrutiny.

About a week ago, an accomplice of Maguire's was caught, and, from information got from him, Maguire was arrested at Philadelphia.

He stated that he had planned and executed the robbery without any aid from or consultation with accomplices. He had taken advantage of the facilities which his position in the office of the Company had afforded him, and had perseveringly worked until he had obtained a model of the key with which the safe was opened and locked. From this model he had a duplicate made, and then he had only to watch his opportunity, until a sufficient sum of money was deposited to make it worth his while, to put his project into effect. When he stole the box he conveyed it to the house of his mother, on the corner of Wylie street and Union alley, in the Sixth ward, Pittsburg, and buried it there, about two feet underground, in the cellar, first taking out some $10,000, and leaving in it the balance of the cash and the drafts.

Maguire had lived a gay life at Cleveland and other points since the robbery, during which time he had squandered about $7000 of the booty. The particulars of his confession have been found to be correct. The box was found where he said it was hidden, and the money and documents he had left in it were safely recovered. He also made restitution of an expensive gold watch and chain, a diamond pin, and miscellaneous articles of jewelry, valued in all at over $1500. He is a young man about 22 years of age.—Pittsburg Dispatch, 17th.

USES OF GLYCERINE.—The uses of glycerine are daily extending, and as it is now a commercial article as easily obtained as alcohol, there is one application which ought to become popularly known. This is the property it possesses of dissolving out the odoriferous principle of flowers. The leaves of roses, of hyacinth, jasmin, geranium, etc., are to be put into a stopped bottle, and glycerine left in contact with them for three or four weeks. All of the perfume will be extracted, and as the glycerine will mix readily with water, a scented wash can be prepared for the hands, as well as an extract suitable for use by the preparation of perfumery. If the glycerine be left in contact with red pepper hulls, it will extract a principle very strengthening to the hair and less dangerous than the preparation of cantharides now so often used. We could fill a column with an account of the uses of glycerine which have sprung up within ten years, and may recur to the subject again.

THE GREAT ISSUE.

"What are our histories?" well asked Oliver Cromwell, "but God manifesting himself that he hath shaken, humbled down, and trampled under foot, whatsoever he hath not planted." In the condition of our public affairs, we are now realizing the truth of this saying. Some of our radical divines conceived that they saw in the assassination of Lincoln a Providential interference, by which an overruling Providence had removed a man whose temper was too mild and yielding for the great crisis that would soon be upon us, to make way for one "whose little finger would be heavier than the loins of Lincoln." How vain and short-sighted their speculations. The way seems to have been cleared for Andrew Johnson, that he might rescue this great people from the insidious designs of an uncompromising radicalism, whose only object was the overthrow of republican institutions. Disunion has now reached the utmost limit of its mission of mischief. It stirred up a bloody exhausting civil war through its fanatical agencies, and had it been permitted, through its chosen chief, to carry out its fell designs, it would ere this have established a Northern despotism through the overthrow of the Constitution, and the entire destruction of the civil rights of eleven States of this Union. We always believed and insisted that war would result in disunion if the party that commenced it continued in power. The result has justified our worst apprehensions. Fortunately for the country and the future of its institutions, a just and wise Providence interfered to save us, and to-day, through Andrew Johnson, God is tumbling down and trampling under foot what he has not planted—the Radical power. The great, the absorbing issue now presented to the American patriot is the restoration of the eleven States, now unrepresented, to all their rights and privileges in the Union and under the Constitution. Like Aaron's rod, it swallows up all the others. Partisan prejudices and predilections must be laid aside in view of the all-absorbing question—shall this Government be restored as our Fathers made it, or be absorbed by a concentrated, consolidated despotism? No patriot can hesitate in the determination of such questions. Men of all parties must rally to the side of the President, and, so long as he shall be true to the Constitution and the principles he has lately avowed, uphold and defend him from the machinations and conspiracies of the bold, bad men who now control Congress.—N. Y. News, 23d inst.

CONFLICT OF AUTHORITY AT WILMINGTON.—The following we take from the Wilmington Dispatch of the 19th:

The Court-house was the scene of considerable excitement on Saturday. It appears that five negroes had been convicted of larceny, and, in accordance with the sentence of the Court, had been whipped by the Sheriff. A short time after they were whipped, two United States soldiers, accompanied by a negro man named Fred. Howe, entered the Court-room for the avowed purpose of arresting Mr. S. R. Bunting, Sheriff of this county. Mr. Wm. A. Wright, Chairman of the Court, asked them by what authority they proposed to make the arrest. They replied, that they were acting under a verbal order of an officer of the Freedmen's Bureau. The Chairman stated that the Court could not recognize a verbal order, whereupon the soldiers retired.

An interview was subsequently had between one or more officers of the Bureau and the Chairman of the Court, but the precise nature of it, or its result, we do not know. We believe, however, that Mr. Wright satisfied the officers that the laws of North Carolina did not discriminate against the negro, in cases of petit larceny, and that a white man would be whipped for the same offence. The officers took the position that the punishment of a negro by stripes was a partial continuation of the "slave code," and that the infliction of stripes on either a white man or negro was a relic of barbarism, or something to that effect. We knew nothing about the instructions of the Bureau officers, but presume they would not take the responsibility of interfering with the functions of a civil Court without competent authority.

Pending the excitement, we learn, a large number of negroes assembled near the Court-house, where they remained, discussing the affair in an excited manner, until the Mayor made his appearance on the spot with a "posse" of policemen, and dispersed the crowd.

COTTON LANDS GOING BACK TO A WILDERNESS.—A correspondent of the Mobile Advertiser, upon whose judgment the editor relies, gives a gloomy picture of the future. He says:

What are the facts in regard to the cultivation of cotton and the return of negroes to field labor? A large proportion of the field hands are dead. Another large number have left the cotton-growing States. The cotton-producing lands in the bottoms will not be in cultivation this year nor the next; to a great extent they are going back into the wilderness. In no part of the country is a large proportion of the lands likely to be planted in cotton; much, even of the uplands in Alabama and Mississippi, will not be planted at all. A great number of the negroes are about the towns and villages with no sort of intention of returning to the plantations. Another fact known only to those who are making the effort to make cotton, under the present aspect, is the general opposition of negro women to field labor. The more sensible of the men see and feel the necessity of labor in the cotton field, but there is a settled opposition on the part of the women to go to the field again. They want to go into society and have a piano. The women are the main cotton-pickers.

When the negroes made contracts to make cotton, it was very cold and wet; they had no houses to live in; no provisions to live on; they were disappointed about the division of lands and mules. They said: Well, if we have to work, we might as well make a contract. They were to a great degree compelled to make an engagement to work. But when the pressure of the work in the heat of the spring and summer comes on, will he perform his contract? That is the question. The shade tree on the bank of a stream will afford house enough, and he can forage at large under the protecting wings of the "bureau."

ANOTHER CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.—It is rumored that a prominent member of the Committee on Reconstruction has prepared, and means to offer in Congress, in a few days, the subjoined additional amendment to the Constitution. It meets with great favor, and will be engineered with especial energy by the projector of several great, but still incomplete military enterprises. It is as follows:

ARTICLE XCV. That no State shall be admitted to representation in Congress until, by a provision embodied in its fundamental law, it pledges its citizens never to claim restitution of any pianos, watches, finger rings, spoons, silk dresses, books, pictures, sideboards, wines, liquors, carriages, and other portable property which may at any time, under the pressure of military necessity, have been transferred, shipped, removed or carried away from their residences, cellars, grounds, outhouses, or stables, and delivered into the care and keeping of loyal citizens of New England—and all persons claiming or asserting title to any such portable property so removed, shall be excluded from the basis of representation, and be forever disqualified to hold any office of trust or profit under the State or General Government.—Richmond Enquirer, 17th.

THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.—The Richmond Whig of a late date, says:

Our honest opinion is that both, the Southern whites and the Southern negroes, would be better off without than with this Bureau. The negroes have been emancipated, and the whites have not the power, nor have they the wish, to re-enslave them. If left without constraint or dictation, the two races would soon voluntarily establish easy, natural, kindly relations. The mistake is made of supposing that all the good that has been done, has been done by the Bureau. The truth is it has been done in spite of it. More would have happened without. From it has sprung all the distrust that exists between the two races. Created and administered exclusively in the interest of the blacks, it is viewed with jealousy by the whites, and their impulse and inclination is to avoid, as far as possible, all contact with the blacks, so as to be saved from all collision with the Bureau, in consequence of the complaints of evil disposed negroes.

CHRONOLOGICAL.

On this day (March 26) fifty-two years ago, Gen. Hull was sentenced to be shot for surrendering Detroit; but the court-martial sentence was remitted by President Madison.

March 26, 1676, Marlborough, Mass., was completely destroyed by the Indians.

March 26, 1602, Bartholomew Gosnold with 32 others, sailed from England in a shallop, and made the first direct voyage to Virginia. A colony was formed by them in the northern part of the State.

March 26, 1649, Governor Winthrop, of the Massachusetts Colony, died.

March 26, 1669, says Evelyn: "After an extraordinary storm, there came up the Thames a whale 56 feet long. Such an one was killed there 40 years ago. That year died Cromwell!" Prodigious!

March 26, 1794, Congress passed embargo laws.

The following events, history tells us, occurred on the 27th of March:

In 1622, the Indians massacred three hundred and forty-seven of the Virginia colony.

In 1771, liberty of the press first tested. A. McDougal was discharged from imprisonment by the Supreme Court of New York; he was charged with having published an article over the signature "A Son of Liberty."

In 1814, General Jackson fought the Creek Indians at Horse Shoe Bend, on the Tallapoosie river, and defeated them badly.

In 1861, the Peace Convention submitted to the Senate seven constitutional amendments, as a basis of adjustment of the National difficulties.

In 1862, Ashby made a cavalry charge on the Federal camp at Strasburg.

In 1863, skirmish at Yazoo Pass; the Nashville (Confederate gun-boat) got aground at the mouth of the Ogeechee, and was blown up by shells from the Federal iron-clad, Montauk.

In 1864, General Banks was laboring hard (so says a war chronicle) to reform the people of Alexandria, La., and had succeeded in administering five hundred Lincoln amnesty oaths to the people. (It speaks as though they were doses of medicine he was giving.)

On the 28th of March, in the years stated, the following events have taken place:

In 1461, at Fowton, occurred the great battle between the houses of York and Lancaster, by which the latter was overthrown.

In 1644, Charles I was defeated at Cherington by Walker, commanding the Parliamentary forces.

In 1675, the Indians attacked Providence, R. I., and burned a great portion of the town.

In 1772, Emanuel Swedenborg, founder of the religious faith called after him, died in London, aged 84.

In 1792, Gustavus III, of Sweden, was assassinated at a mask ball by Ankerstroom, a discharged army officer.

In 1799, the Legislature of New York passed a law for the gradual emancipation of slavery.

In 1848, John Jacob Astor died.

In 1861, the people of Louisiana ratified the ordinance of secession by a vote of 20,448 to 17,296.

In 1862, a severe fight at Apache Canon, near Santa Fe, New Mexico, between Federal regulars and volunteer Texans. It was a drawn battle.

In 1863, proclamation of fasting and prayer by Jefferson Davis.

In 1864, our historian says: "Election in Louisiana resulted in favor of the Free State party."

THE VETO.

Another blow has been struck at a rebellious, unconstitutional minority, and, we learn by special dispatches of this morning, that the President has vetoed the Civil Rights Bill passed by a majority of Congress. The so-called Civil Rights Bill was the entering wedge into the last bulwark of State rights, the finishing blow to expiring freedom, the crowning act of a series of violations of justice, intended to build up the most monstrous oligarchy ever witnessed in the world.

We hope we are not talking treason when denouncing the illegal acts of that "Branch" of Government, called the Legislative, when that branch is in direct opposition with another branch deemed so far above it, that, with only the support of one-third of the Representatives or Senators, its veto suspends the action of any bill, prevents it from becoming a law, and if opposed by less than two-thirds of both Houses, brands the opponents with the character of traitors and rebels.

The loyal people of the South, loyal to the Constitution of their forefathers and to the Union of brothers dreamt by Washington and his peerless companions, the South looks with abhorrence upon the miserable efforts of traitors and rebels to substitute their own imbecile and fanatical notions of government to the immutable rules of justice and right, enacted by the founders of the Republic, and, whatever may be said by any usurping authority, anxious to perpetuate itself in the exercise of unbounded power, the loyal people of the South will stand by the President and the Constitutional minority of Congress, which is now helping him to save the country.

The day is not far distant when the traitors and rebels in Congress will be called to account before an indignant Nation for their infamous plans and designs, and, unlike the rebels of 1861, who sealed with their blood their faith in a just, but impossible cause, posterity shall brand them with everlasting infamy.—Mobile Evening Times, 28th inst.

A SELF-MADE MILLIONAIRE.

The new residence of Jay Cooke, the banker, is situated on Clefton Hills, eight miles from Philadelphia, and is built in the French style, with steep slate roof and massive plastered chimneys. It is now quite finished, exteriorly, and will contain fifty bed chambers, a chapel, a gymnasium, a library, and all accessories to the palatial home of a Christian banker. Its dimensions probably exceed those of any private residence on the continent. It is pierced with about eighty great windows, and has within it a spacious court yard. There is a porch in front, of Pennsylvania granite, capped with a shield and monogram, and the rear, which faces the celebrated rural drive called the "Serpentine," is two-faced, terminating in a grand balcony, and in a bay window, the latter of itself as large as a dwelling house. The grounds, which make the crest and slopes of a tall hill, are already set out with evergreens and silvery foliages, and an elderly and manorial wood stretches to the front, up the sides of a steep precipice, at the foot of which runs a pastoral stream, debouching into fish ponds and dropping into waterfalls. The house is a marvel to the Quaker people around it, and as an architectural enterprise, for America, rivals Cologne Cathedral. It is said that half a million dollars will be expended in it. Mr. Cooke, whose origin was quite humble, has always been noted for his humane and republican virtues. He owns a church near his house, on the Old York Road, and his present ambition is to have a National day of fasting and gift-offerings set apart, whereupon all the rich people of the country shall subscribe to a tremendous charitable fund. An Episcopal Theological Seminary, it is said, will soon be established on Chelton Hills, and to it he will give twenty acres of ground and fifty thousand dollars.—N. Y. Citizen.

GOOD TASTE AND GOOD MANNERS.—The purity of taste is a quality of the mind; it is a feeling which can, with little difficulty, be acquired by the refinement of intelligence; whereas, purity of manners is the result of wise habits, in which all the interests of the soul are mingled and in harmony with the progress of intelligence. That is why the harmony of good taste and of good manners is more common than the existence of taste without manners, or of manners without taste.

THE EUROPEAN TROUBLES.

The recent events in the Danubian Principalities have had the effect of delaying the hostile movements of Prussia against Austria; but there is news to-day that a stir of martial preparation is heard at last on Prussian territory. "There is a great rattling of arms," says a letter from Frankfort, dated on the 28th of February; "but Prussia is in pecuniary difficulties, and, having no money to spend in war just now, will probably be content for the present to bluster and threaten, without actually coming to blows with her neighbor."

The Paris Presse of Feb. 27th has the following interesting bits of information:

"People in Prussia continue to speak of the prospect of the war. M. de Bismark no doubt wishes to make a diversion in order to cover the suppression of political liberty. It appears from a letter from Berlin that Prussia is silently making preparations for war. There are eight hundred infantry engaged day and night in the manufacture of war munitions at Neisse. It is well known that Prussian engineers were sent to Austria to inspect the fortresses there. They have made their report, and represent the fortress of Olmutz, which, from its situation, would take a leading part in case of a war between Austria and Prussia, as being particularly formidable. The feeling in the military society of Berlin is decidedly warlike, and the superior officers speak of a war with Austria as probable."

The Berlin correspondent of the London Times writes:

Until two days ago (Feb. 26) the Prussian note which was to demand the surrender of the Duchies for a consideration had not left this capital. Possibly its dispatch has been delayed in consequence of recent events in the Danubian Principalities—events which are likely to lead either to the completion of an intimate alliance between Austria and France, or to the estrangement of the one from the other. While awaiting the issue in those quarters, Count Bismark resolutely prepares for the worst. The Silesian fortresses are being strengthened and victualled against the contingency of a war; the Duppel works have already received a part of their complement of eighty-four heavy guns; and the commissariat has begun buying horses for a possible mobilization of the troops.

Prince Couza, dethroned by the Russian party among the nobility of his kingdom, has applied for redress to the powers which signed the treaty of Paris, and is making vigorous remonstrances against the movements of the Russian troops towards Roumania. A Vienna dispatch, dated March 1st, says a telegram from Constantinople announces that "at a council of state, held under the presidency of the Sultan in person, it was determined to demand of the Conference of the great Powers, that the inhabitants of the Danubian Principalities should select none but a native as their ruler. It was further determined to station a corps of observation on the Danube, and give orders to the Governors of Silistria and Widdin to concentrate, by forced marches, the troops garrisoning the different towns of Bulgaria."

The Independance Belge has the following:

The partisans of Prince Couza talk of a forthcoming occupation of the Danubian provinces by Austria and Prussia under the administrative regency of a sort of international commission, composed of delegates from all the great European powers. According to another version, much accredited in Paris, the governments of England and France would not be sorry to allow a transition state of things for awhile on the lower Danube, in view of arrangements by which, if necessary, the principalities would be handed over to Austria by way of compensation for the abandonment of Venetia.

Whatever these rumors may be worth, if the Roumains were not satisfied with Prince Couza, it is to be feared that they will gain nothing by their change, since diplomacy has determined to mix itself up in their affairs.

The military revolt has again broken out in Spain—so that Gen. Prim was right when he said that the troubles in that country were not ended. The garrison of Ciudad Rodrigo has rebelled, and similar news reported from different quarters. It is also rumored that Spain has demanded of Portugal the extradition of the Spanish soldiers who took refuge in the territory of the latter, on the ground that they are deserters. Portugal hesitates to accede to this demand.

NEWS FROM MONTANA.

The Montana Radiator of February 17th is received, filled with interesting news about the Indian war and the condition of that Territory. A published letter from Fort Benton says the Indian depredations still continue worse than ever. On the evening of the 2d a Piegan Indian—a chief, and one of the signers of the treaty—was here, and while he had gone after hay, stole George Steele's bay horse out of the stable and took him to the Indian camp. Mr. Steele sent for him, and received for an answer that if the whites wanted him to come after him. We have received warnings from the same camp to be careful about going out in town at night. This camp is on the Teton, ten miles from this place, and as most of the young men are out at war, it would be a fine time and place to attack them. Five hundred men could defeat them easily, and end the Indian troubles at once by marching on their present position. There are men here now waiting to prospect, but are afraid to try it, as the Indians would rob, if not kill them. There are others who desire to open a coal bank on the river, but the Indians stand between them and their projected work. If the Governor has not the authority or means to put an adequate force in the field, let the people take hold, as they have done before, and they can well pay themselves, and at the same time open the country to themselves and other prospectors and men of business.

We learn the following correct account of the murders reported sometime since, on the Yellowstone, from a squaw belonging to one of the murderers: Nine Blood Indians on the Yellowstone met two white men who were mounted and had pack horses. The whites refused to allow the Indians to approach them, until by signs they made them believe they were Piegans. They were fed by the white men, and when, the latter started on their journey, the Indians told them they were going the same way, and as some were about they would ride behind on the same horses with the whites. Fearing to refuse they permitted them to do so, and while riding in this manner one of Indians took the revolver from the seabbard of the man behind whom he rode and killed him, and simultaneously the other man fell dead, having been shot by the Indian who rode behind him. It is reported that there are about forty lodges of Bloods on their way to this vicinity. If this be so, we are bound to have trouble. The Piegans are just as bad as the Bloods, upon whom they charge their depredations.

Commenting on the war, the Radiator says: Owing to a scarcity of horses and a want of interest on the part of those whose interests are most at stake, recruiting has measurably ceased. Hundreds of men are ready to enlist, but they cannot equip themselves, nor is the Governor able to equip them, and the prospect is now unfavorable to an early suppression.

It is reported that Big Lake, chief of the Piegans, had sent a messenger to Governor Meagher to say that he and his tribe wished to be on friendly terms with the whites; and that they were willing to join in the war against the Bloods.—Missouri Democrat.

A LIVING ANIMAL EXTRACTED FROM THE HUMAN EYE.—A living hyatid, of the species cysticercus cellulosa, belonging to the entosa, a series of insects inhabiting the internal parts of animals, was last week extracted from the eye of a female by Mr. Woolcott, the oculist, founder and late surgeon of the Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital, Maidstone. The animal had been perceived for some time floating unattached in the interior chamber of the eye, and sight was almost entirely lost by the frequent attacks of inflammation. The occurrence of the entozoon in the human eye is very rare, and this is the second case only which has come under Mr. Woolcott's treatment during twenty years' practice as an oculist. The first came under his notice at the Ophthalmic Hospital in 1819, soon after that institution was "founded;" and, upon examination with the microscope after extraction, two of the progeny were found attached to the tail vehicle of the cysticercus.—Maidstone (Eng.) Journal.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S VETO

OF THE

CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

To the Senate of the United States:

I regret that the bill which has passed both Houses of Congress, entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish means of their vindication," contains provisions which I cannot approve consistently with my sense of duty to the people and my obligation to the Constitution of the United States. I am therefore constrained to return it to the Senate, and the House in which it originated, with my objections to its becoming a law. By the first section of the bill, all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are declared to be citizens of the United States. The provision comprehends the Chinese of the Pacific States, Indians subject to taxation, the people called Gipsies, as well as the entire race designated as blacks, people of color, negroes, mulattoes, persons of African blood. Every individual of the races born in the United States is by this bill made a citizen of the United States. It does not purport to declare or confer any other right of citizenship than Federal citizenship. It does not propose to give these classes of persons any status as citizens of the States, except that which may result from their status as citizens of the United States.

The power to the completion of the process of naturalization, and it may safely be assumed the same enactments are sufficient to give like protections and benefits to those for whom this bill provides, especially legislation. Besides, the policy of the Government, from its origin to this present time, seems to have been that persons who are strangers to, and unfamiliar with our institutions and our laws should pass through a certain probation at the end of which, before allowing the coveted prize, they must give evidence of their fitness to receive and exercise rights of citizens as contemplated by the Constitution of the United States. The bill in effect proposes a discrimination against large numbers of intelligent, worthy and patriotic foreigners, and in favor of negro to whom, after long years of bondage—avenues to freedom and intelligence, have just now broken suddenly opened. He must of necessity from his previous unfortunate condition of servitude, be less informed as to the nature and character of our institutions than he who coming from abroad, has to some extent at least, familiarized himself with the principles of a Government to which he voluntarily entrusts life, liberty and pursuit of happiness. Yet it is now proposed, by a single legislative enactment, to confer rights of citizenship upon all persons of African descent born within the extended limits of the United States, while persons of foreign birth who make our land their home, must undergo a probation of five years, and can only then become American citizens. To confer the right of State citizenship is first as exclusive with the several States as the power to confer the right of Federal citizenship is with Congress. The right of Federal citizenship thus to be conferred on the several excepted races before mentioned, is now, for the first time, proposed to be given by law. If, as is claimed by many, all persons who are native-born are already, by virtue of the Constitution, citizens of the United States, the passage of the pending bill cannot be necessary to make them such. If, on the other hand, such persons are not citizens, as may be assumed from the proposed legislation to make them such, the grave question presents itself, whether, when eleven of the thirty-six States are unrepresented in Congress at this time, it is sound policy to make our entire colored population and all other excepted classes citizens of the United States. Four millions of them have just emerged from slavery into freedom. Can it be reasonably supposed that they possess the requisite qualifications to entitle them to all the privileges and immunities of citizenship of the United States? Have the people of the several States expressed such a conviction? It may be also asked, whether it is necessary that they should be declared citizens in order that they may be secured in the enjoyment of the civil rights proposed to be conferred by this bill. These rights are, by Federal as well as by State laws, secured to all aliens and foreigners upon proof that they are of good moral character, attached to the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the Government. The second section of the bill also contains an enumeration of the rights to be enjoyed by those classes, the so-made citizens, in every State or Territory in the United States. It gives parties right to inherit, give in evidence, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for security of person and property—the same as enjoyed by white citizens. So, too, they are made subject to the same punishments, pains and penalties in common with the white citizens and to no others. Thus is an equality of the white and colored races attempted to be fixed by Federal law in every State of the Union. In the vast field of State jurisdiction governed by these enumerated rights, in none of them any State exercise any power of discrimination between different races in the exercise of State policy over matters exclusively affecting the people of each State. It has frequently been thought expedient to discriminate between the two races by the statutes of some of the States North, as well as South.

It is enacted, for instance, that no white person shall intermarry with a negro or mulatto. Chancellor Kent says, speaking of the blacks, that marriages between them and whites are forbidden in some of the States where slavery does not exist, and they are prohibited in all slaveholding States by law, and when not absolutely contrary to law they are revolting and regarded as an offence against public decorum. I do not say that this bill repeals State laws on this subject of marriage between the two races, for, as the whites are forbidden to intermarry with the blacks, the blacks can only make such contracts with themselves as the whites are allowed to make, and, therefore, cannot, under the bill, enter into a marriage contract with the white. Is the discrimination, however, as an instance of the State policy as to discrimination, and to inquire whether, if Congress can abrogate all State laws of discrimination between the two races on the matters of real estate, of rents, and of contracts generally, Congress may not also repeal the State laws as to the contract of marriage between the races. Hitherto, every subject embraced in the enumeration of rights contained in the bill has been considered as exclusively belonging to the States. They all relate to the internal policy and economy of the respective States. They are matters which in each State concern the domestic condition of the people, varying in each, according to its own peculiar circumstances and the safety and well being of its own citizens. I do not mean to say that upon all these subjects there are not Federal relations, as for instance, in the State power of legislation over contracts, there is a Federal limitation that no State shall pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts, and as to crimes that no State shall pass an exparte facto law, and as to money that no State shall make anything but gold and silver a legal tender. But when can we find a Federal prohibition against the power of any State to discriminate, as do most of them, between aliens and citizens, between artificial persons, called corporation, naturalized persons, in the right to hold real estate? If it be granted that Congress can repeal all State laws discriminating between whites and blacks, on the subject covered by this bill, why, it may be asked, may not Congress repeal in the same way all State laws discriminating between the two races on the subject of suffrage and office. If Congress can declare by law who shall hold lands, who shall testify, who shall have the capacity to make contracts in a State, then Congress can also, by law, declare who, without regard to race or color, shall have the right to sit as a juror or as judge, to hold any office, and finally, to vote in every State and Territory of the United States. As respects the Territories, they come within the power of Congress, for as to them the law making power is the Federal power, but as to the States no provisions exist vesting in Congress the power to make rules and regulations for them. The object of the second section of the bill is to afford a discrimination and protection to colored persons in the full enjoyment of all their rights secured to them in the preceding section. It declares that any person who under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation or custom shall subject or cause to be subjected any inhabitant of any State or Territory, to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or the different punishments, pains or penalties on account of such persons having at any time been held in a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except for the punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or by reason of color or race than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court. This section seems to be designed to apply to some existing or future law of a State or territory which may conflict with the provisions of the bill now under consideration. It provides for counteracting such forbidden legislation by imposing fine and imprisonment upon the legislator who may pass such conflicting laws, or upon the officers or the agents who shall put or attempt to put them into execution. It means an offered offense, not a common crime committed upon the person or property of the black race. Such an act may deprive the black man of his property, but not of his right to his property. It means a deprivation of the right itself either by the State judiciary or the State legislator. It is therefore assumed that under this section members of a State Legislature who should vote for laws conflicting with the provisions of the bill, that judges of the State courts who should render judgment in antagonism with its terms, and that marshals and sheriffs who should, as ministerial officers, execute processes sanctioned by State laws issued by State Judges in execution of their judgments could be brought before other tribunals, and there subjected to fine and imprisonment for the performance of the duties which such State laws impose. The legislation thus proposed involves the judicial power of the State. It says to every State Court or Judge: "If you decide that this act is unconstitutional; if you refuse, under the prohibition of a State law, to allow a negro to testify; if you hold that over such a subject matter, the said law is paramount and under color of a State law refuse the exercise of the right to the negro. Your error of judgment, however conscientious, shall subject you to fine and imprisonment. I do not apprehend conflicting legislation, which the bill seems to contemplate and is so likely to occur as to render it necessary at this time to adopt the measure of such doubtful constitutionality. In the next place this duty of a judicial decision converts the State Judge into a mere ministerial officer, bound to decide according to the will of Congress. It is clear, that in States which deny to persons those rights are secured by the first section of the bill, any one of those rights; all criminal and civil cases connecting, will, by the third section, come under the executive cognizance of the Federal tribunals. It follows that if any State which denies to a colored person any of all these rights that a person should commit a crime against the laws of the State, murder or any other crime, all protection and punishment. The courts of the State are taken away, and he can only be tried and punished in a Federal court. How is the criminal to be tried if the offence is provided for and punished by the Federal law? The law and not the State law is to govern. It is only when the offence does not happen to diminish the jurisdiction of the Federal law, that the Federal courts are to try and punish him. Under another law than this, resort is to be had to the common law, as modified and changed by State legislation, so far as the same is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. So that over this vast domain of criminal jurisprudence provided by each State for the protection of its own citizens, for the punishment of all her sons who violated its criminal laws, Federal law wherever it can be made to apply, displaces State law. The question here naturally arises, from what sources Congress derives the power to transfer to Federal tribunals certain classes of cases embraced in this section. The Constitution expressly declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution. The laws of the United States, and treaties made, and which shall be made under their authority to all cases affecting Ambassadors or other public Ministers or Consuls; to all cases of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of some States who claim land under grant of different States, and between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States; citizens or subjects. Here the judiciary power of the United States is expressly set forth and defined, and the act of September 24th, 1789, establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States, in conferring upon the Federal Courts jurisdiction over cases originating in State tribunals, is careful to confine them to the classes enumerated in the above cited clause of the Constitution. This section of the bill undoubtedly comprehended the cases and authorizes the exercise of powers that are not by the Constitution within the jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States. To transfer them to those Courts would be an exercise of authority well calculated to excite disrust and alarm on the part of all the States, for the bill applies alike to all of them as well as those that have not engaged in the rebellion. It may be assumed that this authority is incipient to power granted to Congress by the Constitution, as recently amended, to enforce by appropriate legislation the article declaring that neither slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, and the party thereof be duly convicted shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction." It cannot, however, be justly claimed that with a view to the enforcement of this article of the Constitution, there is at present any necessity for the exercise of all the powers which this bill confers. Slavery has been abolished, and at present nowhere exists within the jurisdiction of the United States; nor has there been, nor is it likely there will be any attempt to revive it by the people of those States. If, however, any such attempt should be made it will become the duty of the general Government to exercise any or all incidental powers necessary and proper to maintain inviolate this Government.

The fourth section of this bill provides that officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau shall be empowered to make arrests, and that officers may be specially commissioned for that purpose by the President of the United States. It also authorizes Circuit Courts of the United States and Superior Courts of the territories to appoint, without limitation, commissioners who are to be charged with the performance of quasi judicial duties.

The fifth section empowers the commissioners so to be selected by the court to appoint, in writing, one or more suitable persons from time to time to execute processes, etc. The numerous officials and agents are made to constitute a sort of police, in addition to the military, and are authorized to summon a posse comitatus, and even to call to his aid such portion of the land and naval forces of the United States or of the militia, as may be necessary to the performance of the duty with which they are charged. This extraordinary power is to be conferred upon agents irresponsible to the Government and to the people, whose number the discretion of the commissioners is the only limit in whose hands such authority might be made a terrible engine of wrong, oppression and fraud. The General Government, regulating land and naval forces of the United States for the execution of the laws are believed to be adequate to any emergency which occurs in time of peace. If it should prove otherwise, Congress can at any time amend those laws in such a manner as, while subserving public welfare, will not jeopardise the rights, interests and liberties of the people. The seventh section provides that a fee of ten dollars shall be paid to each Commissioner, in every case brought before him, and a fee of five dollars to his Deputy or Deputies, for each person he or they may arrest and take before any such Commissioner, with any such other fees as may be deemed reasonable by such Commissioner, in general, for performing such other duties as may be required in the premises. All these fees are to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, whether there is a conviction or not; but, in case of conviction, they are to be receivable from the defendant. It seems to me that under the influence of such temptations, bad men might convert any law, however beneficent, into an instrument of persecution and fraud. By the eighth section of the bill, the United States Courts which set only in one place for white persons, must migrate with the Marshal and District Attorney, and necessarily with the Clerk—although he is not mentioned—to any part of the District, upon the order of the President, and there hold Courts for the purpose of a more speedy arrest and trial of persons charged with a violation of the Act; and there the Judge and officers of the Court must remain, upon the order of the President, for the time therein designated. The ninth section authorizes the President, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation, and enforce the due execution of, this Act. This language seems to imply a permanent military force, that is to be always at hand, and whose only business is to be the enforcement of this measure over the vast region where it is intended to operate. I do not propose to consider the policy of this bill. To me the details of the bill are fraught with evil. The white race and the black race of the South have, hitherto, lived together under the relation of master and slave.

Capital owning labor, no what that relation is changed; and as to ownership, capital and labor are divorced; they stand now each master of itself. In this new relation, one being necessary to the other, there will be an adjustment which both are deeply interested in making harmonious. Each has equal power in settling the terms, and if left to the laws that regulate capital and labor, it is confidently believed they will satisfactorily work out the problem. Capital, it is true, has more intelligence, but labor is never so ignorant as not to understand its own interest, not know its own value or not see that capital must pay the value. This bill prostrates this adjustment. It intervences between capital and labor, and attempts to settle a question of political economy. This agency of numerous officials whose interest it will be to foment discord between the two races—for as the breach widens, their employment will continue, and when it is closed, their occupation will end. In all our history, in all our experience as a people, living under Federal and State laws, no such system as that contemplated by the details of this bill has ever before been proposed or adopted. They establish for the safety of the colored and against the white race. They interfere with the municipal legislation of the States—with relations existing exclusively between State and citizens, and between the inhabitants of the same State and the absorption and assumption of power by the General Government, which, if acquiesced in, must necessarily sap and, ultimately, destroy, our federative system of limited powers, and break down the barriers which preserve the rights of the States. It is another step or another stride to centralization and the concentration of all legislative powers in the National Government. The tendency of the bill must be to resuscitate the spirit of rebellion and to arrest the progress of those influences which are more closely drawing around the States the bonds of union and pence. My lamented predecessor, in his proclamation of the first of January, 1863, ordered and declared that all persons held as slaves within certain States and parts of States therein designated, were and thenceforward should be free; and further, that the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, would recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons. This guaranty was rendered especially obligatory and sacred by the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery throughout the United States. I therefore fully recognize the obligation to protect and defend that class of our people whenever or wherever it shall become necessary, and to the full extent compatible with the Constitution of the United States. Entertaining these sentiments, it only remains for me to say I will cheerfully co-operate with Congress in any measure that may be necessary for the preservation of the civil rights of freedmen, as well as those of all other classes of persons throughout the United States. By judicial process under equal and impartial laws, or conformable with the provisions of the Federal Constitution, I now return the bill to the Senate, and request that in considering the bill and joint resolutions, forty-two in number, which have been thus far submitted for my approval, I am compelled to withhold my assent from a second measure that has received the sanction of both branches of Congress.

ANDREW JOUNSON,
President of the United States.

WASHINGTON, March 27th, 1866.

PRAYING FOR THE PRESIDENT.

To those who remember the unfrocking of Bishop Wilmer, and the closing of the Episcopal Churches of Alabama by military orders, the following scrap of contemporaneous history will be read with gaping mouth and staring eyes. What a mighty difference it makes whose ox is gored and whose hull did the goring. The facts of this little history occurred in Missouri, and it is related by the Missouri St. Louis Republican. Read, and wonder at the inconsistency of man and the mutability of human opinions:

"EXCOMMUNICATION OF THE PRESIDENT.—We all remember how the 'disloyal' clergy were regarded and treated during the late war, and even since, for refusing or omitting to pray for the President of the United States. Their churches were promptly closed by the military authorities, and, in many instances, they were dragged to prison, and otherwise punished. But now, what was then a crime is about to be established as a test of 'loyalty' by the Legislature of Missouri. Among the proceedings of the Senate, a short time ago, as published by us a few days afterwards, it may have been noticed that Mr. Dean called attention to the fact that the officiating Chaplain, while praying for Congress, omitted any allusion to the President. Wishing to put an end to this invidious discrimination, he offered a resolution, requesting the clergy of Jefferson City who officiate as Chaplains for the Senate to remember in their prayers the President of the United States; but it was at once laid upon the table by a vote of fourteen to six. The pious scribes and pharisees of the Radical synagogue no doubt think they are acting upon the scriptural injunction, that if an offender, after refusing to hear 'two or three witnesses,' (as Sumner, Stevens & Co.) shall also 'neglect to hear the church,' he must then be cast out 'as a heathen man and a publican.' It may be some consolation, however, to the President and his friends to remember that 'the prayer of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord,' while 'the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man (and many such are continually offering in his behalf throughout the land) availeth much.'"

A DECISIVE REPORT.—There is a magistrate in a town in Indiana named Heiser. A clergyman in the same place was called upon by a young couple not long since, wishing him to join them in the holy bonds of matrimony. He asked the bridegroom (a soldier, by the way,) for his marriage license. The man in blue said he had been engaged to his girl four years, and thought that would do. Clergyman thought not, and remarked, as the speediest way to obtain a license: "You had better take your girl and go to Heiser." "You can go to h—l yourself," retorted the veteran, and without further advice he left his presence.

☞ It is observed that the most censorious are generally the least judicious; who, having nothing to recommend themselves, will be finding fault with others. No man envies the merit of another that has any of his own.

Convened in New Orleans, April 4, 1866.

FIRST DAY.

The General Conference of the Methodist E. Church South convened in the Carondelet Street Method- Church on yesterday, April 4th, 66.

Bishop Andrew opened the devoal exercises of the General Conence at 9, A. M., with the reading the 12th Chapter of Hebrews, ich was followed by the singing the 261st hymn. Prayer by hop Early.

O. P. Fitzgerald.

Bishop Kavannugh explained why there were no delegates from the Kansas Conference, by stating that the members of that Conference had held an informal meeting, at which they deemed it most prudent not to hold any annual Conference there any longer, but requested that the General Conference merge the work into the Missouri and the St. Louis Conferences.

At the close of the call of delegates, Dr. Summers was elected Secretary of the General Conference, with power to appoint his own assistants.

Rev. Dr. Pierce, of Mississippi, moved that the daily sessions of the Conference commence at nine o'clock in the morning, and close at twelve o'clock M. Adopted.

Upon motion, the Presiding Elder of the New Orleans District and the preachers in charge in said city were appointed a Committee on Public Worship.

Rev. Dr. Keener suggested to the Conference the necessity of taking some action respecting the publishing of a daily paper containing a report of its proceedings.

After some discussion, the matter was referred to a committee consisting of Rev. Drs. Keener, Myers and McFerrin.

The following standing committees were announced, to consist of one member from each Conference, to be selected by the delegates themselves: On Episcopacy; on Itinerancy; on Boundaries; on Books and Periodicals; on Missions; on Education; on Revisals; on Sunday Schools; and on the Religious Interests of the Colored People.

Rev. Dr. Deems then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Bishops appoint a committee of — members of this General Conference to prepare a paper which shall set before the Christian world a clear and candid statement of the position of the Methodist Episcopal Church South towards other branches of Christ's Catholic Church.

In support of the foregoing, Dr. Deems said: I make this motion thus early in the session of deliberate purpose, and frankly state my reasons therefor. There are now existing in America several branches of the Christian Church bearing the name "Methodist." Ours is one of the very largest and most powerful bodies of that name. Another was once one with us, but is now separated from us. I mean the Northern Methodist Church. Another is separate from both the Southern Methodist Church and the Northern Methodist Church—a body of Christians embracing many godly, learned and laborious pastors, and a highly respectable, useful and growing membership. Superficial observers are at a loss to understand how large bodies of Christian people bearing the same general denomination and so slightly differing in discipline, and having no difference in their Articles of Religion, should not be concorporated. The reason for the appointment of this committee is that such a paper may be submitted to Christendom in the fear of God and in love for all who name the Name of Christ, as shall either lead to such a union without the sacrifice of any principle, or shall in all time be appealed unto, in proof of the fact that, if no union can exist, no blame thereof can possibly in right reason be laid at the door of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

Rev. Dr. Hamilton opposed the resolution, and regretted that such a matter should have been introduced at all. He hoped that it would be laid upon the table, as he feared it would lead to political discussions.

Rev. Dr. Deems said he thought he was exceedingly careful in his resolution and speech to avoid anything which could be so construed. He sympathized with the feelings of Dr. Hamilton, and was equally anxious to avoid anything of a political tendency. But, said he, we cannot afford to ignore the opinion of Christendom concerning us as a Church. We should show to the world the reasons why we stand apart from other Methodist Churches in this country.

Rev. Jas. E. Cobb objected to the resolution, and moved to lay it upon the table.

Rev. Dr. Myers said we are treading on rather delicate ground. Are we not in danger of officially answering charges and accusations before any were officially made? Do we need to vindicate our Church polity now any more than ever? The Church stands exactly where she always stood. Nothing that we can say can convince those who are hostile to us; and our friends need no new arguments to strengthen their belief in us.

Rev. Dr. Deems then withdrew his resolution for the present.

On motion, the President was requested to appoint a special Committee on the Circulation of the Holy Scriptures.

Rev. Dr. Myers offered a resolution for the appointment of a Committee on Organic Laws, to which should be referred all petitions, resolutions, etc., relating to changes in our organic laws.

Rev. Dr. McFerrin thought the Committee on Revisals was the proper one to which all such matters should be referred, and could not see the necessity of having two Committees for the same purpose.

Rev. Dr. Myers, after some further discussion of the matter, agreed to withdraw his resolution for the present.

Rev. Dr. Keener announced that Rev. Dr. Edwards, of the Virginia Conference, would preach in the Carondelet street Church in the evening.

On motion of Rev. Dr. Hamilton, the time of adjournment was extended to two o'clock, P. M.

Rev. Dr. McFerrin presented the following communication from Bishop Soule, which was read by the Secretary and ordered to be filed with the Conference papers:

TO THE BISHOPS AND MEMBERS OF THE GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH, TO ASSEMBLE THE FIRST WEDNESDAY IN APRIL, 1866:

Rev. and Dear Brethren—At the special request of the venerable Bishop Soule, our senior Superintendent, I visited him on the 12th of February last. He had been deeply afflicted for a few days, and thought in all probability it was his last sickness. I had visited him often during the year, and always found him the same gentle, meek-spirited Christian—a man of great faith and full of hope and charity; but this was perhaps the most interesting interview I had ever had with this dearly beloved Minister of the Lord Jesus Christ. Though I was at the time feeble, going from a sick room to visit the Bishop, I felt truly refreshed in spirit, and left greatly encouraged as a Christian and Christian Minister.

He presented to me a copy of the "Letters" of the Rev. Wm. Beauchamp, with a "Preface," written by the Bishop himself in 1848. He said: "I request you to take this book to the General Conference, and request the 'Preface' to be read to the members composing that body, as indicating my views on the General Itinerant System of our Church. I would write more, but I feel unable to write. I had hoped, but it is hope against hope, to be able to visit the approaching General Conference; but that hope is now gone. My late afflictious admonish me that it will be impossible to meet that body. I had greatly desired to be present at the session, which will be one of vast importance to the Church, but I now have no expectation of being there." He then added, with his peculiar emphasis, "The Church must preserve her grand Itinerant system inviolate, or we will be shorn of our strength; we will lose our power as a Church."

He then remarked that he had noticed in the papers that a great many changes were proposed; that in all these we should move with caution and circumspection.

On the multiplication of Bishops he said: "Not a Bishop for every Conference. He would suggest a sufficient number to supervise the work thoroughly; but a steady eye must be kept on the General Itinerant Superintendency; this must not be marred."

Name of the Church.—He "was not very particular as to the title, but the name that would please him most would be WESLEYAN EPISCOPAL METHODIST CHURCH." "We are," he added, "truly Wesleyan."

Class-Meetings and Love-Feasts he thought could not be improved by legislation.

Lay Representation.—He had no fears of the laity; he was willing to trust them. But there were difficulties attending its introduction. The wisest and best laymen should be in our councils; but how are they to be compensated? and their expenses must be paid. And then, they should be so limited as not to interfere with the administration in our pastoral and itinerant work. These appertain to the ministry, and should not be controlled by local men.

The Extension of the Pastoral Tenure.—Here he seemed to hesitate for a moment, and then said, nothing should be done to interfere with our efficient Itinerancy.

These remarks I noted at the time, with the understanding that the Bishop's views were to be communicated to the General Conference. I accordingly submit these notes, with the little volume which he desired should be handed to your venerable body. J. B. MCFERRIN.

Feb. 13, 1866.

P. S.—In company with Bro. Baldwin, I visited Bishop Soule the day before we left Nashville for this city. He had much improved in health; he was able to walk about his house and yard, was very cheerful, and sends his special love and Christian regards to the Bishops and members of the General Conference. He requested me to give the brethren assurances of his great love for them. He awaits with much interest the results of the deliberations of the body; repeated what has been set forth in the foregoing notes; and especially calls attention to the "style" of our Church. He prefers that we be called the "Wesleyan Episcopal Methodist Church." He, however, does not insist on this title. The Bishop is full of faith and full of peace—just awaiting the Master's call. He says he has no fears, but makes the 23d Psalm his own. He repeated it with much feeling, and added, "I have no fears—no doubts—just waiting to leave these shores and go to my future home." He said: "Ask the brethren to pray for me."

April 4, 1866. J. B. M.

On motion of Rev. Dr. Smith, seconded by Rev. Jas. A. Duncan, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the General Conference has received with deep emotion the communication from the Rev. Bishop Soule, through Dr. McFerrin, and rejoices to know that he is still sustained and comforted by the consolations of our holy religion, which he has so long lived to preach and exemplify in his useful and honored life, and that this Conference tender to our beloved Senior Bishop its kindest sympathy and prefers for him its warmest prayers.

The Conference then adjourned.

SECOND DAY.

The Conference met at 9 o'clock A. M., pursuant to adjournment of yesterday—Rev. Bishop John Early in the chair.

The opening exercises were conducted by Rev. Dr. A. L. P. Green, of Tennessee, and were as follows: Reading of the 46th Psalm; singing of the 261st hymn; and prayer.

The Secretary stated that, not having a complete list of the delegates present, he was unable to call the roll, and it was therefore dispensed with.

The minutes of yesterday's proceedings were read by the Secretary, and after some corrections, adopted.

Rev. Bishop H. H. Kavanaugh then took the chair.

From the Pacific Conference, O. P. Fitzgerald being the only delegate, the Secretary was instructed by the General Conference to enroll his name as constituting the several committees representing that Conference.

The President stated that if there were any persons present in the character of representatives of other denominations, an opportunity was then afforded them to report; whereupon, Rev. Jacob Ditzler came forward and was introduced to the Conference as a delegate from the Christian Union Church of Illinois.

Rev. Mr. Ditzler stated that in 1862-3-4 a number of persons of various denominations throughout the West believed that they were justified in forming themselves into a distinct religious organization, that restricted themselves to preaching Jesus Christ and the resurrection. They began to organize privately in 1863; in 1864 they more fully developed their plans, but not until 1865 did they fully take the field. In 1865 they held a General Council at Terre Haut, Indiana, in which six States were represented. In September, 1865, they formed their articles of religion and polity in Illinois. Each State has a distinct organization, and is independent of any other State. They now number between four and five thousand members, about sixty traveling preachers, have four superintendents, and are increasing daily almost by fifties. If they had fifty more preachers to-day they could find work for them in southern Illinois. The speaker proceeded at some length to state the peculiar circumstances that gave rise to their denomination; referred to the past history of Wesleyanism, and closed by thanking the Conference for their kind reception.

Rev. R. A. Young, of Tenn., stated for the information of the members of the Conference, that Rev. Mr. Ditzler is a native of Kentucky; in 1855 was transferred from Kentucky to the St. Louis Conference, and was placed in his (the speaker's) District, in the 16th street Church, and remained a faithful and zealous member of that Conference until the commencement of the fraternity to which he now belongs. He said that he was happy to state that he knew him well, that he is a good and a true man, and represents the sentiments of his Church.

Mr. Pinckard, of St. Louis, moved that a special Committee be appointed to confer with Mr. Rev. Ditzler, have a formal consultation with him, and elicit more minutely the facts concerning the fraternity he represents, and report to the General Conference.

Rev. Dr. Lee, of Virginia, moved as an amendment that we recognized with great pleasure Rev. Mr. Ditzler as a fraternal messenger from the organization he represented, and that the papers he has laid before the Conference be referred to the Committee on Itinerancy.

Rev. Dr. Smith, of Virginia, said that he somewhat doubted the propriety of the course proposed in this matter. He thought it right that the Rev. Mr. Ditzler should be recognized as a fraternal messenger, but to refer the papers presented to the Itinerant Committee seemed to him to be a little out of the way. The object to be effected seemed to be a union of that fraternity with the M. E. Church South. He thought the duties of the Itineraney Committee did not comprehend the consideration of this subject, and that the matter should be more properly referred to a special committee for that purpose.

Rev. L. Pearce, of Mississippi, thought the better plan would be to form a Committee on the State of the Church, to which all such matters could be referred.

Rev. Dr. Smith, of Virginia, thought the proposition had nothing to do with the state of the Church, and that the proper way of disposing of it was to refer it to a special committee.

Rev. P. M. Pinckard, of St. Louis, moved that the Conference receive Rev. L. Ditzler as a fraternal messenger, and that the papers presented by him, and any further communication he may desire to make, be referred to a special committee of nine, to be appointed by the President, and that the committee report such measures as they deem best for the action of the General Conference.

Rev. L. Pearce, of Mississippi, moved a division on the question.

The question then occurring on the reception of Rev. Mr. Ditzler as a fraternal messenger, representing the Christian Union Church of Illinois, the motion was agreed to.

Rev. Dr. Smith, of Virginia: I move that a committee be raised on correspondence with other churches, to consist of nine members, to be appointed by the Chairman. Motion agreed to.

Rev. Dr. Myers, of Georgia, moved that any communication from the Rev. Mr. Ditzler be referred to that committee—which was agreed to.

The hour for adjournment having arrived, on motion of Rev. Dr. McFerrin the session was extended for two hours, until 2 o'clock, P. M., in order to receive communications for reference to the various standing committees.

Rev. Dr. Sehon presented a report from the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church South, which was read, and on motion referred to the Committee on Missions.

On motion, Reports, Petitions, Appeals and Memorials to be referred to the several committees, were called for.

The Montgomery Conference presented, through the Rev. B. B. Ross,

OPENING EXERCISES.

On Wednesday last the General Conference of the Methodist E. Church South met at nine o'clock, A. M., in the Carondelet street church, in the audience room. Bishops Andrew, Early and Kavanaugh sat in the Altar. A large number of the Delegates were present from the Kentucky border, from Texas, from California, and most of Twenty-one Annual Conferences of the Church.

The venerable Senior Bishop ascended the pulpit and opened the Conference by the reading of the Scriptures, the 12th chapter of Hebrews. Composed by the sound of the voice of the minister, the heart had time to feel the inspiration of that gathering. Those servants of the living God at length assembled in the espirit of their Master, after long years of expectation—how good and how pleasant and how pure is this fellowship of the Saints!

"'Tis like to that above."

Truly the bow of our Israel abides in strength. Here were men who had borne the burden and heat of the day, and whose hoary heads were crowns of glory; here were young men, strong to labor, and men in the ripe maturity of life—all separated to the Ministry of the Gospel of God. We could but wish that the whole church might be there to witness.

After the chapter, the Bishop gave out—

"High on his everlasting throne
The King of saints his work surveys," which was sung in that full, deep melody of tone only to be heard in a Conference of Methodist preachers. "There are no songs comparable to the songs of Zion." This is one of John Wesley's—glorious man that he was, and this Hymn is just like him. We sung it all through, every precious line of it. There were not many spectators present—not very many even of the church. Well, so it is, we often miss the best things in the world, and only awake to the fact after it is too late.

Bishop Early made the opening prayer. Men whose lives had been one prolonged breath of prayer, now in the unison of faith and earnest supplication, knelt, consciously in the presence of the Saviour, and besought Him, for the church which he had bought with his own blood. We could not see Him, but felt the blessedness of those who "see not, yet believe." Surely that prayer was heard.—Doubtless many holy men and women far away were there in the spirit, as on the Friday before, when thousands of our Israel fasted and prayed that God might endow this Conference with the presence of his Holy Spirit, that it might be filled with all wisdom and knowledge.

The Conference elected the Rev. Dr. Summers Secretary and rapidly passed on to business.

Wesleyan Chapel Building Fund. We take the following extract from a London letter dated March 3d, 1866:

"I have only space for a brief paragraph relative to our own Methodism. A fresh start has been given to the Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund. Four years ago £20,000 was raised towards assisting the erection of new chapels in London, and since that period seventeen new chapels have been erected at a total cost of £70,000, and the whole of the fund has been exhausted. Within the last few weeks a further sum of £18,000 has been raised toward assisting local efforts in the erection of new chapels; so that there is a prospect within the next three or four years of [illegible] more chapels, of large size, [illegible] Methodism in this overgrown [illegible]. This is no more than is necessary to keep pace with a population that [illegible] increases at the rate of 60,000 per annum.

THE LOST MISSION.

Every Church should have a mission. From the beginning every Church has had a mission, but not always a divinely appointed one. But the mission of the Church South is at an end. It has had its day.

* * * * *

The leading men in the Southern Church are sensible of the correctness of this position, and are now demanding a modification of their economy, which will so "differentiate" their Church from the M. E. Church as to give them an apology for their continued separate existence.—New York Methodist.

The solicitude which has been expressed, not to say felt, by the controlling minds of Northern Methodism, lest "the mission," as they call it, of the M. E. Church South should have run out, might unduly elate a people unaccustomed, as they are, to receive so much consideration and sympathy. But fortunately our people, for the most part, are far too plain and simple-hearted to have imagined or entertained the grand conceit of "having a mission." They are, therefore, neither elated or depressed, but very much bothered to know exactly what it is they are in danger of losing or have already lost. Our people in the valley of the Mississippi and in the valley of Virginia have been, for the last twelve months, watching their altars and keeping off Bishop Ames' military ecclesiastical cormorants, as Abram drove away the fowls which came down upon the sacrifice. If one were to ask, "Are you not afraid of losing your mission?" it is not unlikely the answer would be, "We don't know exactly—may be so. We are very much afraid just now of losing this church-property; these fellows are so pertinacious, and have such a strong backing."

This unconsciousness of "having a mission," characterized the few men who, in the judgment of history, have been true Reformers. When Martin Luther, on the 31st October, 1517, nailed his ninety-five Theses against the Doctrine of Indulgences on the church door at Wittemburg, neither the Elector, Staupitz, Spalatin, or the great German himself had any intention of waging a battle for the rights of mankind. At a later period when burning the Papal bull, he did it, not as realizing the idea of "a mission," but merely as the protest of a Christian minister against the corruption of his own church. "In November, 1738," says Mr. Wesley, "two or three persons who desired to flee from the wrath to come, and then seven or eight more came to me in London, and desired me to advise and pray with them. More and more then desired to meet with them till they were increased to many hundreds. The case was afterwards the same at Bristol, Kingswood, Newcastle and many other parts of England. It may be observed the desire was on their part not on mine. My desire was to live and die in retirement. But I did not see that I could refuse them my help and be guiltless before God." * * * The same unconsciousness of any guiding intention to do some great thing is to be found in his account of the beginning of the Wesleyan Ministry. "After a time a young man came, T. Maxfield, and said he desired to help me as a son in the Gospel. Soon afterwards a second, Thomas Richards, and a third, Thomas Westall. These severally desired to serve me as sons, and to labor when and where I should direct. Observe, these likewise desired me, not them. But I durst not refuse their assistance."

The Apostle Paul had a mission to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles. But it was such a mission as every minister truly called of Christ has; and there is no evidence that he felt possessed of a mission to the churches or the world, which so attached to him that it could not be shared by "Sosthenes and Timothy." He had a conception of the calling of a minister which was singular in its loftiness. After these great spirits have passed away, and the world awakens to the impress which they have made upon its history, there comes forth in greater or less distinctness the design which God had in raising them up.

Fanaticism, however, has an immense consciousness of itself and its "Mission." The idolatry of an idea, as that of Robespierre, Dominic, Loyola and the Fifth Monarchists, constituted the moving impulse of these great characters. They had that personal self-devotion which worships the creature of its own devices, which offers in sacrifice the best parts of man before the ideal form of his own fanaticism; which hesitates at no act, however offensive to God or hurtful to man, which may subserve the all-dominant conceit. So the high-pressure New England Fanatic consists of two parts—self and a corporate-self, having one conscience and one quasi conscience—and the first part is held in strict subjection to the second. And in this dwells the idea of "his mission."

The notion of royal destiny was too much for Hazael; he murdered his master to accomplish his "mission." The great English dramatist was true to nature when he delineates the effect of the witch's salutation:

"All hail Macbeth, that shall be King hereafter."

The whole movement of that grand tragedy is but the conceit of a "mission" working itself out through murder to a throne.

God, therefore, wisely hides from all his real instruments for good the great purposes which may be involved in their lives. To "fear God and keep His commandments" is mission enough for any man. To preach the Gospel in the most unheroic and earnest method is a sufficient end for a minister or a church—"for we preach not ourselves, but Jesus Christ the Lord, and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake."

What true "mission" forsooth has the Presbyterian, or the Episcopal, or the Baptist, or the Lutheran Church? What distinctive design can be positively affirmed of either that is not common to the Church of the New Testament? What other can there possibly be than that which the Savior announced when he ordained the Ministry?

So long as we are this side of the Millenium, the church that preaches only the Gospel will need no other mark of distinction. The world, the flesh and the devil will sufficiently "differentiate" themselves from all that is holy. The Catholic Church, the Greek Church, Newmanism and all other forms of error, and Ecclesiastical corruption, furnish background enough to the positive purity and simplicity of the true Church of Christ.

If to seek importance in the filthy ways of political preferment constitutes "a mission," then ours is certainly gone. If by formal Episcopal deputation to the President the political power of the church is claimed, and insisted upon as an essential element in the country, as the true way to conserve and maintain "the mission" of the church, then ours is hopeless. If it be necessary to "commit fornication with the kings of the earth" to support "our mission," then it must perish. But what shall we say of a church which claims to be Christian, but which, under the plea of "loyalty," drapes itself in the country's ensign, wraps it around the pulpit until the preacher can barely be seen peering through this symbol of earth, and which, with the lust of the ecclesiastical whore of the Apocalypse, is only less scarlet in its clothing because there is no more of the color in the banner! Such a church, whatever may be its grief over the misfortunes of others, has assuredly found "a mission" of its own—one not easily lost, which will cleave to its form as the robe and crown of Medea.

Rev. Marcus L. Wood.—Letters from this devoted missionary to China from the Southern Methodist Church, will be found in another column. To this appeal we hope some response will be made. We have not published it earlier, because we knew the peeled condition of our people, and their inability to give much help. We knew the letter would afflict them.

But to-day we have sent to China to our dear friend £497 18 0, being the second of the first mailed a short time ago by the beloved and laborious Missionary Secretary of the Church, Rev. Dr. Schon. How he raised it, or where, we do not know. But he did raise it, and it has gone to relieve that distant post. The Doctor will, undoubtedly, give an account of all this to the General Conference.

Let the liberality of the South abound in her great poverty, and the Head of the Church will smile upon her.

Rev. Mr. Wood has had the affliction of burying his wife in that distant field. For the sake of her children, and his own heart, he desires to secure memorials of his sainted mate. Many ladies in North Carolina, who read this journal, can furnish us with facts and sketches of her life, as student and teacher in Greenboro College. Let this be done promptly.—Watchman.

OUR CHURCH NAME

I notice that a good deal has been said of late in relation to our ecclesiastical cognomen—or rather its appendage, South—and perhaps the matter is not wholly unimportant.

The assumption of this appendage at first, was of a piece with every other act of our history, which evinces good faith in every particular of our conduct toward the Northern church. We agreed in the beginning to regard that church as the legitimate Methodist body within certain territorial limits, while we were to be held and treated as such within other specified limits. At least this was the spirit of the compact. We honestly avowed the fact in our very "style and title."

There are several reasons why we regard this word "South," as a part of our name, with affection. Not the least of those reasons is, that it stands as a historical monument of our candor and good faith. By the stipulations of the "Plan of Separation," we were the Methodist Episcopal Church in the South, and we at once denominated ourselves, The Methodist Episcopal Church South.

Besides this, facts have made our name suggestive, and conferred upon it a meaning not embraced in its original import. It has not only a local signification, but is also expressive of the great principles of Southern Methodism! It expresses the inviolability of constitutional provisions. It expresses anti-fanaticism. It means that the Bible is true and its dicta supreme in the face of all theories of social advancement whatever. It means all that with emphasis. It is a grand historical protest against every theory that disparages the Bible as a standard of good morals and philanthropy, and against all high-handed violations of a constitutional guarantee. Those who are familiar with the history of the separation will understand this.

Even if the name should be altered, we can't spare its present form out of our history. It belongs to just that part of our history which must ever be grateful to an honorable Christian mind. It is of that species of history that has a most wholesome effect on every mind which comes under its influence.

The tone of any community is taken very much from its history, and the history that is in that word "South," as it stands connected with our denominational appellation, must elevate and ennoble the character of our intelligent members in all time to come. We must be false to our most cherished traditions, if we ever come to be a bigoted or fanatical sect, if we ever turn politicians, or if we ever dishonor the holy Scriptures by making their authority in any matter of no effect by human traditions, or the wisdom of a self-confident and vain philosophy.

It is repugnant to my sentiments to give up the inscription upon our banner, which has floated high for more than twenty years, an object of admiration to millions, and a symbol of truth, and honor and faith. Yet, certainly, there are grave reasons now for a change. A thousand outrageous violations of the solemn compact which restrained us from enlargement upon our northern frontier, by the Northern church; violations not only habitually and shamelessly made, but also gloried in, have long since released us from its obligations, and the gravest reasons call upon us now, at this momentous period, to carry a pure gospel to those who "sit in the region and shadow of" fanaticism. We ought not to persist in bearing a name which will hereafter convey a false notion of our geographical position. This is the only reason, as I conceive, for a change.—But this will be considered, I presume, decisive of the question. We have been conserving the pure principles of Methodism not only for ourselves, but for this whole nation. And now that the time of enlargement has arrived, we must assume a national designation.

I do not feel very solicitous as to what the new form of our name shall be. I have seen two or three suggested, to which I have no special objection. But I will venture, too, to offer a name. It can do no harm, if it does no good. Why should not our official cognomen be simply The Church?

I imagine I see some nervous brother stand up, exclaiming, "what! repudiate the time-honored and God-honored appellation of Methodist?" Well, no, brother; I would not repudiate. We should still be designated by that term in popular phrase. We would continue to talk about ourselves as Methodists, and everybody else would do so too.

But ought we not to have an official designation which would distinguish us from all other Christian bodies? I know of no other organization styled The Church. It is a title left to us.

But would it not be an act of presumption, as if we assumed to be the church—the only church? This is really the only objection I can see to it. It might tend to foster an exclusive spirit. But our history would be a safeguard in that direction. The spirit of all our teaching on the subject is adverse to the spirit of bigotry.—For these reasons I think we might safely adopt the name.

It has long seemed to me that it were a desirable thing that adjectives should be dispensed with in the name of a church.—I know it is an intricate subject, in reference to which much may be said on both sides. Are not qualifying and limiting appellatives below the dignity of a church? The question is worthy of thought, at least. We need not disparage those churches that choose to adopt them; but is there any need that we should so trammel ourselves, now that the occasion invites the revision of our name? The Church! There is a simple dignity in it well suited to a Christian organization.—When a church announces a more specific and descriptive title, it seems in the very act to assume a pugilistic attitude. It is a sort of tacit challenge to every man who may question the peculiarity intimated in the name. Take, for instance, any of the existing churches. The Methodist Episcopal Church—The Protestant Episcopal Church. They seem to throw down the gauntlet at once to all who may question the Episcopal form of church administration. The name Baptist invites you to a rencontre upon the subject of ordinances. Roman Catholic challenges you to acknowledge the Primacy of the Bishop of Rome.

But would this title express the truth? Would we be The Church? To the extent of our organization, we are the church. And if we choose to take this primitive title, who has a right to object? Its primitive simplicity and dignity recommend it. And I do verily believe the effect upon character would be good. It would foster large-hearted Christian sentiment amongst a people habituated to look generously upon other churches. It could tend to foster bigotry only in connection with exclusive teachings. This, I trust, the Methodist people are not in danger of.

I have no visionary anticipations of charming all the world into one church by the magic of a name. I scarcely think it desirable that all Christian people should be collected into a single organization.—The true unity is in faith and spirit, and not in external consolidation. It may be that variety in outward form is necessary to adapt the influence of the church to all varieties of human thought and sentiment. But the churches ought to get as near to each other as they possibly can. Even cognominal barriers should be as slight as possible. Suppose we drop every thing, then, suggestive of controversy, and fall back upon the primitive designation which I have suggested.

I am not, however, tenacious upon this subject, and shall be perfectly satisfied with any action the General Conference may decide upon. The question is not vital. If we maintain the spirit and attitude of catholicity, the name, though it be not the best, will not, perhaps, be seriously detrimental.

I sometimes feel as if it were somewhat officious in me to be making so many suggestions upon the eve of the meeting of the General Conference. I am well aware that I have no special claim to be heard, and that my views have no special title to regard. But my church is dear to me. I have thought much and felt much in reference to her welfare. And, it may not be out of place to add, that I write in response to solicitation from a quarter not despicable. I offer my views, not from any want of confidence in the wisdom of the Conference, but simply to contribute my "two mites" to the treasury of thought at this most important juncture in our history.

I will venture a thought upon one other topic only. I am not sure that it is best for the church to carry on large business operations. The business of publishing both papers and books might be in secular hands. The editing ought certainly to be under the supervision of the church. But let laymen do the business. They will carry it on gladly for the profit. The extensive patronage of the church will make it profitable even at a small per cent. Then we shall habituate the people to the idea that all our church enterprises are to be maintained by voluntary contribution.—This very fact will school them to liberality. It will greatly simplify our conference deliberations if this principle be adopted. They will be devoted to purely spiritual and evangelical sentiments. Is not this a thing to be desired?

"THE METHODIST."

Mr. Editor—By your permission, we wish to submit a few remarks to the readers of the Advocate, in regard to an editorial essay in the New York Methodist, of the 24th ult., anticipating and laboring to expose the probable proceedings of the General Conference of the Methodist E. Church South, which is to convene in your city the 4th inst.

But, first in order, we desire to call up some of the antecedents of "The Methodist." We received the first number of said paper in exchange, and gave it a favorable passport to public patronage. It courted Southern favor and patronage; under assurances that it would assume no policy and avow no principles which would be injurious or offensive to Southern people. In short, the title, "Methodist," was presented in a light which implied the idea that it was a sort of umpire sheet—filling the space, the untenable chasm between the separate and distinct branches of the Methodist family. And being in receipt of its weekly visits until the earth began to tremble, by reason of the national agitation which convulsed our land, the departures from the standard of its own erection were frequently observable—its "columns wavered," and its "flank movements" were very perceivable. Indeed, we regarded it as having early departed from its voluntary promises and pledges in the premises; and when the Southern Methodist organs, one by one silently sank under the darkness which overshadowed them, "The Methodist" shouted for joy. This spirit was not only antagonistic to the spirit and principles of our common Christianity, but was regarded as evidence of the final violation of every pledge of Methodistic fraternity—so far as "The Methodist" was concerned. Therefore, when "The Methodist" assumes the character of dictator to and for our General Conference, its assumptions and declarations cannot be regarded or received as the counsels of a friend.

"The Methodist," laboring to impose an error upon the public mind, reaches the conclusion, from assumed and false premises, that "the mission of the Church South is at an end. It has had its day." Again, it is affirmed, that "this Church has failed in its life work;" and now the voice of Providence, the logic of events, the sentiment of mankind, force upon it the choice to return to that portion of Christ's kingdom from which it separated, or to disband."

First, the "logic" and arguments employed prove too much for the author's cause. If true, as affirmed, that the "mission" of the Southern Church was to sustain and perpetuate slavery, it is impliedly and as certainly true, that the "mission" of the Northern division of the Methodist Church was to abolish the institution of slavery. In the opinion of the author, that object having been accomplished, the "mission" of the M. E. Church has expired—"The Methodist" being the judge. This being a fact, according to their own showing, we will not assume the right to dictate a line of policy to be adopted and pursued by the Methodist E. Church; we leave them to their own election. Only allowing them the right to define and limit their own ecclesiastical "mission," as set forth in the foregoing; but disclaiming their right to define ours.

As "The Methodist" has pledged itself to keep its readers advised in regard to the proceedings of "the Southern Methodist General Conference," we may be permitted to suggest that accurately published proceedings will, in all probability, reflect more credit upon the body than the anticipated conjectures of the editor.

If the Southern Methodist General Conference may be found still standing and acting upon a living "mission," under evidences of a Divine commission, that body may repeat the ancient Methodistic chorus of the song of the dying saint, "all is well!" And we feel safe in authorizing the editor to notify his readers in advance, that whatever the General Conference may or may not do, they will not knock at the door of the Methodist E. Church for admission into their communion; neither will they "disband;" nor will they proceed to create a new organization. Whatever the body may find necessary to be done, will be attended to in due time and form; and their proceedings will be understood when they find their way to the light under the approval of official sanction.

Respectfully submitted, W. K.

Letter from Dr. Summers.

Mr. Editor—On last Sunday we were favored with a couple of sermons by the Rev. Simon Peter Richardson, of the Florida Conference. The sermons were admirably adapted to interest the attention and arouse the consciences of those who heard them.

In the afternoon, Brother R., as Agent of the American Bible Society, made us a speech at the Presbyterian Church, resuscitated the Bible Society of this place, and at night took up a collection in our church in aid of its objects. He assured us that the American Bible Society is bent on doing all it can to supply the destitution of the South; and from the well-known catholic and liberal spirit of this Society, I have no doubt that such is the case. I should judge, too, that Brother Richardson is well adapted to the Agency in which he is employed, and I wish him God speed.

On Sunday night I had the pleasure of admitting to the fellowship of the church two more students of the University. By the way, that word University is what you ought to have printed in my last communication, instead of "ministry." It seems queer to say, "I baptized a student of the ministry!" In the same article you make me say, "shambles" for "shanties;" "under-spread" for "wide-spread;" and "Saviour on the Mount" for "Sermon on the Mount." These types are ticklish things.* But enough of that.

The value of a well-conducted college under the patronage of our Church is immense. How strange it is that our people do not see this! How strange that parents do not send their sons to those institutions where their religious interests would be cared for, as well as their training in literature, science and art! Passing strange it is that Methodists will send their sons and daughters to seminaries that are under the management of infidels, papists, and others of not much better type, perhaps innocently imagining that their religious character will suffer no damage from the influences brought to bear upon them! Prodigious infatuation!

Our excellent brother, the Rev. J. W. McCann, a member of the Mobile Conference, residing at Newbern, nine miles from Greensboro, has had to undergo a very severe trial. On Tuesday, March 20th, his son, aged 16, was accidentally shot, his gun discharging as he was opening a gate, while on his horse. He lingered a few hours, and then died. He is said to have been a most exemplary youth—a devoted member of the church—greatly beloved by all who knew him. Though under such tragical circumstances, he left the world in peace and triumph. A large concourse of persons attended his funeral, on the 22d, most impressive services being conducted by Dr. Wightman.

The members of the Mobile Conference, and many others, will sympathize with our afflicted brother and his family in their sad bereavement. Yet it is not all sadness. When the great Bengelius was bereaved of a lovely daughter, he wrote—"Surely, when the door of Paradise is opened to let in any of our departed friends, delicious breezes blow through it upon us from that abode of blessedness. And we ought to avail ourselves of such refreshing influence; we ought to let it quicken us in following after those that have gone before us, rather than wish those friends back again to a world like this." And he reasoned well.

From the Episcopal Methodist.

Holston Conference.

Dear Brethren—That we are not ruined in Holston, not scattered to the winds, as some people seem to think, will appear from the following statistics, furnished me by the Secretary of our last Conference.—It may be proper to state that there may be some inaccuracies, but it is believed the numbers given do not exceed our real strength—perhaps fall below it:—

Traveling preachers, members of Conference	83
White members in full connection	38,742
Whites (members) on probation	6,474
Colored members	3,904
Local preachers	342
Total	49,550

The "Athens Conference" of the Methodist Episcopal Church (North) reports a membership of 6494.—Fifteen preachers, once members of the Holston Conference, "adhered North." Where the rest came from I don't know. Some were transferred it is said, but what this means I am at a loss to comprehend. When these "transfers" took place, there was no Holston Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in existence, and they were certainly not transferred to the Holston Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. The "so-called" Holston Conference was organized by Bishop Clark out of these "transfers," and the few "faithful" who left us. Many—how many, I have no means of knowing—of the 6,494 composing the "elect" membership were, perhaps, also "transfers;" but from what region of the earth, I know not.

We are constantly admonished by our friends—for they say they love us very dearly, bad as some of us are—that the Southern Methodist Church must go down; that as slavery, the only ground of difference between us and the "Mother Church," and our main support, has been removed, we must necessarily cease to exist—must go the way of all things useless. This alarming prediction has frightened some of our "feeble folk" into the belief that we are already actually sinking, and that the best thing they can do is to crawl on board the "old ship," which benevolently sends its boats to rescue them. "What is the use," they say, "of remaining in connexion with a Church that is doomed to speedy extinction? It must go down. You have nothing to lose by coming to us—you peril all by staying where you are." Foolish and false as all this is, it has its influence on many minds, and in many places is the only argument used to lead away our people. It has been asserted that a majority of our people, and the leading ministers within the bounds of our Conference, had gone over to the Northern Methodist Church. This story has deceived many. It has done us harm with those who knew no better. In the towns, and in the districts where the true state of things is understood, we have not suffered; but in the country, where the people are not so well posted, considerable disaffection exists, and whole congregations have gone off. I do not know of a single town in Southwestern Virginia, in which a Northern Methodist congregation has been organized, but several in the country districts. Our preachers ought to look after this thing, and furnish the people with the facts in the case.

Our numbers are daily increasing. Gracious revivals are refreshing and strengthening the Church in various portions of our work. Our hearts and hands are being strengthened. The Lord is with us, and this, above all things else, encourages and comforts us. If we cleave to him, and walking in humility and purity of life before him, are careful to maintain good works, all things will work together for our good. I hope we are willing that God should judge, and deal with us according to his own blessed will. He is trying us by fire, but it is not for our destruction, but for our purification. God grant us grace according to our day and trials!

Selah.

An Infant Voice.—An agent of the American Bible Society received and forwarded the beautiful expression which follows: "Brother Herr, please receive the money in this box for the Bible and Missionary Societies. For several years my good pa and ma have been giving me little pieces of money to do good with, which I have dropped in this box till it now counts up five dollars, and I want you to take three dollars to send the Bible to the heathen in China, and two dollars to send the good missionary to tell the heathen of Jesus. I hope the Lord will accept and bless this small gift, coming from a little girl, (six years) and help me to do more the next time."

a Memorial from the members of the Quarterly Conference of Tuskegee Station, Montgomery Conference, M. E. Church South. At the second Quarterly Conference of said Station for 1865, the following principal changes were recommended: Providing a Bishop for each annual Conference; removing all restrictions from the appointing power, and that the preacher should be subject to annual reappointment; Lay representation in the General Conference; and so far as Lay service can be rendered useful to the Church in the Annual Conferences; also, quarterage and allowance for support of preachers, and the several congregations to fix the amount of salary; continuance of Conference collections and the appropriation of the proceeds to the benefit of preachers inadequately supported on their circuits or stations, and to superannuated ministers; the abrogation of the probationary system; opposition to permanent certificates of church membership; class meetings to be regarded as a privilege, and not held as a test of membership; and favoring family sittings in churches.

Rev. J. B. Cottrell, of Alabama, moved the reference of the report to the Committee on Revisals.

After a protracted discussion, by Rev. Dr. Lee, Dr. Smith of Virginia, Rev. Dr. Myers of Georgia, Rev. Levi Pearce, and Dr. Marshall of Mississippi, Rev. Dr. Green of Tennessee, Rev. Dr. Rush, Rev. Dr. Deems of North Carolina, Rev. Dr. Edwards of Virginia, and Rev. Dr. McFerrin of Tennessee, without arriving at any definite action in regard to the matter under discussion, on motion of Rev. Dr. McFerrin, the General Conference adjourned at 9 o'clock next morning.

THIRD DAY.

FRIDAY, April 6, 1866.

The Conference met at 9 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by Bishop Hubbard H. Kavanaugh.

Rev. Dr. Wm. A. Smith opened the exercises by reading the 78th Psalm, which was followed by the singing of the 951st Hymn.

Prayer by Rev. Dr. Wm. A. Smith.

Bishop Paine took the chair directly after the journal was read.

The names of the delegates from the Baltimore Conference were called by the Secretary, and the following were present:

Samuel Register, Norval Wilson, Samuel Roszell, John S. Martin, R. Voitch and William G. Eggerton.

Bishop Early introduced the delegates, stated that he had taken the early of admitting the Baltimore Annual Conference into the M. E. Church South, and wished the delegates to be received by this General Conference.

Rev. Dr. Doggett, of Virginia: I move the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved by the General Conference of the M. E. Church South, in Conference assembled, That we approve of the action of Bishop Early in admitting the Baltimore Annual Conference into the M. E. Church South, and that we cordially receive and recognize the delegates elect from that Conference as members of the General Conference of the M. E. Church South, now in session in the city of New Orleans.

I suppose no question will be raised as to the validity of this action, and therefore nothing is required in vindication of it at this stage of our session. I was present on the occasion, acting in the capacity of a fraternal messenger from the Virginia Conference to that Conference. I never witnessed a scene that made a greater impression on my mind than the solemn, deliberate action of that body in the unanimous vote to adhere to the M. E. Church South. I observed the most deliberate action in all their measures. They had calculated the whole step; they took into consideration all the sacrifices and labors which might have appalled them under ordinary circumstances, and met the emergency fairly and bravely, and I personally hail it as an important acquisition to our membership. It is a Conference of great weight, great integrity and great piety, as I honestly believe. In having acted in the capacity to which I have referred, I feel it my duty to offer the resolution which I have taken the liberty to present for the deliberation of this General Conference, and I hope it will be unanimously adopted.

Rev. Mr. Wilson, of the Baltimore Conference: The action to which Dr. Doggett has referred was taken with great unanimity. There was not a dissenting voice in the Conference, and yet, perhaps, we are not entitled to all the credit that he attaches to that action. There is something resembling a necessity resting upon us; we could not have done otherwise without falsifying our pledges. As far back as 1845 we had given solemn pledges to our people that we would not allow questions to be agitated in our midst that would disturb the tranquility of the church within our bounds; that if such questions should be agitated and such action attempted on the part of the church with which we were then in connection, or that General Conference, we would sever our connection with it. Such action was taken in May, 1860. As men of veracity and as men of honor, we were bound to adhere to our pledges given in 1845, and repeated time and again afterwards. There was a necessity of our action. Why any man or class of men who were associated with us in giving those pledges should afterwards trample them under foot and take a different course, I never could comprehend, and cannot to this day. When the question came up, after due deliberation, I was glad then and I am glad now to assert that there was not a dissenting voice. [Applause.] It was taken with perfect unanimity, and the brethren, with the greatest cordiality imaginable, transferred their relationship to the M. E. Church South, with a firm conviction that at this time that church embodies more true primitive Methodism, as well as more vital and real Christianity, than any other of the Wesleyan bodies on this continent. We are rejoiced to be in your midst; we have traveled far and labored much to get here, but we feel compensated already by being permitted to associate with you this morning, and on receiving these hearty and cordial greetings. [Applause.]

Rev. Dr. Deems of the North Carolina Conference: I beg leave to second the resolution offered by my friend, the Rev. Dr. Dogget, of the Virginia Conference. I do not know how other brethren feel, but there are many things of late that have endeared the church of my choice to me even more than ever before. One thing is this; that the M. E. Church South in the last five years has been subject to such a strain as never was imposed upon the Church of Christ since the time of the early Apostles, to this day, and that the hearts of many of us feared and trembled for the result of this prodigious trial. Now, sir, at the end of this ordeal what hath not God wrought? When I came into this assembly and beheld our Bishops in their places, with sweet precious greetings from our venerable senior Bishop; when I see our conferences represented so largely, all our business going on so regularly, the presidents of our colleges and universities here, editors of divers of our newspapers here, and the whole machinery of the church in such successful operation, I, for one, feel there is no precariousness in the position of Southern Methodism now. And as though God intended to give us the crowning blessing whatever may have been our personal difficulties heretofore, he has rendered us forgiving and loving towards one another. He has added to the number of our members these blessed brethren who have come here from the Baltimore Conference. I was started in my educational career, by one of the fathers of this delegation here to-day, and many are the memories and religious associations of former years that have been awakened in my heart by their presence among us. My heart is right glad to-day, and I love every Bishop and member of this General Conference more than I ever did before, and I ask these brethren to let us love them so also. [Applause.] I beg that you will allow us to pass Dr. Dogget's resolution with a rising vote.

The resolution was then passed unanimously amid much enthusiasm, all the members of the Conference rising to their feet.

By request, leave was then granted to the Baltimore Conference to retire for the purpose of making nominations for the committees.

The following delegates, arrived since the session of yesterday, were announced, and after presenting their certificates took their seats as members of the General Conference.

Kentucky Conference—R. Hiner, Joseph Rand, and E. Johnson.

Rio Grande Conference—John W. Devilbiss.

Pacific Conference—W. R. Guber.

Louisville Conference—Albert H. Redford.

Mobile Conference—Robert K. Hargrove.

Montgomery Conference—H. N. McTyeire.

Virginia Conference—L. Rosser and P. A. Peterson, who reported yesterday, but were accidentally omitted from the list.

The Kentucky Conference announced the following selections for standing committees: Episcopacy, Robert Hiner; Itinerancy, E. Johnson; Revisals, L. D. Houston; Missions, E. Johnson; Books and Periodicals, R. Hiner; Education, L. D. Houston; Sunday Schools, Joseph Rand; Boundaries, Joseph Rand; Colored People, Joseph Rand.

Bishop Early—I have the pleasure of introducing to the Conference Rev. Thos. B. Sargent, of the East Baltimore Conference.

Rev. Thos. B. Sargent—I wish to correct the Bishop. Late of the East Baltimore Conference, but now no longer. I have come home, sir, to stay home. I have been longing after home for many, many, years, and I feel now that I am at home, and if God permits me, I will stay at home until I go to a better home. I never could come to this home until now. I have been always like Abraham still journeying towards the South, and I am happy at last to have arrived there. [Applause.]

Bishop Early then introduced to the Conference Rev. John Poisall, of the Baltimore Conference, who spoke as follows: Allow me, brethren, to express the sincere and undissembled satisfaction which I feel is meeting you here to-day. I am here under similar circumstances to those just referred to by my good brother, Dr. Sargent. I am not here to address you—I have no speech to make—I am a very modest, unpretending man, and simply refer you to my past life as a Methodist preacher. Perhaps, if it were proper, it would not be uninteresting to some of my brethren, to refer to the peculiar pressure under which I was impelled to tender my resignation as pastor of a church in one of our Northern Conferences. But it is not proper to refer to circumstances of this description. For a period of more than 37 years I have had an honored place in one of the Conferences of the M. E. Church. At a very early period of my life I was received into the fold of that one. That is the Conference of my home. In the progress of our busy Itinerancy, by my revered and honored friend, Bishop Soule, when yet a young man, I was transferred to the New York Conference. I was there for ten years, all told, first and last. Under the very trying ordeal, far from my home, removed from my cherished field of labor, I was impelled to offer my resignation as pastor of the Bedford Street church, in the City of New York. I left many friends there. The simple issue with me was this; I could not turn my back upon my father, I could not consent to be a party to the war. I was willing, with the blessing of God, under the guidance of that good Providence that had watched over me and mine, and taken care of our beloved Methodism in the Southern States and Conferences, to link my fortunes with her's, and without a church, and without an income, I tendered my resignation and left the people of my church. Parting with them in good faith, and receiving expressions of confidence and friendship. At this moment, I have the satisfaction of knowing, that however unpretentious in other respects I may be, I have the treasure of a consistent record. I feel here to-day, Mr. President and esteemed brethren, although very much embarrassed at this distinction of a formal introduction—I feel, I say, at home. I have the pleasure of knowing some of the Bishops and members of this General Conference personally. I tender to you for this friendly greeting, my most earnest prayers to God that His blessing may rest upon this body in your deliberations, and that Methodism in your hands, through the instrumentality of these ministers, may continue pure and primitive until the great mission we are called upon to perform shall have been accomplished. I thank you for this indulgence, and the brethren for their very cordial reception.

Rev. Dr. Mitchell, of the Mobile Conference, moved that the two brethren just introduced be cordially invited to seats within the bar during the session of the General Conference. Agreed to.

Rev. Dr. Duncan, of the Virginia Conference, read an address from the Bishops to the General Conference.

ADDRESS OF THE BISHOPS.

Dear Brethren: We hail with feelings of devout gratitude the opening of another session of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Circumstances connected with the late unhappy war have prevented us from an earlier meeting; and now that we are permitted by Divine Providence to assemble, the important interests that will engage our attention demand that, with all sobriety and prayerfulness, we address ourselves to their consideration.

We have to review the operations of the Church for eight years—embracing a period during which important and startling events have crowded on each other in rapid succession. When the last General Conference closed, we anticipated an earlier reunion, in this city; but the well known condition of things, at the time appointed in regular order for our meeting, precluded our convening here. And ever since, until within the last few months, it has been deemed impracticable to call the Conference together. When it was definitely decided that the Conference could not meet at the proper time and place, there being no law in the Discipline authorizing the Bishops to convene the General Conference, and the state of the country also being such as to render it doubtful whether any considerable number of the preachers could be collected together for the purpose of holding such a session if called, the Bishops, feeling the importance of wise counsel in the emergency, published a card inviting a meeting of the Bishops, Book Committee and others, to consult together on divers important subjects connected with the immediate interests of the church. Such a meeting was held, first at Atlanta, Ga.; afterwards at Macon, Ga.; and then at Montgomery, Ala. In August last the Bishops alone met for consultation at Columbus, Ga. These various meetings were seasons of interest and profit to those who attended them, and the results of our deliberations, as exhibited in the resolutions which we published, tended greatly, as we have reason to believe, to promote the peace and prosperity of the church.

In order that the character of those meetings may be clearly appreciated, we would remind you that when they were called it was distinctly stated that all the acts of such meetings would be simply advisory. We disclaimed all authority to take any action that should be binding on the church, only as it might be approved as wise and godly. We gave such advice as we judged best for the church in her straitened circumstances. If the Annual Conferences approved it, then they acted, in accordance with their own convictions; if not, then they simply took their own course in all matters that came before them, without reference to our advice. It is for the General Conference to decide whether we transcended our authority in convening such advisory councils.

Early during the war the Bishops had to confine their episcopal visitations to the territory east of the Mississippi river. This we deeply regretted, but in our circumstances it was unavoidable. The consequence was that the Conferences west of the Mississippi were deprived of episcopal supervision during nearly the whole period of the war. We would not, however, fail to mention in this connection, that Bishop Kavanaugh, residing as he did within the Federal lines, was able to visit the Missouri, the St. Louis and the two Kentucky Conferences, and was also able to extend his visitations to the California work. The rest of the Bishops were able to extend their labors to various parts of the work within the Confederate lines. Notwithstanding the fact that our episcopal supervision of the work has been necessarily partial, we are gratified to believe that the preachers have been faithful generally to the interest of the church of God. With but very few exceptions, the Annual Conferences have been regularly held. The Presiding Elders and Preachers have filled their appointments as of old; and, with humble gratitude to God, we mention the fact that during the trying years through which we have passed gracious revivals of religion among our people have attested how the Divine presence has been with us.

We do not attempt in this brief address to enter into a detailed account of the general state of the work. Thank God that we have so safely passed through a most painful and fiery ordeal; that the church has preserved under His blessing her integrity; that she has in no wise become complicated with political affairs; but keeping in view her own high mission, has been satisfied to perform her legitimate duties.

It is proper to state to you that we found it, in our judgment, needful to the interest of the work to depart in some respects from the strict letter of the law of the church in our episcopal administration. Extraordinary exigencies required us to take this responsibility. In the journals of the annual conferences which will come before you the particular instances in which we have judged it best to assume this grave responsibility will appear. In all such instances we wish it understood that we do not regard such departure from the law as establishing precedents for future guidance, but only as illustrating how extraordinary exigences may make it necessary to transcend the provisions of even the most wholesome human regulations. From this experience, however, the General Conference may find suggestions that are valuable to guide it in providing as far as practicable for contingencies in the future.

It would have been gratifying to us if we had been able to bear the expense of more extensive travel through the work; but in the impoverished state of the church, and especially in the absence of any provision for more than a bare support of the Bishops, this was impossible. This fact, we hope, will be suggestive to your body.

In August last, we deemed it prudent to issue a "Pastoral Address to the Preachers and Members of the Church," reminding them of their duty as Christian citizens, and giving such advice as seemed to us appropriate to the peculiar circumstances of the times. As that address has been extensively published, we deem its formal transmission to you with this communication unnecessary, and will only ask your attention to such parts of it as we may find it proper to recapitulate on particular points at this time.

The publishing interests of the church suffered greatly in consequence of the war. The book concern will require your careful consideration, and some important changes in your plan of operations may be needful for its future efficiency; of this, however, you will be better prepared to judge when you have heard the report of the agent. With pleasure we have welcomed the revival of our church papers, and while we regard them as in a high degree creditable to the church, we would respectfully submit whether it would not be best to unite conferences in the publication of a fewer number in order that they may be better supported and still further improved.

Our missionary work, once the glory of our church, has been well high ruined. The China mission still lives, and needs your fostering care. Although the financial condition of the country at present forbids the expectation of large collections, yet we may make prospective arrangements for doing a great work in that extensive field.

The interest of the colored population should engage your serious attention. Heretofore the colored people within our bounds have deserved and received a large share of our labors. We have expended our means and strength, liberally and patiently for many years for their salvation and improvement, and if in any wise our conduct has not been appreciated by some on earth, nevertheless, our witness is on high and our reward is in heaven. It is grateful to our own feelings to know that if the colored people do not remain under our pastoral care, their departure reflects no discredit upon our labors in their behalf and is necessitated by no indifference on our part to their welfare. Many of them will probably unite with the African M. E. Church, some of them with the Northern Methodist Church, while others withstanding extraneous influences and unkind misrepresentations of our church, will remain with us.

Let us be content to leave to Providence to vindicate in due time our scriptural relation to the interest of the colored people. For those who remain with us the church should provide generously every thing important to their religious culture. Convinced that your body takes the deepest interest in this subject and will give it your special attention, we deem it only needful to speak of it in this general and suggestive form: and especially as the Bishops in their pastoral address last August brought the subject prominently to the notice of our people.

In respect to the separate and distinct organization of our church, no reasons have appeared to alter our views, as expressed in August last. No proposal of fraternal relations has come to us from others, neither do we regard ourselves as in any wise responsible for hostility evinced towards us. While the attempt to take forcible possession of our property and to disintegrate our church, declare the mind that would destroy us, let it be ours to show the mind that was in Christ. In our conscious integrity we should calmly await the inevitable hour when, in the providence of God, an enlightened public opinion will vindicate our claims as a church of God and a true type of Methodism. Let us not be impatient for our vindication before the world. The great future is before us, and the great Head of the Church smiles upon us. Our fidelity to God will most perfectly reply to the voice of defamation.

In this connection, it is with pleasure that we refer to the fact that many Christians in the North, and especially in the Northwest, sincerely sympathise with us, and this sympathy, we have reason to believe, is daily assuming a more tangible and impressive form. That there have, at the same time, been some defections in the church we care not to disguise. A very few of the whites have gone from us. This was perhaps to have been expected. Our regret is rather for them than for ourselves. But while we speak of small defections, we may refer also to most gratifying accessions. The Baltimore Annual Conference is now represented by a delegation in this body. In February last Bishop Early formally received into our ecclesiastical connection this Conference, consisting of one hundred and four ministers and a membership of twelve thousand.

It is a grateful duty to welcome these brethren among us and to commend them to the confidence and affection of our people. This is a large accession to our members and territory. It is also a testimony in our favor that is nobly borne by men whose former position and long deliberation upon the subject, as well as their known intelligence, will entitle it to special respect. In our hearts we welcome them, and cordially extend to them the right hand of fellowship.

As a fact of interest to us and of promise to our future influence we may state, that in the city of Baltimore there have been organized several flourishing churches upon an independent basis, composed of Methodists whose warm sympathies are with us, and whose liberal kindness has already contributed largely to aid us in our time of need, laying us under obligations by their love and good works.

Our Educational interests have been greatly damaged by the war, and nearly all of our male institutions have been closed. Providentially many of our female institutions have been kept in operation, and are still dispensing the blessings of sanctified education to the daughters of our land. Everything in our power should be done to revive, as speedily as possible, the male institutions under the patronage of our church.

In this connection we specially bring to your attention the importance of an institute for the proper training of young preachers. That we should make some proper arrangements for the more thorough training of our young men before they are received into the Conferences and sent forth to minister in the Church of Christ, appears to us to be so obvious as to need no argument to prove it. It behooves us to take this matter into serious and immediate consideration and secure to the church the invaluable advantages the provision we suggest can only supply.

The instruction of the children under our care, and the interest of our Sabbath School system cannot be too highly appreciated by you. Your body will, we hope, show your love for these little ones of Christ and lambs of his flock by the practical value of your action in their behalf. We think it unnecessary to enlarge on a point of such obvious and vital concern to the church. Let us remember that it is only by taking care of the children that we can take care of the future prosperity of the church.

If we are to judge from the tone of the religious press and the action of many of our conferences, great concern is felt in respect to certain changes in our economy. It is obviously unbecoming in us as Bishops to occupy any other than an impartial relation to those matters. But we take this occasion to urge upon you the importance of giving these subjects your sober and prayerful consideration. From our extensive observation of the state and wants of the church, we hesitate not to say that some improvement of our economy may be wisely undertaken at this time. Well for us if we can happily avoid extremes and do neither too little nor too much. Let us remember that while innovations are not necessarily improvements, wisdom may demand in the department of ecclesiastical expediency new applications and developments of fundamental principles. The efficiency of Methodism finds its first condition in the prevalence of deep spiritual life; and alterations in our economy are valuable as they coincide with this condition; calamitous when they ignore it. On only one of the points suggested do we regard it becoming in our position to speak directly, and that is in respect to the increase of the number of the Bishops. For such an increase as will give the church a more efficient episcopacy, we think there is an urgent necessity. The infirmities of age press heavily upon some of us and diminish our ability to answer to the demands of the work for general episcopal visitation. The great and increasing extent of our territory should be considered. We should by all means have a Bishop, for obvious reasons, residing on the Pacific coast.—And while we do not recommend a Bishop for every State or Conference, we are fully persuaded that the number of Bishops should be so increased as to enable them to be pastors of the people as well as chairmen of conferences and pastors of the preachers. If we would carry out the invaluable plan of our itinerant general superintendency, we must have an addition of a number of vigorous, active, and pious men to your present college of Bishops.

And now, dear brethen, in conclusion, allow us affectionately to remind you of the solemn responsibility that rests upon you as delegates representing the affairs of our beloved Zion. We have only suggested in outline some of the work before you. It is your province to go fully and thoroughly into the particular consideration of the subjects within your jurisdiction, avoiding all partizan feeling, discharging from our minds all prejudices that would cloud our judgments, rising above all private and selfish impulses, humbly invoking that wisdom that is from above, which is pure and peaceable, and gentle; in honor preferring one another; in brotherly kindness and charity, and with an eye single to the glory of God; let us endeavor to do our duty here as ministers of the Lord Jesus Christ, praying God that we may have grace to edify the church, that we may rejoice that we have not labored in vain in the Lord.

J. O. ANDREWS,
R. PAINE,
J. EARLY,
H. H. KAVANAUGH.

Bishops J. Soule and G. F. Pierce were absent.

On vote, the address was referred to the Publishing Committee, with the order that it should be printed as they should decide.

After some discussion concerning the proper committees to whom the address should be referred, carried on by Rev. Dr. Wightman, of Alabama, Rev. Dr. Smith, of South Carolina, Bishop Kavanaugh, of Kentucky, Rev. Dr. Marshall, of Mississippi, Rev. Mr. Pearce, of Mississippi, Rev. Dr. Pinckard, of Missouri, and Rev. Dr. McFerrin, of Tennessee, a motion to refer the address to the appropriate standing committees was adopted.

Bishop Paine then introduced to the Conference Rev. Dr. Palmer, the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of this city.

Rev. Dr. Palmer responded as follows:

Mr. President—I take the liberty of extending, on behalf of the Christian people of this city, to yourself and the venerable body over which you preside, our hearty salutation. We welcome you to the midst of us with the prayer of God's blessing upon your deliberations; we are colaborers in the great cause of extending the kingdom of our beloved Master. May His spirit guide you in all your deliberations and aid you in building up the cause of Christ in the waste and desert places.

Rev. Dr. Keener announced that Rev. Dr. Baldwin, of Tennessee, would preach in the Carondelet Street M. E. Church South, in the evening.

Rev. Dr. Baldwin said that he was quite unwell—suffering from an attack of pneumonia—and hoped the Conference would excuse him from the performance of that duty.

The request of the Rev. Dr. Baldwin was granted.

Rev. Dr. Summers said that Rev. Dr. Myers had been authorized by him, at the last Conference, to act as Assistant Secretary. Brother Myers thought that he had rather injured his hand by editorial labors, and he was, inclined to think the same way. We want a person who can write a good hand, and if the Baltimore Conference could spare Brother Martin, he would be pleased to have him elected as an Assistant Secretary also.

On motion of Rev. Dr. Deems, Rev. Dr. Myers and Rev. Mr. Martin were elected as Assistant Secretaries.

Rev. Dr. Summers said that he had found it necessary to get another journal, and had procured a good substantial book for the second volume of the journal.

Rev. Dr. McFerrin, of the Committee on Publication, presented the following report, which was adopted:

The committee appointed upon the publication of the "GENERAL CONFERENCE DAILY" respectfully present the following report, and recommend—

1. That the "Daily" be published at the office of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, as proposed by the Publishing Committee of that paper.

2. That a stenographic report be made of the proceedings of the Conference.

3. That to defray the expenses of the publishing, the members of the Conference be requested to subscribe for two copies each of the "Daily," and that the cost of the reporting be defrayed by the branch of the publishing house in this city.

(Signed) J. C. KEENER,
E. H. MYERS,
J. B. MCFERRIN.

Rev. Dr. McFerrin presented a report from the Book Agent, which was read, and on motion referred to the committee on Books and Periodicals, and ordered to be published in the "Daily Advocate."

Rev. Dr. Abbey, Financial Secretary, presented a report of his connection with the Publishing House at Nashville during the past eight years, and especially during the late war, during which he had the immediate charge of it.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Deems, the report was referred to the Committee on Books and Periodicals.

Rev. Dr. McFerrin moved that the report of the Secretary of the Missionary Society, which was read yesterday, be published in the "Daily Advocate." Agreed to.

Rev. Dr. Keener stated, that by an oversight the publication of the names of the standing committees of the Mobile Conference had been omitted in the Daily Advocate report of the proceedings of the General Conference. These mistakes are inevitable, and will occur occasionally. Rev. Dr. Kenuedy has kindly consented to attend to any errata, and all mistakes made in the report published in the Daily Advocate will be duly corrected.

The following were announced as the chairmen of the several standing committees:

Episcopacy, W. M. Wightman; Itinerancy, L. M. Lee; Books and Periodicals, D. R. McAnally; Boundaries, J. Hamilton; Missions, L. Rosser; Revisals, Thomas O. Summers; Sunday Schools, John E. Edwards; Education, David S. Doggett; Colored People, J. E. Evans.

Rev. Dr. Wightman moved that the Conference adjourn—which was agreed to.

After a benediction by Bishop Paine, the Conference adjourned, to meet again at 9 o'clock, A. M., to-morrow.

LETTERS FROM CHINA.

YANGCHOW, China, Aug. 23, 1865.

My Dear Brother Deems—I am exceedingly anxious to hear from my brethren of the North Carolina Conference, and from friends generally. You are one of two or three of the preachers who have written me a line since I came to China; and will you not write me again a long letter about every thing?

I saw a list of the appointments of the preachers of our last Conference in a number of the N. C. C. Advocate, sent me by Mr. Yates, from Geneva. I missed the names of Heflin and D. W. Dunn. How is that? Have they gone to their reward?

But my main object in writing is to speak of another matter. I do not know Dr. Schon's address, and I scarcely know how to reach the Board by letter. I write to Bishop Early this mail, hoping, through him, to get a hearing; but I wish also to speak to you, to my brethren in North Carolina, and to my friends. My words shall be words of earnestness, words of hope, words of faith, words of love. I am in earnest, because my case is urgent; because our mission needs help; because the work of God in these ends of the earth should have aid and comfort. I do not think that my brethren and friends have forgotten me. I believe they still pray for me, and for the cause in which I am engaged. But a man cannot live on the prayers of others, any more than he can live by bread alone. He must have something more material. To speak plainly, we want money, and we want it immediately. We have managed to get on thus far without getting the mission in debt any of consequence, but we cannot do it longer. The time has come, if we do not get aid from the Board, or from friends, when we shall be under the necessity of mortgaging the mission to get food and raiment. Our resources are not what they were when times were flourishing in China, and money was plenty, and when our number was small. We have all done and are still doing what we could to keep the mission afloat, and prosecute our work. We have great reason to be grateful and to rejoice that we have succeeded as well as we have. Most of our tenants have failed, and left us with but a small income, and business is so very dull, that we cannot do any thing to make money. While we are so straightened for money, our work must necessarily suffer.—Our minds and hearts are cast down—our hands are tied. We can do but very little, and that little we cannot do well.

Can any thing be done for us in North Carolina? Will the brethren and friends of missions make an effort? Will they try earnestly to send us a little money immediately? I am aware of the difficulties that surround them. But we do not ask for much now. Are there not some wealthy friends who will come to our rescue by giving, or loaning, or both? If you can do nothing for the China mission, can you not do something for me personally?

To aid the mission all I could, I have gone a little in debt myself.—I could get money without interest, which we could not do as a mission. I have some very good friends in China—a man could have no better. My great afflictions in this country have involved me in heavy expenses; and had it not been for the liberality of friends, I should have been much more embarrassed than I am. Could the mission pay me what it owes me on salary, I could free myself from debt in a day. Any thing that you may be able to do for me personally will also relieve the mission. I had rather have help for the mission, but will gladly receive it in any manner friends may desire.

I suppose I have said sufficient to induce you to act, if any thing can be done. I know you will do your best. I intend to write to other brethren soon; I cannot this mail. I think I shall write Brother Wilson the next mail. I would also write Brother Keid if I knew his address.

Let me hear from you at Shanghai. I am at this place on a short visit to see my dear little motherless children, and expect to return to Shanghai in two or three weeks. They are two fine boys, and are doing nicely. Mrs. Crawford is as near a mother to them as any one except a real mother could be. She is very fond of them; loves them dearly, and they are very fond of her.

This is a very fine climate. My children's health in general is good. For a long time I have enjoyed the best health, except a short attack of dysentery I have had since coming to Shanghai. Shanghai is remarkably healthy this year, and was comparatively so last.

Give my best love to all the brethren and friends. I hope this will meet you before the meeting of Conference. I think of you all often, and wish I could see you all again. May God be with you all to comfort you and sustain you. I will write again soon about other matters. I wrote you some months—probably a year ago, but I do not know that you received the letter. In fact, I have written you several letters since I heard from you.

With warm affection and best wishes for yourself and family, I remain your brother in Christ, and in the hope of the resurrection; praying the richest blessings of our heavenly Father to rest upon you and and yours, and all who love the Lord Jesus.

M. L. WOOD.

SHANGHAI, China, Oct. 25, 1865.

Rev. C. F. Deems, D. D.

Dear Brother—While in Yangchow a short time since, I wrote you a letter telling you how our mission is straightened for want of funds, and begging that you would do all you can to have some money sent to us. And I also stated that I would write you again soon. I would repeat that we are still in the same financial embarrassment—worse, if possible. Every thing about us is gloomy, and the future is perfectly dark. A letter from the Board, telling us what they intend doing with us, or can do for us, would do much to relieve our minds; could we only hear from friends, our hearts would be much cheered.

Can, then, nothing be done for us? I would say to you what I have said to others, if you cannot send us money, send us any thing else—flour, hams, coals, turpentine, butter; any merchandise. We can sell these things here at some price. I see turpentine advertised in the Shanghai market just from Wilmington, N. C. Send consigned to H. Fogg & Co. Our case is urgent. Aid we must have. And will not the effort be made? Made by all? Certainly some can come to our rescue.

I spent a few delightful weeks with my dear children, and left them in fair health. They were quite well when last I heard from them.

Brother Lambuth's health is very poor. He is troubled a great deal with diarrhœa. I fear he will have to leave China again. He has had worse health this summer than ever before in Shanghai.

Brother and sister Allen lost their youngest child last August. This is a very trying climate on children's health.

This portion of the Chinese empire is quiet. We scarcely ever hear of the rebels these days. They were driven off from this region by foreign skill, and foreign guns and ammunition, and by English neutrality.

Remember me kindly to all friends.

Very affectionately yours,

M. L. WOOD.

A STATESMAN'S THREAT.—The late enlightened and liberal Count Cavour, the Prime Minister of Victor Emmanuel, with a thorough comprehension of the genius of Romanism, in its efforts to repress free thought, and resist the spirit of the age, threatened the overthrow of Papal domination, not by fire and fagot, the favorite weapons of Rome, but by the introduction of modern improvements.

"I will attack Rome," said he, "by railways, by the electric telegraph, by agricultural improvements, by establishing national banks, by gratuitous education on a large scale, by civil marriages, by the accularization of conventnal property, by the enactment of a model code, embodying the most lenient laws in Europe, and by the suppression of corporeal punishment. I will place the spirit of modern expansion face to face with the old spirit of obscuration. I am quite certain the former will triumph. I will establish a blockade of civilization around Rome. If she undergoes a modification, she will come to us; if she remains unchanged, she will, by constant comparison, become so disgusted with her state of inferiority, that she will throw herself into our arms to escape destruction."

As a result of this far-seeing policy, wherever the liberal rule of Victor Emmanuel has extended in Italy, schools are multiplying, internal improvements are advancing, industry and enterprise are increasing, property is rising in value, and as a necessary result, the power of the despotic and bigoted priesthood is gradually but surely waning.

DR. WAYLAND WITH HIS BIBLE.—In Dr. Wayland's correspondence with his friend, Rev. Dr. Hoby, of England, after alluding to the fact of failing health, and the consequent necessity of desisting from further intellectual occupation, he says:

"I have, however, read the Bible more than ever, in my life, in the same space of time, and at every new reading I find more to love and admire. Oh, how much have I lost by not reading it more! I have reason to bless God for setting me aside, as on a side bench, at school alone, to read his word and call upon his name."

And again:

"Blessed be God, I am able to read his word with increasing interest, and to entertain a more constant hope of eternal life. Sometimes I think how much better I might have lived, how much more good I might have done, if, eschewing everything but Christ, I had lived above the world, and laid my own self a living sacrifice on His altar, neither thinking nor knowing anything of the notions or habits of professing Christians."

English papers speak of a boy preacher, thirteen years old, who collects crowded congregations to hear him.

BISHOP KAVANAUGH.

Probably no man has been more grossly misrepresented during the past four years—an era conspicuous in the history of mendacity—than he whose name appears at the head of this article. Cut off in the early part of the war from intercourse with his associates in the Episcopacy, Bishop Kavanaugh was compelled to assume alone "the care of all the churches" in his denomination in Western Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, Kansas and California; a burden which, when the political animosities rife in these States, the military oppressions that manacled and gyved them, and the continual ebb and flow of the tide of invasion across their territory are considered, must have required scarcely less than the shoulders of an Atlas to support it.

And although his prudence, patience, charity, tact, resolution, indeed his whole intellect and heart were put to severest tests, and strained well-nigh to breaking, right glad am I to be able to write that not a chord snapped. He walked through the fire and was not burned, and through the rivers and they did not overflow him. Kentucky, his native State, and the State of his residence, was literally rent in twain by the severance of the Union. Not only communities, but churches, masonic lodges, and families, societies built with the strongest cement of concord, were shattered by the earthquake shock into ruinous antagonisms. Members of the same household stood apart like a rock which the dashings of the sea have worn asunder, and frowned upon each other with looks of aversion. Son arrayed himself against father, brothers separated to meet only in battle; even husband and wife, in some cases, felt a chill of indifference creeping over their intimacy, and changing its warmth of affection into the coldness of decorum. Congregations subjected their allegiance to God to the wild sway of passion, and forgot the principles of the Gospel in their insane idolatry of a flag or a fancy. From the relish with which they vilified and persecuted each other, wherever they were divided, one might have thought that they had discovered a new system of Scripture interpretation, by which the great commandment of love was changed into one of hate. Ministers of Christ, servants of our blessed Lord, commissioned to extend the olive branch of reconciliation to a world at enmity with heaven, and marching under a banner inscribed with the angelic motto, "Peace, good will and glory," suddenly were transformed into spies upon each other, evinced more joy over the imprisonment of a fellow-laborer than over the conversion of a soul, rose to eminence in the work of proscription, and were rewarded by Colleges with high-sounding titles for their opposition to the spirit of Christianity.

Jerusalem, with her vitals eaten out by her zealots, sicarii, and various other factions, when Rome thundered at her gates, is a fitting picture of the Church of Christ as it was then in the State of Kentucky—torn to pieces by internal feuds, while beleaguered with the dark legions of sin.

In the midst of this strife calmly stood Bishop Kavanaugh, prominent on account of his office, his every movement watched by both sides, both being equally anxious to see which he would espouse. He espoused neither. He stood between, and like a faithful ambassador of the Prince of Peace, devoted himself to the ministry of healing the breach, to the conservation of the unity of the church. His platform was, in truth, "armed neutrality"—neutrality armed with the panoply of light, to do good, and keep his sacred character as a leader in Israel. Still he was suspected by the Union party of sympathy with the South. They attempted to extract an avowal of his preference, but failed, and failing, immediately adopted another, a course of conduct calculated to push him into the ranks of their opponents.—Nevertheless, he remained steadfast and immovable. Doubtless he had his private opinion in regard to the stupendous struggle that awed the world; but they were expressed, if expressed at all, only among most familiar friends. He never obtruded them upon the attention of the public. He never betrayed his Saviour for the thirty silver pieces of political notoriety. He never degraded the divine religion, whose disciple he claimed to be, by associating it with low-born party creeds, and making it their slave and bawd. He understood his Redeemer's mission and his own too well. He felt the responsibilities of his office, and the value of souls too deeply, not to be fully aware of the criminality of such action—and his heart scorned to do what his conscience could not approve.

The peculiar and rigorous trials of his situation at one time threatened his life.—In the summer and fall of 1862 he lay for months prostrated by care, his nervous system deranged, his recovery almost hopeless. He attended no conferences during that year. But his work was not completed, and God spared him to his Church. Upon being restored to health, he at once commenced his pastoral labors with an earnestness demonstrative of his gratitude, his purpose to repair the gap his sickness had caused in his plans, and to desire to save, if possible, his church on the border from total disruption and destruction. He visited extensively; preached frequently. At the Kentucky Conference, held in Shelbyville in '63, he was destined to receive a double stroke of affliction. The session was a stormy one. The character of Dr. Hicks—who had been presiding elder of the Shelbyville district, and left the State in the retreat of Bragg's army, frightened away from his home, his family, his all, by mischievous reports of his arrest if he remained—was violently assailed and censured by the vote of the Conference, of which embittered political preachers then constituted a considerable majority. Mrs. Kavanaugh, the Bishop's wife, a lady of delicate health, finest sensibilities and the most ardent attachments, was present, and the excitement occasioned by the maltreatment of her friend was more than her frail frame could bear—it sank her into the grave. She died in the faith of Jesus, who "giveth his beloved sleep." Among her latest words were, "God bless the South;" a prayer her spirit quickly followed to heaven. She was a woman of sweet temper and pious mind, a friend of open heart and ready hand, a wife whose oneness with her husband was worthy to be a type of "the mystical union that is between Christ and His Church." Verily, her death was a sore bereavement to him by whose side she had walked so many miles of life's pilgrimage, a sharer of his joys and sorrows, his hopes and disappointments, always cheering his journey, as with an incarnate promise of the sweet dawn of that everlasting Sabbath which will be its end.

Some time after her demise, urged by repeated solicitations, Bishop Kavanaugh left Kentucky for California. He arrived at San Francisco May 7th, 1864. In California he spent four months, traveling by stage thousands of miles, and preaching in the open air to immense audiences. It had been four years since the Southern Methodists had received a visit from one of their Bishops, and consequently they welcomed him with ovations all the more expressive of their gladness.

The northern press, secular and religious, by no means partook of this kind feeling. They lashed their sides with very fury, and bellowed loudly their hunger for his arrest.

They endeavored to arouse popular indignation against him by the use of malicious falsehoods and scandal, calling him "a spy," "a traitor," "a secret agent for the rebel government, sent out by Jeff Davis to stir up trouble in their quiet State." These slanderous attacks, too contemptible to elicit reply, partially succeeded in their design. While at a camp meeting, engaged in preaching the word of truth, his delightful labors were interrupted by a staff officer from General McDowell, with an order to seize his person and property. Of course the Bishop politely yielded, and attended his military guide of somewhat civil manners to headquarters at San Francisco. The interview was as satisfactory to both parties as could be expected. The Bishop satisfied the General of the purely ecclesiastical nature of his mission, and the General satisfied the Bishop of his pardonable ignorance of ecclesiastical relations.

Passing over the incidents of a year, I now come to the session of the Kentucky Conference in Covington, last fall. A clique of preachers, who had for four years, with the assistance of the bayonet, ruled this Conference, but who, by their radicalism and vindictiveness had forfeited the most of the influence they had wielded in days of peace, here attempted to precipitate the entire body out of the Methodist Church South. Few themselves, they relied upon their artifice, their concert of action, and their erroneous estimate of their popularity to accomplish their nefarious plot. They failed. The mine that was to explode nader and demolish Southern Methodism, only blew themselves into the air out of sight, and out of respect.—Throughout this session, although insulted again and again by the notorious "eighteen," now enraged by the defeat of their conspiracy, and the more keenly felt defeat of their candidates for the delegateship to the General Conference, Bishop Kavanaugh uttered no word that could be justly construed into offensiveness, exhibited no sign of prejudice or partiality. They have published and circulated documents wherein they accuse him of the intention to appoint them, on account of their loyalty, to charges unable to support them, the poorest and most inaccessible within the bounds of the Conference. Alas! what must be the guilt of men who are reduced to such burrows of subterfuge! How flimsy the figleaf aprons with which they try to hide the shame of their nakedness. I do not deny the charge, because it is beneath denial; it denies itself. They leave the Methodist Church South because it is sectional; because it was established to encourage and perpetuate slavery! Strange that they, many of them, have been members of it for ten, fifteen and twenty years, and never made this discovery until a few months ago. Slaveholders until slavery was dead, they never beheld their infamy until it ceased to be profitable. Their sin is recorded, and can be blotted out only by tears of repentance.

Bishop Kavanaugh is now in excellent health, ruddy, vigorous and corpulent. In the social circle he is cheerful and entertaining. In the pulpit he is a "columbiad," in respect alike to report, range, and effect. He has, by dint of industry and good management, under the blessing of God, obtained possession of all church property within the limits of his jurisdiction illegally claimed by the Northern fraternity—and gracious revivals are covering the desert places with rose blossoms.

HOW TO CURE A BAD TEMPER—My lads, when a dog makes too free with you, jumps and bounds over you, you say—"Down, Nero, down, sir." That is what you must say when passion rises: "Down, sir."

I once took a passionate man very much aback by asking him to hold his tongue while he felt my pulse, or else while I felt his. It is astonishing how efficacious a moment or two of quiet is in the midst of a great storm. When the fit is very strong on you, think how you would appear before the glass, or rather think how you would really appear before God. He is the greatest hero who can rule his spirit.—*Rev. P. Nightfall.

Rose and amber round the sun,
Lo! another day is done.
Now while soft the night-winds call,
Dews and purple shadows fall,
And upon the horizon's rim
Sleep the mountains vast and dim.
In the embrace of watching skies
Earth will rest till morning rise.

When the shadows fall for me;
Love my rose and amber be;
And on life's horizon rim
Heavenly mountains slumber dim.
Saviour! Jesus! to thy breast
Fold me then in perfect rest;
Safe, in shielding arms as thine,
Till the eternal morning shine.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.—The minority fragment of the Baltimore Conference is now in session in Baltimore. It is a very little part of what was once the Baltimore Conference. The proceedings, as reported so far, have been devoid of public interest. Bishop Scott is presiding, and Bishops Ames and Thompson are said to be present, to help in the great labor of presiding, perhaps, or to strengthen the episcopal police, and guard those very uncertain minority men from bolting again. They had better watch Mr. L. Morgan and Mr. Glenin, and the rest of those gentlemen who have been notorious for avowing Southern sympathy!—mighty uncertain men!

It is mentioned as an amiable part of the character of the judicious Mr. Hooker, that he used to say—"If I had no other reason and motive for being religious, I would strive earnestly to be so for the sake of my aged mother, that I may requite her care of me, and cause the widow's heart to sing for joy.

The President's Peace Proclamation.

WASHINGTON, April 2.

Whereas; by proclamations of the 15th and 19th of April, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, the President of the United States, in virtue of power vested in him by the Constitution and laws, declared that the laws of the United States were opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the Marshals by law;

And, whereas, By another proclamation made the 16th day of August, in the same year, in pursuance of an act of Congress, approved July 13, 1861, the inhabitants of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi and Florida, except the inhabitants of that part of the State of Virginia lying west of the Alleghany Mountains, or such part of that State and the other States before named as might maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution, or might from time to time be occupied and controlled by the forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of insurgents were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States:

And, whereas, by another proclamation of the first day of January, 1862, issued in pursuance of an act of Congress, approved June 7, 1861, the insurrection was declared to be still existing in the States aforesaid, with the exception of certain specified counties in the State of Virginia:

And, whereas, by another proclamation, made on the 2d day of April, 1863, in pursuance of the act of Congress of July 13, 1861, the exceptions named in the proclamation of August 16, 1861, were revoked, and as to the inhabitants of the State of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Florida and Virginia, except the forty-eight counties of Virginia, designated as Western Virginia, and the ports of New Orleans, Key West, Port Royal and Beaufort, the insurrection was declared to be still existing in the States aforesaid:

And, whereas, by another proclamation, made on the second of April, 1863, in pursuance of an act of Congress of July 15th, 1861, the exceptions named in the proclamation of August 16th, 1861, were revoked and the inhabitants of the States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Florida and Virginia, except the forty-eight counties of Virginia, designated as Western Virginia, and ports of New Orleans, Key West, Port Royal and Beaufort, S. C., were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States:

And, whereas, The House of Representatives, on the 22d of July, 1861, adopted resolutions in the following words, viz:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the Southern States, now in rebellion against the constitutional government, in arms around the capital; that in the national emergency, Congress, banishing all feelings of resentment, will do only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the established institutions of those States, but to maintain and defend the supremacy of the Constitution, and preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality and rights of the several States unimpaired; and as these objects are accomplished, the war ought to cease.

And, whereas, These resolutions, though not joint or concurrent, form one substantially, and may be regarded as having expressed the views of Congress upon the subject to which they relate.

And, whereas, By my proclamation of the 13th of June last the insurrection in the State of Tennessee was declared to have been suppressed and the authority of the United States therein to be undisputed, and such United States officers as had been duly commissioned to be in the undisputed exercise of their official functions:

And, whereas, There now exists no organized armed resistance of misguided citizens nor others to the authority of the United States in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi and Florida, and the law can be sustained and enforced therein by the proper civil authority, State or Federal, and the people of the said States are well and loyally disposed, and have conformed or will conform in their legislatures to the condition of affairs growing out of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting slavery within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States:

And, whereas, In view of the before recited premises, it is the manifest determination of the American people that no State of its own will has the right or power to go out of or separate itself from, or be separated from the American Union, and that each State ought to retain and constitute an integral part of the United States:

And, whereas, The people of the several before mentioned States have, in the manner aforesaid, been constantly giving satisfactory evidence that they acquiesce in this important resolution of the National Union:

And, whereas, It is believed to be the fundamental principle of the government that the people who have revolted, and who have been overcome and subdued, must be dealt with so as to induce them virtually to become friends, or else they must be held by absolute military power, so as to prevent them ever again doing harm as enemies, which last named policy is abhorrent to humanity and freedom:

And, whereas, The Constitution of the United States provides for constitutional commonwealths only as States, and not as territories:

And, whereas, such constitutional States must necessarily be, and by the Constitution and laws of the United States are made equal, and placed on like footing as to political rights, immunities, dignity and favors with the several States with which they are united:

And, whereas, The observance of political equality, as a principle of right and justice, is well calculated to encourage the people of the States to be and become more persevering in their renewed allegiance:

And, whereas, standing military occupation, martial law, military tribunals and the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, are in time of peace dangerous to public interest and incompatible with the individual rights of citizens and contrary to the opinions and spirit of our free institutions, and an exhaustion of our natural resources, and ought not therefore to be sanctioned or allowed, except in case of war, for repelling or suppressing insurrection or rebellion:

And, whereas, The policy of the government of the United States from the beginning of the insurrection to its final suppression, has been in conformity with the principles herein set forth and enumerated:

Therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim and declare that the insurrection which heretofore existed in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas and Florida, is at an end, and henceforth to be so regarded.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, on the second day of April in the year of our Lord 1866, and of the independence of the United States of America the ninetieth (90th).

ANDREW JOHNSON.

Fundamental Principles.

There is a wild clamor for change, and a reckless spirit of innovation in respect to the economy of Methodism in this country. It bodes no good, and we regard the tendency as ominous of evil. There are certain great landmarks from which it is perilous to depart. We advocate certain improvements, and, we may say, additions, to our economy, but we regard them as perfectly consistent with it, and not subversive of it; such as do not impair its integrity, or affect its identity. In these respects, some are far ahead of us. We occupy, as we believe, the true conservative ground, in all these proposed arrangements. Our object is to render our existing institutions more effective and more in accordance with the exigencies of the times, without destroying or paralyzing one element of power which we possess.—To make our position more apparent, we will advert to a few fundamental principles from which, in our opinion, it would be dangerous to depart.

The first is the connexional principle; the ligature which binds all the parts of our system into one grand whole, under one general and equalizing administration of temporal and moral legislation. This harmonious unity is not only the beauty, but it is the vitality of the system. It concentrates and propagates its energy.—Its only evil is a centralization of power, which is not a possibility, with such checks and balances as are already incorporated in it. And it operates in harmony with that law of supply and demand, which no other plan possesses in an equal degree. The opposite tendency becoming every day more manifest, is to independency, or congregational Methodism, which is not a distribution, but a separation and an isolation of Methodism into an indefinite number of fractional parts. Whatever may for a time, necessitate such a state of things, it cannot be perpetuated without annihilating all that is distinctive of Methodism. We therefore deprecate the tendency, while we admire the motive to keep aloof from the secularity prevailing under certain circumstances. Independency will eventually break in upon the community of interest cherished by the connexional bond. It will interrupt the needful and regular supply of ministers contemplated by that bond. For it is manifestly inadequate to its own supply, unless a species of connexionalism be substituted for that which is abandoned. It will throw open the door to latitudinarian views of doctrine and of discipline, since there will be no standard of harmony, except within itself. It will want those judicial processes in church trials, so necessary in the equipoise of a system, unless it develop them by its own expansion. For these reasons we strenuously adhere to the connexional principle of Methodism, without questioning the Christian liberty of those who adopt opposite views.

We equally deprecate any infraction of itinerancy, which, in our economy, is inseparable from connexionalism. The tendency is, unquestionably, to the serious invasion of this peculiarity. Some of our contemporaries take higher ground on this subject than we are prepared to concede. Their requisitions are a virtual abrogation of it altogether. We admit the necessity of appending to it a larger proportion of pastoral capacity. The present condition of Methodism, and the competition of other denominations, imperatively demand a vastly increased exercise of pastoral influence. And we do not see how it can be realized except in the extension of the pastoral term. But it would, in our judgment, be an unmitigated evil so to extend it as to destroy the healthful and uniform movement of the principle itself. The consequences which would inevitably follow are so grave, that they deserve to be pondered with the deepest solicitude. The medium must be struck between the two extremes, and ultraism in neither carefully avoided.

We are utterly opposed to the abrogation of the class meeting system. It is a wonderful specimen of ecclesiastical wisdom—it is in exact accordance with both of the above mentioned principles. It is as fundamental as they are, and could not be dispensed with without uncompensated detriment to the cause. Properly used, it is an element of vast spiritual power. It brings the entire membership under the process of direct spiritual improvement, in uninterrupted operation. Yet we are free to say, that the obligation of the institution ought to rest on its own true grounds; not of assumed, doubtful scriptural authority, perpetually rendering itself questionable in every mind, but upon the real and conceded ground of religious utility and expediency. Its present requisition places the church obviously in a false position, and, by so much, weakens its authority. Hence the irrevocable relaxation into which it has fallen, and the painful revulsion which its re-enactment or rigid enforcement would produce.

Without further enlargement, we present these considerations to our readers, and ask them carefully to weigh them. We wish no improvement that is not conservative. And, while we do earnestly desire to see the church measure up to the call of a wise policy, we have no sympathy for that recklessness of change that would disintegrate and demolish the essential characteristics of Wesleyan Methodism.

Dr. Marion Sims, formerly of Montgomery, now living in London, has won such fame in France and Great Britain as an accomplished surgeon that the French Emperor has conferred upon him, as a mark of great respect, the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

"The business of the current week," says the Price Current of Wednesday last, "opened on Saturday with very quiet markets in most branches of trade, and only a moderate demand for our leading staple, which was depressed by the receipts being much beyond general expectation.

COTTON—The receipts proper have continued quite heavy, embracing 11,951 bales, against 9889 during the corresponding four days last week, showing an increase of 8562 bales. Low Middling was sold yesterday as low as 34 cents and Strict Low Middling at 35 cents, showing a decline of eight cents from last Friday's currency; yet as the general business was at a less reduction, we put down our quotations only 2 cents, as follows: Ordinary 30 to 32, Good Ordinary 33 to 34, Low Middling 35 to 36, Middling 38 to 39.

TOBACCO—The supplies are too small for extended operations, and only a few hogsheads have been taken for the city trade, at prices ruling within the range of the quotations below, which we repeat: Low Refused, Light—6 to 6½; Good do., 7 to 8; Common Leaf, 9 to 10; Fair, 12 to 14; Good, 15 to 17; Fine, 18 to 20; Choice Selections, 21 to 24. Heavy—7 to 7½; Good do. 8 to 9; Common Leaf, 10 to 12; Fair, 14 to 17; Good, 18 to 20; Fine, 22 to 24; Choice Selections, 26 to 28.

SUGAR—There is a fair supply of the production of Louisiana on hand, but very little demand, and the sales on Saturday and Monday were confined to 125 hhds at 12 7-8 cents for Good Common, 14¼ to 14 5-8 cents for for Fully Fair, and 15¼ cents per lb. for Prime. Yesterday about 75 hhds sold, at several lots at 14 cents for Good Fair, 14¼ cents for Fully Fair, 14½c for Seconds, 15½c for Yellow Clarified, and 15 5-8c for Prime to Choice. There is a large stock of Cuba on hand, but only a retail demand at 12¾ to 13c for No. 13, 14c for No. 14, and 15c per lb. for No. 15.

MOLASSES—The market is nearly bare of the production of Louisiana. There has been very little demand, however, and only a few barrels were sold on Saturday and Monday at 77½ to 80 cents per gallon for Prime Rebuiled. Yesterday a lot of 50 bbls Common sold at 51 cents. There have not been any sales of Cuba Molasses since our last review. It may be quoted by the cargo at 48 to 50 cents per gallon, in lots at 51c, and at retail at 55c.

WESTERN PRODUCE—The movement in the general market, though not large, has been to a fair extent since our last review, although the demand for Western Produce is only local. Flour, Corn and Oats have continued in fair demand, the former at previous rates, and the latter at advanced prices. There have been considerable sales of Bran and Hay, but at reduced figures. Provisions are still neglected and only a retail business is done.

FLOUR—The supplies are still small, but the demand is only local. The lower grades are neglected, while the better descriptions are scarce and in request. The sales on Saturday and Monday comprised 4000 bbls., in small lots, at $6 25 for Common, $7 for Fine, $8 to $8 25 for Superfine, $9 to $10 for some on its merits, $10 25 to $10 50 for Low Extra, $12 to $12 50 for Good Extra, and $12 75 to $18 50 per barrel for Choice Extra. Yesterday 2000 barrels were sold, in small lots, at $6 75 for Common, $6 75 to $7 for Fine, $8 to $8 25 for Superfine, $9 to $9 25 for some on its merits, $10 25 for Low Extra, $10 40 for Fair Extra, and $11 50 for Good Extra. A good jobbing trade has been done at $5 per bbl. for Superfine.

PORK—The market is well supplied, but the demand is only of a retail character, and is supplied at $28 50 for Mess. On Saturday 150 bbls Mess sold at $28 50, and on Monday 200 at $28 25 per bbl. There were some sales at $28 per bbl.

BACON—The market is very dull and there is very little doing even at retail. There were sales of 10 tierces Ribbed Sides at 16 cents and 9 do. Clear Sides at 17 cents per lb. Shoulders are retailing at 12½ to 13c, Ribbed Sides 16 to 18½, and Sugar cured Hams at 21 to 28 cents per lb.

GREEN MEAT—The market is extremely dull, and there have been no sales worthy of note since our last review. Green Shoulders are retailing at 11½ to 12 cents per pound, and Sides at 14 cents per lb. Shoulders could not command more than 10c per lb. in a wholesale way.

LARD—The market has been dull, and there have been only retail sales at 13c for Prime in tierces and 21 cents in kegs. Round lots may be quoted at 13c in tierces.

BUTTER AND CHEESE—The market is unchanged. Choice Butter continues very scarce, and in demand at previous prices; other descriptions are in good supply, but are neglected. Northern Butter is selling at 45 to 60 cents. Western Butter at 30 to 40 cents per pound. All descriptions of Cheese continue scarce and in demand at 23 to 24c, and English Dairy at 25 to 26c per lb.

WHISKEY—The market is well supplied, but continues dull, there being very little demand even at retail. Good Western Rectified is retailing slowly at $2 to $3 35 per gallon. The only sales of any importance were 75 barrels Western Rectified, in two lots, at $2 10c per gallon.

CORN—The supplies are not large, the demand is good, and prices have advanced fully 5 cents per bushel. There were sales on Saturday and Monday of 24,000 sacks, in lots, at 77½ to 82½ cents for Mixed, 82½ to 85c for Yellow, and 92½ to 95c for White, the outside price ruling mostly on Wednesday. Yesterday prices were still fuller, and the sales embraced 5000 bags at 82½c for Mixed, 82½ to 85c for Yellow, and 95c to $1 for White.

OATS—Have been in fair supply and in good demand, and much better prices have been obtained. The sales comprise 7000 sacks on Saturday and Monday, at 52½, 53 and 54c, some small lots commanding 55c per bushel. Yesterday there were sales of 5000 sacks at 53 to 54c per bushel.

BRAN—The supplies are liberal, but there has been very little demand, and prices are at least 75c per 100 lbs. lower. On Saturday and Monday there were sales of 2500 sacks at $1 15, $1 20 and $1 25 per 100 lbs., mostly the inside prices.

HAY—The market is well supplied, and there have been considerable sales, but at lower prices, comprising 4500 bales, of which 3800 Prime Western, in lots, at $25, and 600 at $25 50 per ton.

INDIA BAGGING—There is a small retail demand, which is being supplied by dealers at 26½ cents per yard in rolls and 27½ cents in bales. Yesterday 100 bales sold in two equal lots on private terms. It may be quoted at 30c per yard.

BALE ROPE—The market continues very dull. It is retailing at 16c per lb. Iron Cotton Ties and the Arrow Ties are held at 12 to 12½ per lb.

COFFEE—The market has continued dull, and there has been only a small retail demand for the country, which dealers have been supplying at 25 to 27½c for currency, for Ordinary to Prime Rio. On Monday there were sales from first hands of 400 bags Rio at 20½c and 150 at 21c gold, duty paid. We quote Good Fair 20½c, Prime 21c per lb.

STAR CANDLES—There is only a retail business doing at 20 to 22c per lb for short weights and 25c for full weight.

WOOL—The market continues very dull and depressed. We have no sales to report, though prices have been lowered to 15 to 17c for unwashed and 20c per lb. for washed.

COAL OIL—Is selling in a small way at 60 to 62½ cents per gallon in bbls, and 85 to 90c in cases.

SALT—There have been sales of 1600 sacks Liverpool Coarse at $1 25, and a cargo of 4000 sacks at $1 30 to $1 35 per sack. There is a small retail business doing at $1 50 per sack for Liverpool Coarse, and $1 50 for Fine, in store. The imports comprise 5,751 sacks from Liverpool.

HIDES—The market continues dull and depressed and prices have still further declined. There have been small sales at to 7½c per lb for Green, 8 to 8½c for Kip Skins, and 10 to 11c for Dry Hides.

MONETARY—We have no material change to notice in the money market proper, the movement to which is mainly confined to mercantile loans at 10 to 12 and 12 per cent per annum, and temporary loans on approved collaterals at 8 per cent per annum in bank, and 1 to 1½ per cent per month outside.

Gold has shown increased firmness until yesterday, when it was dull and drooping, closing on Saturday at 125¼ to 125½, on Monday at 125 to 125¼, and yesterday at 125¼. For Silver dealers pay 117 to 118 for the trifling sums offered at their counters.

The Stock market has continued quiet, and we have but few sales to notice.

EXCHANGE—The sales out of doors include a moderate amount of New York sight at ¼ per cent discount, and a limited sum at the extreme of 7-16 and ½.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE

General Conference

OF THE

M. E. CHURCH SOUTH

Convened in New Orleans, April 4, 1866.

FOURTH DAY.

The Conference met at 9 o'clock, A. M., pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by Bishop Andrew.

The opening devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. J. G. Jones.

Bishop Paine took the chair.

On motion, the calling of the roll was dispensed with.

Rev. Dr. Lee presented the following report of the Committee on Itinerancy.

The following resolution was offered by Dr. Mitchell:

Resolved, That the Committee on Itinerancy, through its Chairman, Dr. Lee, report to the General Conference, that though the division of the late Alabama Conference was irregular, we approve of its division into what are now known as the Mobile and Montgomery Conferences, the circumstances justifying the separation.

The resolution passed unanimously.

(Signed) ROBT. A. YOUNG, Sec'y.

Rev. Dr. Lee said that the committee on Itinerancy find that the name of one of the conferences has disappeared—that of the Alabama Conference—and was now represented by the Montgomery and Mobile Conferences, and the division had been made in the interval of the General Conference. Hence the preceding report.

Bishop Andrew said that the Alabama Conference was so unwieldy, and the means of communication rendered so uncertain during the late war, that at a meeting of the Alabama Conference it was deemed desirable that a division should be made. He therefore authorized the division, and hoped the General Conference would sanction his course.

On motion, the report was adopted.

The following committees were announced by the Bishop presiding:

Committee on Correspondence with other Churches—J. H. Linn, P. M. Pinckard, R. A. Young, E. H. Myers, W. M. Prottsman, J. B. McFerrin, D. S. Doggett, Robert Hiner, C. F. Deems.

On Circulating Holy Scriptures—J. E. Evans, N. H. Lee, Jos. Anderson, B. B. Ross, J. B. Smith, A. H. Mitchell, D. S. Doggett.

The resolution offered on Wednesday by Rev. Dr. Myers, to raise a special committee, consisting of one member from each Conference, to be selected by the several delegations, to which shall be referred all petitions and other papers submitted to the Conference having reference to changes in the polity of our church, which Committee shall be known as the Committee on Changes of Economy, was taken up.

Rev. Dr. Rush renewed his motion, made as a substitute for the preceding one, that so much of the memorial as refers to Episcopacy be referred to the Committee on Episcopacy.

On motion, the substitute was laid on the table, and the resolution offered by Rev. Dr. Myers adopted by a vote of 67 ayes to 61 nays.

Various memorials, petitions and reports were presented from the several annual conferences, which were referred to appropriate committees.

Rev. Dr. Marshall called attention to the fact that the Bishops' address was published without any signatures attached. He thought it necessary that their names should be affixed to the document, in order to give it the proper official form.

The Conference instructed the Publishing Committee to affix the names of the Bishops, excepting those of the absent Bishops—J. Soule and G. F. Pierce.

Rev. Dr. Sehon, Secretary of the Board of Missions, presented the following resolution passed by that Board in January, 1861:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to revise the Constitution of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church South, and present their report to the General Conference at its next session.

Referred to the Committee on Missions.

The Secretary then read the following telegram:

By telegraph from Brooklyn, New York, to the Secretary of the General Conference, M. E. Church South—

I respectfully forward the following as adopted by this Conference:

Whereas, the General Conference of the M. E. Church South is now in session in the city of New Orleans; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the New York East Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, hereby present to that venerable representative Body our Christian salutation, and cordially invite them together with us to make next Sabbath, April 8th, 1866, a day of spiritual prayer, both in private and in public congregations, for the peace and unity of heart of our common country, and for the restoration of Christian sympathy and love between the Churches, especially between the different branches of Methodists, within this nation, and upon reception of an acceptable affirmative reply, the concert of prayer will be considered by the Conference as adopted.

Resolved, That the Secretary of this Conference be requested to forthwith transmit, by telegraph, a copy of this resolution to the Secretary of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at New Orleans.

(Signed) GEO. A. WOODRUFF, Sec'y, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Rev. Dr. Wightman, of the Mobile Conference, offered the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, a telegram has been received from the secretary of the New York East Annual Conference, now in session at Brooklyn, New York, addressed to the secretary of this General Conference, respectfully inviting this body to unite with the Conference aforesaid, on to-morrow, Sunday, April the 8th, in prayer to God for the restoration of Christian sympathy and love between the churches, and especially between the different branches of Methodists in this country, therefore,

1. Resolved, That the General Conference of the M. E. Church South, is always ready to entertain with Christian courtesy any proposals looking to the cultivation of kind and brotherly relations with other branches of the common Methodism of the country, do hereby cordially agree to unite on to-morrow, with the N. Y. East Annual Conference in special and solemn prayer in private and in the public congregation, for the very desirable object specified in the fraternal message of that Conference.

Resolved, secondly, that the foregoing resolution be forthwith telegraphed by the secretary of the General Conference to the secretary of the N. Y. East Conference.

It was moved and seconded that the resolutions be adopted by a standing vote.

Rev. Dr. Lee, of Virginia: I object to taking that vote by rising. I hardly know what to say, but I cannot coincide with that resolution. I beg, if the brethren propose to adopt it, that they will do so in the usual form, and not subject any of us to the seeming necessity of voting against it. Why, sir, it is one of the most delicate positions in which you can place a Christian or Christian minister, by any act, to make him seem to be opposed to a proposition to pray; he ought always to be ready for that; but then that proposition may come in such a guise, under such circumstances, and have such ideas and associations connected with it, that it is an expression of the spirit of nature to revolt at the proposition of praying. And yet, unless he would seem to be opposed to praying, he must do it or stand charged with refusing to unite with somebody in praying. My position may be singular—I feel that it is. It may be the soundest policy that we could adopt to unite with that body in praying. It may be the keenest policy that they could have adopted to make such a proposition to us. There may be policy in it. I do not know how to receive it as simple, pure, unsophisticated honesty. I am not opposed to praying on any subject, at any time, and anywhere.

Rev. B. Jones, of Mississippi: As the mover of the adoption of those resolutions, I desire to be permitted to say a few words. I know some of the members of that East New York Conference. I have reason to believe that resolution was offered by my father-in-law. I know him, sir. I know his christian virtues. I mean the Rev. Heman Bangs. A better, purer christian man cannot be found. I suppose that resolution was introduced by him; that body endorses it; and if it does, it is all right, sir.

Rev. Dr. Marshall, of Mississippi Conference: I believe it is pretty well understood in New York and in various other places in the North where I have been within the last twelve months, that as a Methodist preacher I perhaps occupy a position as ultra in my feeling as any man that treads on Southern soil. I believed that ours was a cause of right; I still believe it; and while I will honor the nation and the church and the government, and the great institutions of Methodism North and South, so far as the principles which our christian association requires, I will still cherish this principle above any church and state in which, and under the inspiration of which I have for years as sincerely served God as I ever expect to serve Him when I reach the Kingdom above. I make this statement because I feel and know from communications I have received both here and at the North, and from recent criticisms in the New York papers upon me for words uttered in a recent lecture that I was called upon to deliver, that there is in some degree such a disposition to so regard my position and views. But, when I hear that telegraphic request that we should join them in prayer; although, as my venerated brother from Virginia says, all should pray, yet it is not always expected that we should join with a people seemingly almost on the other side of the globe, but for the rapid communication by telegraph, yet on such an occasion as this, under such circumstances, after Church and Union have been so widely sundered, after they had once repelled us from their doors, and when through that illustrious man, the pride of Georgia, who may be this day lingering at the doors of Paradise, who was cuffed and driven from their doors with a rudeness not becoming a Christian people. Yet now, I say with my whole heart, that for the honor of God, for love of His people, I never, with all my prejudices against those who have so deeply wronged the South and the Southern Church, will refuse to unite with all true Christians who believe in extending the Christian religion over this and other lands throughout the globe. When that message, in so simple, beautiful and touching terms as those which have been conveyed over the mysterious wire, comes, as if with the inspiration and burning voice of light, I may truly say, with all my heart, let us forget the past; let us pray. [Amen.] I thank God that it was in their hearts to send us that message, [Amen]—that, with all my political and religious prejudices heretofore, I have it in my heart to say, "Oh thou Searcher of the heart! Thou knowest how glad I am that the hearts of our brethren on the other side have prompted them to send us this message, through this mystic agency." I say let us accept it. If it shows anything indicative of evil, let us not be the first to suspect it. I will not—I cannot say it does. I care not who offered it—whether it was that venerable Heman Bangs or the youngest member of the Conference—I thank him for it. It has the ring of Methodism and of true piety, and I wish to say to the members of that Conference that when to-morrow morning dawns upon my eyes, as God sends His light into my room, I will say let this day be sacred to that true spirit of divine consecration that shall bind the hearts of those brethren to us; and I will pray that we may be united in the true spirit of religion. The war is over, and the sword is already turning the turf to make it ready for the seed corn. Let the past be buried and let the spirit of religion reign. The spirit of the fiend has reigned long enough, and if those whom we deemed to have manifested an ungenerous, wicked and worldly spirit towards the South, are not so bad as we had conceived, and are ready to extend the right hand of fellowship and brotherly love, let us receive it. I am for the continuance of our church as it stands. I never will and never can consent, under any circumstances, to combine churches so widely dissimilar in their interests. This is an independent Southern church. That is its name—South—because there is a South, and always will be a South, for God is in the South and always will be. Therefore I say, as the Church South, let us pray.

Dr. W. A. Smith, of the Virginia Conference—I am tempted to speak in the hope that I shall see a unanimous rising vote on the question. I differ with Dr. Lee with the greatest reluctance. I had rather differ with almost any other man, but I am prompted to speak with the hope that even Dr. Lee will unite with us in a rising vote on the subject. I know that I have been ultra enough and probably am still ultra enough on this subject, but I shall consider it as a part of my record, and I am willing that it should be so considered. I should regret if it were otherwise, that I took part in an affirmative rising vote on this resolution. And, I again repeat, that I hope that we shall not be without brother Lee's vote, because I think he overlooks a very slight distinction that he should have before his mind. I will state it. If this proposition came to us from the body of the Northern Church, which occupies such a hostile position to us, I would pause. I would do more than pause; I would say "nay." I would say purge yourselves of the iniquity of occupying our territory, and infringing upon law, justice, sympathy and everything else. Purge yourselves first of the iniquity of sinning against right in taking our property and holding it, and seeking to subordinate the military authority of the United States to carry out your plans. Purge yourselves of that iniquity, wash yourselves of that sin, and when you have done that, come and ask us to pray and we will unite with you in prayer. We are praying all the time, but do that and we will unite in praying with you. Now, I suppose, that is the real animus of Dr. Lee on the subject. But that is not the proposition. It is a proposition from the East New York Conference that commits itself by that act to declare sympathy with us Methodists South. Shall we say to them "nay?" No sir. I heartily and cordially unite with the brethren in saying with uplifted hands "Let us pray." [Applause and responses of Amen.]

Rev. Dr. Deems, of North Carolina Conference: Whatever we do on this subject must be done promptly. I do not feel at liberty to detain the Conference one unnecessary moment. I am for the passage of these resolutions unanimously, and I unite with Dr. Smith, of Virginia, in hoping that every man will vote for them. I have lately spent several months in the North, and I have received the most cordial attention from the brethren there. Whenever an invitation was extended to me to preach that I could accept consistently with my relation to the church, I accepted it, and more invitations were extended than I could possibly accept. The last sermon that I delivered there was probably in the very church in which this Conference is now in session. There is now in my possession a standing invitation, within the bounds of that Conference, that every time a minister from the South reaches New York he is invited to go and preach there. If I supposed there was a trick in this thing, I do not know what I would do. I think I should pray then. [Laughter and applause.] We cannot be injured, dear brethren, even if they try to play a trick on us, if, in the simplicity of our hearts, we adopt this resolution. I hope the resolution will be adopted, and to their cordial greeting this brotherly response from us will be sent over the wires.

Rev. Dr. Lee, of Virginia Conference: I am, unfortunately, it seems, in a most disagreeable position. I must say something. I do not wish to be misunderstood in the matter, but I seem to be the only "abstreperous" one in the collection here, and am compelled to join with all the rest in praying. I hope that I shall never be abjured on a subject of that kind. I have to say, in the first place, that I never had any religion to boast of in my life. I am sure that I never prayed as much as I ought to have done. I might have prayed more frequently. I wish I had a purer record in my own conscience and above on that subject. Not very long since, while smoking, as my friends know I can do occasionally, two ministers came in and one began to talk and the other began to cry. As I was smoking and one was crying, the other one said we ought to pray. It seemed very untimely and very unseemly, but I laid the pipe down and prayed, and prayed for my friend.—If the Conference will accept an amendment, I will vote for that resolution. I would insert these words in it: "That every member of this body who does really and sincerely intend to pray all day to-morrow, on this subject, shall rise and stand on his feet." Then if he does not intend to do so, he can sit still.

Rev. Dr. Sehon, of the Louisville Conference: Retaining to myself all expression in favor of my individual attachment to the church of my choice, ignoring all grievances of a personal or church character, that we may have received at the hands of brethren North, I say, in the sincerity of my heart, that I hail that resolution with the greatest pleasure, and I hope that by a rising vote every member of this body will signify his approval of it, and that to the Father of all mercies we shall present ourselves fervently and with self-abasement before his throne. I have had the pleasure of residing in the city of New York for several months past, and I believe that the resolution is based upon the kindest principles of christian charity. There are noble souls and large hearts in the North that sympathize with the Church South, and I hope speedily we may send a fraternal answer back, and that God may look down upon this scene of two antagonistic branches of the church, united in prayer for a common blessing to rest upon us.

Rev. Dr. Walker, of Louisiana Conference, then moved the previous question, which, on vote, was carried.

The resolution was then passed by a rising vote.

After benediction by Bishop Kavanaugh, the Conference adjourned.

FIFTH DAY.

MONDAY, April 9, 1866.

The Conference met at 9 o'clock A. M., pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by Bishop Andrew.

The opening devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. J. W. S. McKenzie, of the East Texas Conference.

Bishop Andrew announced that Bishop Pierce had arrived since the last session.

Bishop Andrew then introduced to the Conference, Rev. Dr. L. Pierce, of the Georgia Conference, who responded as follows: I shall not be able, I fear, to take that part I would desire in this last act of my public life in behalf of the church that I love next below my God. I am glad that I am here, and I hope that I shall have your sympathy and prayers, and whatever I am able to say, I trust you will accord to me the privilege of saying. I have identified myself with the history of Methodism for the last 61 years, during which time I have been an active laborer in the field. Many changes are now proposed in our church, and when the proper time arrives, I should at least like the opportunity of saying a few things in regard to them.

Bishop Andrew said it would be the pleasure of the Conference to hear anything that Rev. Dr. Pierce desired to say on any subject that comes before the Conference.

Bishop Andrew then addressed the Conference as follows. I wish to say a few things before I leave the chair. You certainly have had a feast of fat things since the Conference began—themes that will never be forgotten. They have left a hallowing and mellowing influence upon my heart, and many hearts—an auspicious commencement of the duties that lie before us. I shall only make a few suggestions to you, and I trust you will see that they are intended in good part. I need not exhort you to have God always before you. Of course, as Christian Ministers engaged in God's work, you will ever keep in mind that the eye of God is upon you. There will and must be discussions in the course of the Conference. I am not impatient to discussion. I like to see it with proper dignity and in the proper spirit of Christian ministers. A good, sensible, even spicy discussion, I like, if you keep self a little out of sight and conduct it in the right spirit and temper. I do not like to see discussions where there is personal bitterness, and when one seems to take delight in showing how keenly he can cut another. I do not like to see a brother always ready to receive supposed personal reflections or insults. If I enter into debate with a brother, I will endeavor to enter into the spirit of the debate as a Christian gentleman, and will not hurt his feelings if I can help it. When brethren enter into discussions they should remember that if they give thrusts they will receive them. The better way is not to give thrusts, but if you do you must expect and be prepared for the return of them. Keep calm and discuss all measures in a gentlemanly temper. I have known individuals who were very sensitive and apt to imagine that something said is a reflection upon them, when nothing of the sort was intended. I take it for granted that no Christian gentleman will aim to wound my feelings, and if he does, I will disappoint him; I will not recieve it, and he will throw that much of his ammunition away. Let us discuss calmly and with brotherly love. Another suggestion: There may be, and of course there will, a great many efforts at improvement and change in our church discipline and economy. Some of the brothers may think that as the church has lived and prospered without such and such changes, and they have not conceived it necessary to make these changes during a long ministerial career, that something personal is intended. Changes will be proposed—it could not be expected otherwise in this Conference. Do not take them as a personal matter; do not condemn a brother who brings forward a change. All these brethren that want changes, all those who feel they are not satisfied with our present economy, will have leave to propose them. If a brother brings forward a change that you do not approve, oppose it, but do not brand him. If you can refute his arguments in a manly way, do so, but do not think that because he proposed such and such changes he loves the church less than you do.

Several memorials from annual conferences were presented.

The following names were announced as the selections of the Delegates from the several Conferences, for the Committee on Changes of Economy: Baltimore, E. R. Veitch; Virginia, John C. Granberry; Western Virginia, S. Hargiss; North Carolina, B. Craven; South Carolina, H. A. C. Walker; Georgia, E. H. Myers; Florida, Josephus Anderson; Montgomery, W. A. McCarthy; Mobile, J. Hamilton; Louisiniana, Linus Parker; Mississippi, Charles K. Marshall; Tennessee, Samuel D. Baldwin; Holston, E. E. Wiley; Louisville, N. H. Lee; Kentucky, Robert Hiner; St. Louis, D. R. McAnally; Missouri, Wm. M. Rush; Arkansas, J. M. P. Hickerson; Ouachita, Augustus R. Winfield; Indian Mission, J. Harold; East Texas, J. C. Tullis; Texas, R. Alexander; Rio Grande, J. Boring; Pacific, W. R. Gober.

Dr. Wm. A. Smith, of the Virginia Conference, offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, The General Conference in 1854 passed a law, which now stands on page 47 of the last edition of the Discipline, specifying, if not limiting the veto power of the Bishops; and

Whereas, from an oversight on the part of some one, no order was made by the General Conference directing this law to be submitted to the several Annual Conferences for their constitutional concurrence; and

Whereas, without such concurrence it is not, in its present form at least, a part of the organic law of the church, although it has kept the place of such a law in the Discipline for the last twelve years; therefore,

Resolved, That our Bishops be, and are hereby requested, to take the earliest opportunity to lay this law before each Annual Conference and request them to vote on it, and after each Conference shall have voted, to announce the result to the church.

Rev. Dr. W. A. Smith said that the rule now stands in the discipline as a material law of the church, although changes in the constitution of the church can only be effected by a two thirds vote of the General Conference and a three fourths vote of the annual conferences. The former it has received because it received well nigh the unanimous concurrence of the General Conference. But the latter it has not received, for it has not been submitted to the annual conferences. He remembered distinctly the history of the matter for he introduced the law when it was acted upon by the General Conference.

Rev. J. A. Cobb, of Ouachita Conference offered the following substitute for the resolution of Rev. Dr Smith:

Whereas, The Proviso in section second granting the veto power to our College of Bishops is contrary to the nature and character of our General Superintendency; therefore,

Resolved, That said Proviso be, and it is hereby struck out of the Discipline of the M. E. Church South.

Rev. Dr. J. C. Keener, of the Louisiana Conference, said that the book called our Discipline is a book of law, and until an act becomes a law it has no business in that book. That act is not a law, because the very essential part of the process to make it one is wanting. To supply that deficiency now would be much like an act passed in the time of President Lincoln, but which did not receive his signature, and now receiving the signature of President Johnson, thereby becoming a law. It seemed to him simply absurd.

Rev. Dr. J. A. Edwards, of the Virginia Conference, said he wished to call attention to the fact that the proviso does not interfere with any of the restrictive regulations, and therefore he did not think it required the sanction of a three-fourths vote of the Annual Conferences to make it a law.

Rev. Dr. Thos. O. Summers, of the Mobile Conference, thought this was a question with which this General Conference had nothing to do, and that it was already a law.

Bishop Pierce, in the chair, said this was rather an anomalous case coming before the Conference. It is singular that it should be permitted to remain in the discipline for twelve years, and the question never raised before. The question of whether it is a law or not must be settled before any resolution can be entertained. He was free to say that in his own opinion the proviso is a law as it now stands in the discipline. This is a question for the Bishops to decide, and he asked an opportunity for consultation before rendering a decision.

Rev. Levi Pearce, of the Mississippi Conference, said he hoped the mover of that resolution would withdraw it. It has been a law for twelve years, and does not interfere with any of the restrictive rules. If any one objects to the power it confers, let him present a resolution to that effect and have it referred to the Committee on Episcopacy.

Rev. Dr. W. A. Smith of Virginia Conference: I do consider it, sir, a very material alteration in the organic law of the church, I hold that the restrictive articles requiring a two-thirds vote of the General Conference and a three-fourths vote of the annual conferences to change them, was designed and only designed to make it very difficult to effect changes in the organic law of the church; that in that view these restrictive articles were very necessary and in any other view they were wholly useless; that this is a change in the organic law of the church, is unquestionable for this very reason. Either our Bishops had a veto power before this law or they did not. The ground taken by the minority of the General Conference of 1844 in the protest in opposition to the ground taken by the majority in that Conference was, that our Episcopacy as a unit is a co-ordinate branch of the government, and that they had equal powers with the Conference. The ground taken by the majority of the Conference of 1844 was, that the Episcopacy had not equal powers with the General Conference; that they were the mere agents of the General Conference. You all remember the Croton Water speech of Bishop Hamlin; how he showed that the General Conference stood at the head of the whole affair; how every officer in the church was subordinate to the General Conference; how you come down step by step on the round of a ladder from the General Conference, where it culminates and overtops every other idea of authority in the government until you reach the last round in the ladder, the last officer in the government; he protested against that doctrine, that our Episcopacy was subordinate to the General Conference, and that the General Conference was supreme. Why, sir, the animus of that whole paper in every line of it is to that effect. The ground taken by the General Conference of 1844 is, because the Bishops are our agents, and subordinate to us, we have a right when the General Conference sit to do with them as we please. We can arraign them under the terms of a charge, and at the bar of the commonwealth try them for their lives, or in a more summary manner depose a Bishop. There was an issue between us; they maintaining that the Bishop had equal power with the General Conference, and that there could be no church—Methodist Church at least—without an Episcopacy. On the other hand, it was maintained that the church was personated in the General Conference itself. No two parties were ever more antagonistic on the face of the earth.—The question is not that raised by the brethren here, whether the Bishops have any veto power at all. It is whether they have not an absolute veto power; whether or not you have a single law as a law of the church until they put their signatures to your journal; whether you have any law. The question may never arise, as things now stand, whether a law is authentic and legitimate without the approval of the Board of Bishops. I will give a little of the history of that law. I remember that Bishop Soule made his speech following me, and that it passed by an almost unanimous vote. You have never presented it to any of the Annual Conferences. Why it was not done I cannot tell. The Episcopal Committee of 1854 might perhaps answer the question. In 1854 no action was taken on it. So far as I was concerned, the exciting subjects of that Conference so completely engrossed my attention, that, although I frequently mentioned it, it was ultimately forgotten by me, and we have not met in General Conference since until now. But I think it is an unsafe precedent—a very unsafe precedent—for you to pass any law modifying, changing or altering, in any shape or form, an organic law of the church without respecting the constitutional guards thrown around it in the constitution of the church.

Rev. Dr. C. F. Deems, of North Carolina Conference, said, that as the Bishops desired time before giving their decision, and as Dr. Smith, who has looked into the matter, has been heard, he proposed, most respectfully, that they should hear any other member who might have anything to say on this subject.

Rev. L. Pearce, of the Mississippi Conference, thought the whole mistake lies just at this point—instead of being organic it is definitive. It simply defines a power already existing, and is not organic in the sense in which Dr. Smith holds it to be. It has been a law twelve years, and it was not considered necessary that it should go to the Annual Conferences then, and he hoped it would not be required to now. All we have to do to have it remain there, is just to let it alone.

Bishop Pierce, in the chair, said he ruled these speeches out of order, but he would leave it to the Conference to say whether they desired this discussion to proceed or not.—If no one objected, for his part he did not oppose it.

Rev. Dr. D. R. McAnally, of St. Louis Conference, said that twelve years ago he had heard the same subject discussed in the General Conference. He hoped there would be no opposition to having the matter fully elucidated now.

Rev. Dr. McTyeire, of the Montgomery Conference, said: I confess to astonishment at hearing an opinion, from those whose opinions I greatly respect, that this proviso, conferring a veto power on the Bishops, is a law. To my mind it is clearly not a law, and I doubt whether by any action of ours it can be made one. True, as Bro. Edwards has said, it violates none of the restrictive rules by which the powers of a General Conference are limited; but it does more than that—it assumes to impose a restrictive rule, new and unknown to the constitution. Let us try the validity of this proviso by supposing a case: Suppose a rule or decision of this body made by a majority, in which any man has an interest. It confers rights upon him. Will he consent to be deprived of them because subsequently the Episcopal bench returns a veto to that act, and it fails, though having a majority vote, to pass over the veto by a two-thirds vote? He will contest his vested right, and rightfully. Why, it will be asked, is a majority vote of the General Conference restrained from having its usual legal force? He claims the benefit of it; and if the question involve property, and passes,

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE.

We give way this week to the proceedings of the General Conference. Indeed, we are under the necessity of condensing from the Daily. Very many of the memorials, resolutions and petitions from Annual Conferences and individuals are entirely omitted.

The Conference is fairly under way in its committee work; and the standing committees are nearly choked with the accumulation of eight years of suggestive, inventive and absolutely needful petitions, which have ponred upon the Conference. It seems as if there was nothing too large to be expected, or too small to be forgotten, in the fruitful brain of its constituency.

Reports are beginning to come in from the chairmen of the committees. These reports we expect to give in the Weekly, if possible. So far everything has been very thoroughly discussed, ventilated and argued, as our readers have doubtless perceived. But it is not improbable that the Conference will become less tolerant of discussion as business increases. It was intimated on yesterday that the fifteen minutes rule should be kept in view. Men so accustomed to public speaking as are the members of this body, can crowd a great deal of thought into one quarter of an hour's solid talking.

The very best spirit prevails throughout the Conference. And in looking over the body and listening to its very able and accomplished speakers, one is satisfied that the very best men have been sent up that Southern Methodism could afford, to constitute it. We feel that the church is safe in the hands of such counselors. Whatever polity may be finally determined upon, as the expression of the piety and the judgment of these godly, venerable men, we feel already persuaded that it will be one equally sound and satisfactory.

Before the next issue, the important matter of the name of the Church will doubtless be decided. This subject has been so amply discussed, that we suppose the church at large is awaiting the action with great interest. It is very difficult to estimate what the real mind of the Conference is upon it. We doubt not many are waiting to hear all that can be said before absolutely deciding in their own minds.

So also the report of the Committee on Episcopacy is expected this morning. This will doubtless open a wide, if not a protracted discussion. The two extremes are, a Bishop for every Conference; and, but two or three Bishops, only enough to put the present Board in good working order.

On yesterday the question of granting or confirming the veto power to the episcopacy was the order of the day, and a great part of the morning was consumed by it. Our readers will find a full report of the very able speeches which were made on the occasion. The hour of adjournment arrived while it was under consideration.

Every day only reveals the magnitude of the subjects which have been brought up for the action of this supreme legislature of the Church. The vast extent of the territory over which its jurisdiction extends and the somewhat unsettled state of Conference boundaries; the applications for the division of Conferences; communications and messengers from other branches of the Methodist family, seeking union with the Church South; the reorganization of the Missionary Society, of the Sunday School Society and of Educational and Theological Institutions—all of which have been seriously deranged during the war; the formidable and important questions of lay delegation and indefinite pastorate extension, are but a part of the momentous subjects presented to its attention. We have a delightful confidence in that Savior who is always present in the assemblies of his people, who holds the stars in his right hand—the angels of the churches—that He will guide us by His counsel.

Under God, we have that most venerably body, the Bishops, presiding over and guiding the influences and the action of the hour. To them we all look with the highest reverence that can be felt by sons in the Gospel. All around them sit the gray-haired Elders, the pillars of our Temple, to uphold and strengthen, whom God hath still spared as examples, who, through long years of toil, have blessed and saved the church. It is in this atmosphere of holy and wise counsel that, day by day, the various interests are being strengthened or developing in new shapes.

ANGLO-CONTINENTAL SOCIETY—English Efforts for Reforming the Roman Catholic Church.—The annual meeting of this society was held recently in London; the president, the Bishop of Ely, in the chair. According to the report read by the secretary, the Rev. Mr. Meyrick, of Norwich, the chief work of the society in France is to explain the character and claims of the Church of England and Ireland by circulating books, and to communicate with the Gallican section of the French church. In Spain "efforts are made to show that it is possible to believe in St. Paul, though a man has given up faith in St. Philomena," and at Gibraltar a Spanish service is conducted by a Spaniard, who is an ordained deacon of the Church of England. In Scandinavia the society endeavors to disabuse the minds of Danes, Swedes, and Norwegians of the misconceptions which they entertain with regard to the Church of England and Ireland." Special attention, however, was called to Italy, where, it was urged, there exists a spirit which "yearns after a primitive reformation." In that country the society give "help, encouragement, and direction to the impulsive national movement, which is struggling to throw off the trammels of the papacy in Church and State, and to reform the church of the revived kingdom of Italy on primitive principles." On the plea that many Italians were anxious to obtain a more intimate knowledge of the character and history of the Church of England, the society urged that there was a "call" upon the members of the Church which ought not to be ignored. The field opened in Italy was represented to be immense, and it was added that an opportunity was now offered for working a work which might change the face of Christendom. There are four hundred members in the society, and the total income last year was £800. One clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Lee, amidst some interruptions, expressed his dissent from the main objects of the society, on the ground that as several ecclesiastical authorities, including the president himself in his work on the Articles, had objected to foreign interference in the case of the Anglican Church, the same rule should hold good with the Italians. Mr. Lee, however, was not permitted to proceed; and, after a few words from the president, the meeting closed with the usual formalities.

AND WHAT NEXT?—A gentleman riding near the city overtook a well-dressed young man, and invited him to a seat in the carriage.

"And what," said the gentleman to the young stranger, "are your plans for the future?"

"I am a clerk," replied the young man, "and my hope is to succeed, and get into business for myself."

"And what next?" asked the gentleman.

"Why I intend to marry and set up an establishment of my own," said the youth.

"And what next?" continued the interrogator.

"Why to continue in business and accumulate wealth."

"And what next?"

"It is the lot of all to die, and of course I cannot escape," replied the young man.

"And what next?" once more asked the gentleman; but the young man had no answer to make—he had no purpose that reached beyond the present life!

How many young men are in precisely the same condition! Their plans embrace only this life—what pertains to the world to come has no place in all their plans.—Traveler.

Will you pity a body that is going to the block? and will you not pity a soul that is going to the pit?

What a sad visitation is that where the Black Horse of Death goeth before, and the Red Horse of Wrath followeth after!

Christ's enemies did not know what to reproach him with upon the Cross, except his piety, his benevolence, his trust in God. "He saved others." "He trusted in God."

The Episcopal Church occupies one station in Hayti by a single laborer. Other portions of the island present urgent claims for the services of missionaries, and the committee call for funds to meet the wants of this promising field.

may, out of this body before a judicial tribunal, he will get it. The like has happened, and may happen again. Will it be answered that there is a proviso in the Discipline requiring in this case a two-thirds vote? How came it there? The convention organizing this delegated General Conference did not put it there. That convention did not so restrict it. The General Conference of 1854 was, like this, a creature of the convention of 1808, and had no right, by a majority or a two-thirds, or even a unanimous vote, to lay restrictions and checks upon subsequent General Conferences. Checks may be needed, but this is not the way to put them on. What care we for the directions of General Conferences eight, twelve or twenty years ago. Those that make them may be bound by them, but we are not. This proviso is not merely a rule and regulation for the administration of the affairs and interests of the church, but it seeks to make a rule and regulation for the law-making power of the church. It is profoundly organic, and before it has any claims to be considered by law, it must pass carefully through all the processes and safeguards prescribed. It distinctly confers on the Episcopacy a veto power, and we have come to know that that means something. Nobody will say that it has been submitted to the annual conferences for their concurrence; and without this no fundamental or organic changes can be introduced. It is, therefore, a dead letter, though it may have found its way into the discipline and remained unquestioned till now. Neither can it become a law, if, according to the motion of Dr. Smith, it be sent around to the annual conferences hereafter and receive their concurrence. It is too late. By the analogy of legislation the time to perfect it as a fundamental article has expired by limitation. It originated in the General Conference of 1854, and ought to have been perfected before the General Conference following in 1858. As has been justly illustrated, to confirm it, at this date, would be like signing a bill under one administration that had been passed by the legislature of a previous administration. Not one administration, but three have gone over—1858, '62 and '66. The troubles and confusion of the war might have been plead for the lapse; but between 1854 and 1858 there was peace. Clearly, therefore, we must pass it again, and send it down to the Annual Conferences for constitutional concurrence. Or, if it goes to them in its present shape, and they give it a three-fourths vote, it must, before becoming a law, be perfected by the concurrence of the next General Conference.

The Conference adjourned.

SIXTH DAY.

TUESDAY, April 10, 1866.

The Conference met at 9 o'clock, A. M., pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by Bishop Pierce.

The opening exercises were conducted by Rev. Dr. A. A. Means, of the Georgia Conference.

Rev. Andrew Hunter, a delegate from the Ouachita Conference, was announced and took his seat as a member of the General Conference.

Bishop Early took the chair.

Rev. W. C. Johnson, of the Memphis Conference, announced that the Committee on Changes of Economy had elected Rev. Dr. E. H. Myers, of the Georgia Conference, chairman of that committee.

Rev. Dr. Myers, of the Committee on Changes of Economy, presented a report recommending that the following memorials referred to that committee be referred to the Committee on Revisals: From the Mississippi Conference.

Bishop Pierce: I wish to call your attention to a fact in relation to the Georgia Conference. When the elections took place, the Secretary announced that that Conference was entitled to twelve delegates. Upon an examination of the record, it was found that they were justly entitled to thirteen.—The thirteenth delegate, brother H. H. Parks, is with you, and I bring the question before you that you may recognize him.

Rev. Dr. Lee, of the Virginia Conference: I move that H. H. Parks be recognized as one of the delegates from the Georgia Conference to this General Conference.—Motion agreed to.

It was also ordered that Rev. Dr. A. A. Means—he being the first on the list of reserves—be recognized as a delegate in the place of Rev. W. J. Parks, reserve.

The following memorials were presented:

Rev. C. K. Marshall, of the Mississippi Conference, presented a report as an agent appointed by the General Conference that sat in Nashville eight years ago for a proposed weekly christian journal to be called the Church Evangelist, to be published for gratuitous circulation.

The Rev. Dr. made an elaborate report on the subject, which he read to the General Conference and then moved the reference of the report to the Committee on Books and Periodicals. Motion agreed to.

Rev. Dr. Wm. A. Smith, of the Virginia Conference, called up the resolution offered by him yesterday requesting the Bishop, to lay the law on page 47 of the Discipline, in regard to the veto power of the Bishops, before the Annual Conferences for their action.
